Talabani also denounced as "a big lie" a report last week by Manfred Nowak, the U.N. special investigator on torture, that torture in Iraq may be worse than it was under Saddam Hussein, with militias, terror groups and government forces disregarding rules on the humane treatment of prisoners.

Talabani said Iraq's constitution provides human-rights safeguards.

On Capitol Hill, meanwhile, Talabani told a group of six senators that setting a deadline for withdrawal of U.S. troops would be a tragedy for Iraq as it works to build its military and police forces, Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., said in a conference call with reporters.

Pulling out now would "encourage the militias and the enemies of a free and independent and unified Iraq," Lieberman quoted Talabani as saying.

However, Lieberman said, "he said, 'We look forward to the day when we can take over ourselves, and most of the American troops can go home.'"

Distrust Breaks The Bonds Of A Baghdad Neighborhood (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

BAGHDAD -- It began with a dispute over the price of ice and erupted into full-scale violence over the sighting of two strange cars cruising the neighborhood. A week later, the scars of sectarian strife were visible everywhere in Tobji.

Short concrete blocks and long coils of razor wire barred entry into every block. Stores stood shuttered, and black banners mourned the dead. Women and children stayed inside their sunbaked houses. And young men stood on corners, their eyes darting suspiciously at every car that drove through their divided neighborhood.

The scars were also heard in the perplexed voice of Ibrahim Abdul Sattar, a Sunni Arab whose mother and wife, as well as three-quarters of his friends, are Shiite Muslims. He and so many others in Tobji are trapped in a war that is reshaping the identity of their neighborhood and their shared way of life.

"We have been living together for 30 years. We've never had such tensions like this before," he said. "We are fearing for our future."

Across the capital, mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods have become battlegrounds of sectarian hostilities. West of the Tigris River, hundreds of Shiite families have fled mostly Sunni neighborhoods such as Amiriyah and Ghazaliya. In the east, hundreds of Sunni families have fled mostly Shiite areas such as Amin and Shaab. Increasingly, the strife is spreading into central Baghdad. In still-mixed neighborhoods such as Tobji, nestled in north-central Baghdad, political and militant Islam is clashing with tribal customs and a shared Arab and Muslim identity that have bonded Sunnis and Shiites for decades.

The latest conflagration in Tobji, which is officially named Salaam, or peace, began Aug. 8. What unfolded over a period of 10 days illuminates the way sectarian tension spreads in mixed neighborhoods, as well as the murky forces that drive it. This article is based on interviews with Sunni and Shiite residents, Sunni tribal elders, Shiite militiamen and Iraqi army commanders as the events unfolded in Tobji, as well as visits to the area during and after the tensions.The Prelude

Abu Mohammed, a short man with a trim beard and crooked teeth, has spent his whole life in Tobji. He is a Shiite; his next-door neighbor was a Sunni. Growing up, sect never mattered. He played, studied and socialized with Sunnis.

Now, sect means everything. After the ouster of President Saddam Hussein, Abu Mohammed joined the Mahdi Army, the militia of radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose shadowy death squads are widely believed to exact street justice under the cloak of Islam, something Sadr has denied. As the chaos deepened, Abu Mohammed became more suspicious of his Sunni neighbors, particularly after the bombing of a Shiite holy shrine in Samarra in February.

Three months ago, Mahdi Army militiamen erected checkpoints at each end of Tobji's main thoroughfare, lined with shops and small restaurants. The Iraqi army soldiers who patrol the area and are widely believed to be sympathetic to Shiites did nothing to stop them, residents said.

At the checkpoints, the militiamen targeted members of the Sunni Egheidat tribe. They demanded to see residents' identification cards before they could enter their own neighborhood. The militiamen viewed the Egheidat as sympathetic to Sunni radicals who have waged a three-year insurgency against Iraq's Shiite-led government and its American backers.

"The imam's army is a dogmatic people's army to keep order, prevent killings and chaos, and to spread Islam," said Abu Mohammed, who asked that his full name not be used. "The Egheidat are terrorists."

Moments later, as if to demonstrate his influence, he pulled out an Iraqi Interior Ministry identification card, showing his real name and his police commando unit, the Wolf Brigade. The card was evidence that members of the Mahdi Army had infiltrated the Interior Ministry's elite forces, as has long been suspected. Then he flashed his license to legally carry a firearm.

Soon after the checkpoints went up, the Egheidat began to arm themselves. They had lived in the neighborhood for decades, and controlled the ice factories and a cooking oil distributorship. They believed fervently in the Sunni interpretation of Islam, in which the caliphs who succeeded the prophet Muhammad are seen as Islam's rightful rulers.

"We've lived with Egheidat for 50 years," said Abdul Sattar, who is not an Egheidat. "I'm not sure if they are making bombs. They are a religious people, and they are always praying. This is a reason they are targeted, maybe."

Last month, Abu Mohammed and his comrades confronted an Egheidat businessman who sold ice -- a precious commodity in a city plagued by furnace-like heat, constant electricity outages and soaring prices for fuel to power generators.

"He was selling a block of ice for 20,000 dinars. Its actual price is 5,000 dinars," said Abu Mohammed. "When we told him he should lower the price, he slapped one of our guys. We didn't like that. So we beat him up as punishment."

Shortly afterward, unfamiliar cars started to drive toward the Egheidat section of Tobji, Abu Mohammed said. Then came the rumors: The cars were to be used for drive-by attacks or suicide bombings.Day One

Rumors filled the streets: A BMW and a Land Cruiser were making their way along the sweltering streets of Tobji toward the green and tan Haji Zeidan mosque, run by the Egheidat. Word of the unfamiliar cars soon reached Sadr's local office, located opposite a parking lot filled with junked cars on the main road in Tobji. A group of Mahdi Army militiamen, including Abu Mohammed, headed toward the mosque. Outside, clutching their weapons, they called out to the mosque guards.

"We told them they should hand over the strange cars so that we could hand them over to the Iraqi army," Abu Mohammed recalled. "Then we came under heavy gunfire."

A battle erupted, forcing the militiamen to retreat. Two of their men were wounded. Egheidat community leaders gave a different account. They said the militiamen taunted the guards with slurs, then shot at their guard on the roof. Forty to 50 gunmen emerged firing, but only over the heads of the militiamen.

"We were on rooftops, and they were on the street. If we wanted to kill them, then none of them would have left alive," said Muhammed Jamal al-Egheidi, 40, a leader of the Egheidat tribe.Day Two

At checkpoints, the Mahdi Army men took into custody eight Egheidat men and beat them with rubber-coated electrical cables, several Egheidat tribal leaders said. Abu Mohammed, who often did duty at the checkpoints, did not deny the men were taken, but he said they were handed over to Iraqi soldiers.

"In the streets, we set up checkpoints with the Iraqi army," he said. "I am there to serve the neighborhood. I would point people out -- only those who hurt Iraq."

That day, a group of concerned tribal elders and businessmen, both Sunnis and Shiites, met to discuss ways to stop the violence from escalating.

"They came and said this violence will never end unless we reconcile," Egheidi said. "Many of them were Shia in the neighborhood, and they knew us very well. We knew they were on our side."

The group decided to hold a tribal reconciliation gathering, a traditional mechanism used to solve conflict among Iraq's tribes. The grievances of both the Egheidat and the Mahdi Army would be addressed through negotiations and the payment of fasil , or blood money. Both sides agreed to meet the next day.Day Three

An hour before the meeting, gunmen attacked a Mahdi Army checkpoint and killed four of its men, including Abu Mohammed's 16-year-old nephew, Omar. The Mahdi Army immediately blamed the Egheidat.

"They killed our men, and then kicked them to see if they were still alive," said Abu Mohammed. "Then they shot them in the head to make sure they were dead."

Abu Mohammed recalled that he and his men ran straight to the Egheidat area. "We opened fire on them," he said matter-of-factly. A gun battle followed. "They were shooting at us from the mosque. This is God's home. They defiled the house of God. So we shot at it with an RPG, and the minaret was hit."

The fighting raged until U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered the fray and sealed off the neighborhood.

"The militiamen, when they saw the American army, they fled at extraordinary speed," said Abdul Sattar, who was too afraid to leave his house to go to work this day. "They jumped into houses. One woman saw one of them in her house and fainted."

Abu Mohammed described jumping into houses as a tactical move that the Mahdi Army often uses because its members know U.S. troops rarely remain long inside a neighborhood. "We didn't want to confront them," he said.

When Abu Mohammed returned to his home, enraged, he fired at the houses of his Sunni neighbors, even though they were not Egheidat. A Sunni neighbor, on hearing the gunfire, came out clutching an AK-47 assault rifle.

"I shot at him," said Abu Mohammed. "He bent down, and the bullet struck his mother in the arm. Then I walked out into the neighborhood and shouted: 'Any Sunni I see in the street is my enemy. No Sunni will stay in Tobji. The Sunnis are infidels.' " Egheidat tribal leaders denied any involvement in the attack on the checkpoint, blaming radical Sunni insurgents seeking to deepen the divisions in Tobji.

"We'll pay 10 times the amount -- not four times, as tradition dictates -- if what they are saying is true," Egheidi said, referring to blood money. The reconciliation meeting was postponed. That night and the following day, the streets lay silent.Day Five

Fierce gun battles between the Mahdi Army and the Egheidat erupted again. Once more, U.S. and Iraqi troops entered the neighborhood, and the fighting subsided.

The tribal reconciliation meeting was held at the neighborhood municipal council office under the protection of the Iraqi army, which cordoned off the office with its tan camouflage Humvees and soldiers.

With U.S. soldiers by his side, Brig. Gen. Abdul Jaleel Kahlaiaf, commander of the Iraqi 6th Division's 1st Brigade, met with the parties. Such neighborhood reconciliation meetings, he said in an interview later, are crucial in helping to defuse Baghdad's sectarian violence. He also denied that his mostly Shiite forces were sympathetic to the Mahdi Army.

The Mahdi Army demanded that the Egheidat hand over the men who wounded their two militiamen, as well as their weapons, and pay a fasil of 4 million dinars, or $2,700, to each of the families of the wounded.

The matter of the four dead Mahdi Army militiamen was not discussed, since the identities of their killers were unknown, said Fadil Khalifa Jassam, a Sunni imam who served as one of the mediators. "There will be another tribal gathering for the four killed," he said. At the end of the meeting, the Egheidat were given time to consider the Mahdi Army's demands, and an atwa , or truce, was declared for three days.Day Six

On the first day of the truce, Egheidi, the Sunni tribal leader, was worried. "The Mahdi Army is now going around the neighborhood saying they are going to eliminate us," he said. "We are not going to work. We're afraid we'll get captured at the checkpoints. At the market, they are not selling to Egheidat anymore. They say, 'You are terrorists.' How can we be terrorists when we stay inside our homes?"

Then he added, "How can you reconcile when you are sending people into our neighborhood to shoot us?"

The conversation turned to the U.S. troops. A year ago, Egheidi refused to accept the U.S. occupation. Now, after watching the violence in Tobji unfold, he said he has concluded that Shiite extremists are the greater enemy.

"When the Americans are in my neighborhood, I can put my head in my pillow and sleep," said Egheidi. "If they stay, there will be security. If they leave, there will not only be civil war. There will be a house-to-house war."Day Seven

On the second day of the truce, Abu Mohammed, the Sadr militiaman, was angry. "Our wounds are still fresh," he said as he puffed on a cigarette. Coloring his language was a sense of entitlement and a belief that the U.S. occupation had ruptured the cohesiveness of the sects in his community.

"Before the entrance of the Americans, we lived like brothers," Abu Mohammed said. "They married us. We married them. Saddam's regime was unjust but he didn't create divisions. We didn't have civil war. . . . The American intention is to dismember Islam."

His thoughts soon turned back to Tobji, and his nephew Omar. He wanted the Egheidat to leave. "We will not take their houses by force," he said. "They will sell them and buy in other areas. The important thing is they get out of my neighborhood."

At 4 p.m., the normally busy streets lay quiet.Day Eight

At 10 a.m., the Mahdi Army and the Egheidat reached an agreement. The Egheidat would hand over some weapons to the Mahdi Army and pay the fasil. Each side would stay out of the other's section of Tobji in order not to inflame tensions. All sides hugged and congratulated, Jassam recalled. It seemed as if the Tobji they knew had united. "Even up to this moment, we still have feelings of brotherhood," said Amar Ali, a trader.

"It was a success," said Kahlaiaf, the Iraqi army commander. Sunni and Shiite mosques in Tobji announced the news over loudspeakers. Egheidat residents came out of their homes and handed out sweets and juice to their neighbors. Then "they brought a truckload of ice cubes and distributed to the people -- for free," said Ali Laith, 19, a tall, slim student. Later in the day, shops reopened and residents ventured onto the streets.

But at 7:55 p.m., a mortar shell struck the parking lot with the battered old cars less than 100 yards from the Sadr office. It landed on a rusting Volkswagen Passat, witnesses said, killing an elderly man and a child, and wounding others.

"There are some people who don't like for things to be quiet in Tobji," said Abu Ahmed, a shopkeeper whose store was less than 200 yards from where the shell hit. He asked that his full name not be used because of the potential for more violence.

That night, six Egheidat elders visited the Mahdi Army's representatives to assure them they were not behind the attack.Day Nine

At 10:40 a.m., Nabil Ibrahim was open for business. Two women in black abayas and a girl were in his store. Did he think Tobji would slide back into violence?

"It's in God's hands, inshallah ," Ibrahim said. As he spoke, Haidar Muhammad Latif, 22, entered the store. He was short, with close-cropped hair, and wore a blue shirt. And he soon revealed his allegiance: "We are from Sayyid Moqtada Sadr's army," he said, using an honorific for the cleric.

He asserted that the mortar attack had targeted the militia and proclaimed "God is great" because the mortar did not hit the Sadr office. Asked who was behind the attack, he answered without hesitation. "I expect it was the Egheidat who did it," he said. "I wish I could trust them."

Two blocks away, a funeral tent was erected next to the parking lot.Day 10

On this day, Abu Mohammed, still angry, was thinking about revenge. He, too, believed the Egheidat had fired the mortar two days before. But now he had a more pressing goal. He said he and his comrades had identified three Sunnis, including one Egheidat, who they believed were involved in the killings of the four members of the Mahdi Army, including his nephew. Now, he said, he was planning to create a death squad to carry out the justice the tribal negotiations didn't bring.

Asked how he knew the three men were guilty, Abu Mohammed said witnesses told him that the men were inside one of the cars that rushed the checkpoint. "We only take blood for blood," he said.

Asked if the three men lived in Tobji, Abu Mohammed replied: "Yes, they are our neighbors. Now their houses are empty, and they have fled."

Most Iraqis Favor Immediate U.S. Pullout, Polls Show (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Leaders' Views Out of Step With Public

BAGHDAD, Sept. 26 -- A strong majority of Iraqis want U.S.-led military forces to immediately withdraw from the country, saying their swift departure would make Iraq more secure and decrease sectarian violence, according to new polls by the State Department and independent researchers.

In Baghdad, for example, nearly three-quarters of residents polled said they would feel safer if U.S. and other foreign forces left Iraq, with 65 percent of those asked favoring an immediate pullout, according to State Department polling results obtained by The Washington Post.

Another new poll, scheduled to be released on Wednesday by the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland, found that 71 percent of Iraqis questioned want the Iraqi government to ask foreign forces to depart within a year. By large margins, though, Iraqis believed that the U.S. government would refuse the request, with 77 percent of those polled saying the United States intends keep permanent military bases in the country.

The stark assessments, among the most negative attitudes toward U.S.-led forces since they invaded Iraq in 2003, contrast sharply with views expressed by the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Last week at the United Nations, President Jalal Talabani said coalition troops should remain in the country until Iraqi security forces are "capable of putting an end to terrorism and maintaining stability and security."

"Only then will it be possible to talk about a timetable for the withdrawal of the multinational forces from Iraq," he said.

"Majorities in all regions except Kurdish areas state that the Multi-National Force-Iraq (MNF-I) should withdraw immediately, adding that the MNF-I's departure would make them feel safer and decrease violence," concludes the 20-page State Department report, titled "Iraq Civil War Fears Remain High in Sunni and Mixed Areas." The report was based on 1,870 face-to-face interviews conducted from June 26 to July 6.

The Program on International Policy Attitudes poll, which was conducted over the first three days of September for WorldPublicOpinion.org, found that support among Sunnis for a withdrawal of all U.S.-led forces within six months dropped to 57 percent in September from 83 percent in January.

"There is a kind of softening of Sunni attitudes toward the U.S.," said Steven Kull, director of PIPA and editor of WorldPublicOpinion.org. "But you can't go so far as to say the majority of Sunnis don't want the U.S. out. They do. They're just not quite in the same hurry as they were before."

The PIPA poll, which has a margin of error of 3 percent, was carried out by Iraqis in all 18 provinces who conducted interviews with more than 1,000 randomly selected Iraqis in their homes.

Using complex sampling methods based on data from Iraq's Planning Ministry, the pollsters selected streets to conduct interviews. They then contacted every third house on the left side of the road. When they selected a home, the interviewers then collected the names and birth dates of everyone who lived there and polled the person with the most recent birthday.

Matthew Warshaw, a senior research manager at D3 Systems, which helped conduct the poll, said he didn't think Iraqis were any less likely to share their true opinions with pollsters than Americans. "It's a concern you run up against in Iowa or in Iraq," he said. "But for the most part we're asking questions that people want to give answers to. People want to have their voice heard." The greatest risk, he said, was the safety of the interviewers. Two pollsters for another Iraqi firm were recently killed because of their work.

The State Department report did not give a detailed methodology for its poll, which it said was carried out by an unnamed Iraqi polling firm. Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said he could not comment on the public opinion surveys.

The director of another Iraqi polling firm, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he feared being killed, said public opinion surveys he conducted last month showed that 80 percent of Iraqis who were questioned favored an immediate withdrawal. Eight-five percent of Sunnis in that poll supported an immediate withdrawal, a number virtually unchanged in the past two years, except for the two months after the Samarra bombing, when the number fell to about 70 percent, the poll director said.

"The very fact that there is such a low support for American forces has to do with the American failure to do basically anything for Iraqis," said Mansoor Moaddel, a professor of sociology at Eastern Michigan University, who commissioned a poll earlier this year that also found widespread support for a withdrawal. "It's part of human nature. People respect authority and power. But the U.S. so far has been unable to establish any real authority."

Interviews with two dozen Baghdad residents in recent weeks suggest one central cause for Iraqi distrust of the Americans: They believe the U.S. government has deliberately thrown the country into chaos.

The most common theory heard on the streets of Baghdad is that the American military is creating a civil war to create an excuse to keep its forces here.

"Do you really think it's possible that America -- the greatest country in the world -- cannot manage a small country like this?" Mohammad Ali, 42, an unemployed construction worker, said as he sat in his friend's electronics shop on a recent afternoon. "No! They have not made any mistakes. They brought people here to destroy Iraq, not to build Iraq."

As he drew on a cigarette and two other men in the store nodded in agreement, Ali said the U.S. government was purposely depriving the Iraqi people of electricity, water, gasoline and security, to name just a few of the things that most people in this country lack.

"They could fix everything in one hour if they wanted!" he said, jabbing his finger in the air for emphasis.

Mohammed Kadhem al-Dulaimi, 54, a Sunni Arab who used to be a professional soccer player, said he thought the United States was creating chaos in the country as a pretext to stay in Iraq as long as it has stayed in Germany.

"All bad things that are happening in Iraq are just because of the Americans," he said, sipping a tiny cup of sweet tea in a cafe. "When should they leave? As soon as possible. Every Iraqi will tell you this."

Many Iraqi political leaders, on the other hand, have been begging the Americans to stay, especially since the February bombing of a Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra, which touched off the current round of sectarian reprisal killings between Sunnis and Shiites.

The most dramatic about-face came from Sunni leaders, initially some of the staunchest opponents to the U.S. occupation, who said coalition forces were the only buffer preventing Shiite militias from slaughtering Sunnis.

Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the outspoken Sunni speaker of parliament who this summer said that "the U.S. occupation is the work of butchers," now supports the U.S. military staying in Iraq for as long as a decade.

"Don't let them go before they have corrected what they have done," he said in an interview this month. "They should stay for four years. This is the minimum. Maybe 10 years."

Particularly in mixed neighborhoods here in the capital, some Sunnis say the departure of U.S. forces could trigger a genocide. Hameed al-Kassi, 24, a recent college graduate who lives in the Yarmouk district of Baghdad, worried that rampages by Shiite militias could cause "maybe 60 to 70 percent of the Sunnis to be killed, even the women, old and the young."

"There will be lakes of blood," Kassi said. "Of course we want the Americans to leave, but if they do, it will be a great disaster for us."

In a barbershop in the capital's Karrada district Tuesday afternoon, a group of men discussed some of the paradoxical Iraqi opinions of coalition troops. They recognized that the departure of U.S.-led forces could trigger more violence, and yet they harbored deep-rooted anger toward the Americans.

"I really don't like the Americans who patrol on the street. They should all go away," said a young boy as he swept up hair on the shop's floor. "But I do like the one who guards my church. He should stay!"

Sitting in a neon-orange chair as he waited for a haircut, Firas Adnan, a 27-year-old music student, said, "I really don't know what I want. If the Americans leave right now, there is going to be a massacre in Iraq. But if they don't leave, there will be more problems. From my point of view, though, it would be better for them to go out today than tomorrow."

He paused for a moment, then said, "We just want to go back and live like we did before."

Saddam's Trial Has Shouting, Then He Is Removed (MCT)

By Mark Brunswick

McClatchy Newspapers, September 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - For the second time in as many days in his genocide and war crimes trial, former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was ordered tossed from the courtroom on Tuesday, sparking an eruption from the other defendants and briefly shutting down the court.

"You let the prosecutor comment and I'm not? Is this the justice you exercise? Damn this justice you are trying to serve in this court," Saddam shouted at the chief judge, the second to preside over the trial since it began in August.

"Don't use bad words," the judge shouted back, ordering guards to surround Saddam and escort him out of the courtroom.

Two other defendants were led out of the courtroom after Saddam, who barely concealed a smile on his face as he made his way to the door.

Saddam and his six co-defendants have been on trial since Aug. 21 for their roles in a 1987-1988 crackdown on Kurdish rebels that has become known as the Anfal campaign, a reference to a verse in the Quran meaning roughly "the spoils of war."

They are accused of killing as many 180,000 people, mostly civilians in a military offensive that included the use of chemical weapons. The defendants could face the death penalty if convicted.

Saddam was ordered removed from the trial on Monday when he protested the court's appointment of lawyers to defend him. His own defense team boycotted the proceedings as a protest over the appointment of Mohammed Oreibi al Khalifa as the presiding judge.

The latest exchange, watched on television by entertainment-deprived Iraqis like it was a morning soap opera, fueled rumors that Khalifa might soon be sacked and a third judge appointed. While no one was claiming to be pining for the days of Saddam's regime, it also seemed to give the average Iraqi a brief in-your-face respite to the sectarian violence and lack of services that make up today's Iraq.

Things started rocky on Tuesday when Saddam entered the court and immediately asked to leave. Khalifa began a long speech, talking about the Iraqi justice system and how it was developed over centuries.

"If you want to defend yourself, submit your arguments. We are a court. It has no connection to politics. When you want to leave the legal framework, we will not allow you," he said. "Try to cope with the session requirements and you will see how much time you will get to defend yourself. Humiliation and abuse of the court will take you nowhere."

At that point, Saddam pulled a piece of paper from his Quran and began reading. The judge ordered microphones turned off as Saddam continued reading for 14 minutes. After the reading, the judge and Saddam exchanged what appeared to be often heated words toward each other, each pointing fingers and shaking fists.

Saddam stood up during testimony of the second witness of the day, a Sulaimaniyah resident in his mid-60s who talked of having his village destroyed in the Anfal campaign. Khalifa asked him if he had a question. Saddam said he did not.

"OK, sit down," the judge ordered. That started the fireworks.

"You are a defendant and I'm a judge," Khalifa said as Saddam interrupted. "Shut up. No one talk. The court has decided to eject Saddam Hussein from court."

As Saddam was led from the room, the other defendants, almost on cue, stood and demanded to leave as well. The judge ordered them to sit, but they refused. "I don't how to deal with you," the judge shouted.

Defendant Sultan Hashim Ahmad al Tai a former defense minister, shouted back in anger, "Don't shout at us. We are not children. We defended this country. It is not you who is teaching us to be polite. We are teaching you."

At that point, he was escorted out, continuing to yell.

The next, Hussein Rashid Mohammed, a former chief of staff of the Iraqi Army, said: "I served Iraq for 44 years. If you want to execute us, execute us. You can't insult us with these charges. We have dignity." He was removed, with two guards very physically holding both his arms.

The other defendants remained standing as guards surrounded their cages in the courtroom. The judge ordered the curtains to the press gallery closed and a recess. When the afternoon session resumed, the defendants' cages were empty. The court recessed until Oct. 9.

Judge Postpones Hussein Trial As Lawyers Continue Boycott (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 26 — After throwing Saddam Hussein out of court again, the judge hearing the deposed dictator's genocide trial abruptly postponed the case until Oct. 9, so Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants could consult with lawyers who are boycotting the trial or find new ones.

The court session on Tuesday degenerated into a shouting match with the angry judge, Muhammad al-Uraibi, barking at Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants to "sit down" and "shut up." The men, charged with killing tens of thousands of Kurds in 1988, shouted back that the judge was not respecting them and had already decided their guilt.

The trial of Mr. Hussein has been in turmoil for a week, since Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki fired the previous judge, who prosecutors had complained was biased in favor of the defendants. In protest, defense lawyers have been boycotting the trial.

After Judge Uraibi ejected Mr. Hussein from the courtroom on Tuesday, the other defendants rose in anger, and the judge demanded: "Shut up. Nobody talk."

After more testimony, the judge said he would postpone the case for nearly two weeks.

Elsewhere, insurgents and militiamen across central Iraq attacked mosques, police officers and, with one large blast, lunchtime diners who the police said had apparently been singled out because they could be seen eating in a public place during the Ramadan fast.

All told, news agencies reported that more than 20 people were killed in or around the capital. An Interior Ministry official also said 15 new dead bodies were discovered in Baghdad, the latest victims in the capital's continuing violence.

On Monday morning, insurgents staged a coordinated attack with mortars and a car bomb on a newly opened police station in northern Babil Province, south of the capital, killing at least two Iraqi police officers and wounding four policemen.

The attack on the Jurf al-Sakhr police station, which opened earlier this month at a cost of $440,000, began when a white car drove through the gates of the station and then exploded when it rammed the northwest corner of the building, the United States military said.

Other insurgents simultaneously attacked guard towers nearby with machine guns and mortars. Eight American soldiers suffered minor wounds but were returned to duty, the military said.

In Baghdad, the attacks began early Tuesday. At 7 a.m., gunmen used explosives to severely damage a Sunni mosque in the southeastern part of the city, the Interior Ministry said.

Shortly before noon, a motorcycle packed with explosives detonated near Communist Party offices and a restaurant in central Baghdad. Four people were killed and 18 wounded, all of whom had been at or near the restaurant, an Interior Ministry official said.

Clashes raged in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Amil, killing at least three people. Two bombs exploded in Mahmudiya, south of Baghdad, killing five people and wounding eight. Two American soldiers also died in what the military described as a "noncombat incident" southwest of Baghdad on Tuesday. No other details were provided.

In the heavily fortified Green Zone, Iraqi lawmakers shouted at one another as debate proceeded over how quickly to allow provinces to become autonomous states.

Sunni political leaders had agreed to allow a bill, defining how these states would be formed, to come up for debate this week. The bill is backed by a large faction of Shiites and Kurds, but is opposed by many Sunnis, who say it will strip them of a share of the country's oil wealth.

In return for Sunnis' agreeing to a debate, the Shiite and Kurdish factions agreed to the creation of a constitutional committee to examine amendments sought by Sunnis, and to postpone any actual move toward autonomous regions until at least 2008.

But a number of Sunni legislators made it clear on Tuesday that they would fight the proposal no matter what. One top Sunni legislator, Dhafir al-Ani, quit in protest as chairman of the committee scheduled to hear the proposal.

Inquiry: Australian Wheat Exporter Warned (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia — Australian wheat exporter AWB Ltd. was repeatedly warned by lawyers that funneling money to Saddam Hussein's regime could be illegal and breach U.N. sanctions on Iraq, according to evidence released by a corruption inquiry Tuesday.

The documents, released by a government-commissioned inquiry into the kickbacks scandal, contradicted testimony by company executives that the monopoly exporter, formerly the government-owned Australian Wheat Board, did not knowingly pay $222 million in bribes to the Iraq government under the corruption-riddled U.N. oil-for-food program.

The documents are among 900 that AWB fought to withhold from the inquiry headed by retired judge Terrence Cole.

But the Federal Court ruled last week that 360 of those documents must be handed to the Cole commission because they are not protected by legal professional privilege.

The commission is examining whether company officials broke any Australian laws when AWB paid bogus transport fees for wheat to a Jordanian trucking company partially owned by the Iraqi government.

Under U.N. sanctions against Iraq, companies were banned from making payments to the Iraqi government.

Legal advice from the Australian corporate law firm Blake Dawson Waldron, as well as top barristers, between 2003 and 2005 warned AWB the payments were questionable, documents revealed.

In mid 2003 when American wheat exporters were claiming AWB was inflating its wheat prices for Iraq in breach of the U.N. oil-for-food program rules, AWB's in-house legal team set up an inquiry, known as Project Rose.

As part of that inquiry, Blake Dawson Waldron warned AWB "it is possible" the trucking fees AWB was paying the trucking company Alia breached Australian federal and state criminal laws.

The law firm said it appeared "in a broad sense" AWB paid the trucking fees to influence the Iraqi Grain Board, which was owned by Saddam's government.

"It is possible that AWB's conduct has resulted in a contravention by Australia of U.N. resolution 986 (1995)," the advice added.

AWB was the largest single supplier of humanitarian goods under the oil-for-food program. From 1997-2003, the company sold 6.8 million tons of wheat to Iraq and received payments from the U.N. of more than $2.3 billion.

West Point Mourns A Font Of Energy, Laid To Rest By War (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Lonnae O'Neal Parker

WEST POINT, N.Y., Sept. 26 -- They remember Emily Perez in her many bursts of motion: the diminutive young woman calling out orders to the freshman cadets on the castled military campus of West Point.

They see her sprinting the third leg for Army's 400-meter relay team. Or in the school's gospel choir, filling her lungs and opening her mouth to sing.

Emily J.T. Perez, a determined 23-year-old from Prince George's County, rose to the top of her high school class and then became the first minority female command sergeant in the history of the U.S. Military Academy.

Now she has another distinction. The second lieutenant was buried Tuesday at the academy, the first female graduate of West Point to die in Iraq. Perez, a platoon leader, was killed while patrolling southern Iraq near Najaf on Sept. 12 when a roadside bomb exploded under her Humvee.

And at the service on the high bluffs along the Hudson River, her former fellow cadets, the younger women who looked up to Perez and now are preparing to follow her path, were still learning from her.

"The fact that she's died -- it makes what's going on in the Middle [East] . . . so much more real. I mean, here at West Point, it's kind of like Camelot, you know -- everything just seems to work," Sylvia Amegashie, 21, of Woodbridge, co-captain of West Point's track team, said as she stood on the cemetery grass, holding back tears. "What happened to her, being out there in Iraq, it's real. Her death really makes everything seem more like it's going to happen."

"For me, yeah, like, it's just an eye-opener," agreed Meghan Venable-Thomas, 21, a senior who also ran track and sang in the choir with Perez, who graduated last year. "She was like a little superwoman . . . so full of energy and life, and she was just willing to do anything."

Perez was born into a military family in Heidelberg, Germany, and moved to Fort Washington in 1998. A woman repeatedly described as focused, tenacious and passionate, she was an avid reader from a young age and eventually finished near the top of her class at Oxon Hill High School. From early on, she wanted to be a soldier, her friends recalled, and she became wing commander of Junior ROTC at Oxon Hill.

"She was the cream of the crop," said Nathaniel Laney, Perez's high school track coach and now assistant principal at Oxon Hill. "This wasn't some average Joe."

Her nickname was Kobe, family friend E. Faith Bell said, because everyone knew she could make the shots, in whatever she did.

While in high school, working with the District's Peace Baptist Church, Perez helped begin an HIV-AIDS ministry after family members contracted the virus.

One of her mentors, Roger Pollard, who worked with her when she volunteered with the Alexandria Red Cross HIV-AIDS peer education program, recalled her remarkable ability to stay focused -- always on time, always ready to work. She shared with other teenagers her stories about people close to her living with the depression and stigma of AIDS.

"She was sensitive to the suffering of others" but tough-minded, Pollard said. "I clearly remember thinking that she would definitely be the first female president of this country."

After graduating from West Point, she was assigned to the Army's 204th Support Battalion, 2nd Brigade, 4th Infantry Division and deployed to Iraq in December. Before she left, she spoke with Laney, her high school track coach. He gave her a journal to write everything down when she wanted to clear her head.

"She was like, 'I'll be okay. Don't worry about me.' That was just the confidence she had in herself," he said.

Her godfather, the pastor of Peace Baptist Church, remembered that same time in Perez's life.

"She was resilient. Her spirit was calm. She was resolute. She believed . . . the real tragedy is to not live while you are alive," said the Rev. Michael Bell, Faith Bell's husband.

She was the 64th female member of the U.S. military to be killed in Iraq or Afghanistan and the 40th West Point graduate killed since Sept. 11, 2001. Another female West Point graduate, Laura M. Walker of the Class of 2003, was killed in Afghanistan last year.

Her family chose to hold the funeral at West Point because of Perez's reverence for the institution that challenged her physically and mentally, Michael Bell said.

At the cemetery, in a quiet corner of campus beneath Storm King Mountain, the warm September sun glinted off the silver tubas of the marching band and lighted the rustling leaves' various shades of flame.

Dozens of uniformed men and women gathered in the crowd: West Point's track team, its gospel choir, former classmates and fellow soldiers. When the hearse pulled up to Perez's grave site -- in Section 36, near those of several other young graduates -- the crowd saluted the flag-draped coffin in near perfect unison.

The family, including parents Vicki and Daniel Perez, sat on 10 folding chairs under a small tent facing the coffin, daubing their eyes.

"Honor guard! Attention!"

The guard assembled around the coffin.

"Do not stand at my grave and weep, I am not there, I do not sleep," Michael Bell read from a poem. "I am a thousand winds that blow. I am the diamond glint of snow. I am the sunlight on ripened grain. I am the gentle autumn rain."

"In your short time here, you stood the watch with duty, with honor," he said. "Your work on earth is done."

Five guns fired in unison three times. The bugler and the drummer played taps. The bagpiper wailed "Amazing Grace." The marching band finished with the "Alma Mater."

After it was over, Faith Bell reflected on what Perez will be remembered for.

"Her tenacity," Bell said. "Her passion for life. One of the things that was important to Emily was not the fear of death but the fear of not living."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron's Fastow To Serve 6 Years (LAT)

By Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

HOUSTON — A federal judge sentenced former Enron Corp. Chief Financial Officer Andrew S. Fastow to six years in prison Tuesday for his role in running the fraudulent, off-the-books dealings that brought down the company while he made millions.

But the judge stopped short of the maximum term, citing Fastow's contrition and his cooperation with the government.

In 2004 Fastow had agreed to serve as long as 10 years in exchange for testifying against the former top executives of the fallen energy company. U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt said that although Fastow was once "drunk on the wine of greed," he has since demonstrated remorse by fully cooperating with government and civil lawyers in lawsuits against Enron.

"These factors call for mercy," the judge said.

Fastow's sentencing turns another page in the saga of Enron, which came to symbolize the wave of corporate accounting scandals of this decade. One of the bosses he testified against, former Chief Executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, will be sentenced on fraud and conspiracy charges next month.

And the same day Fastow was led off in handcuffs and shackles, former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard J. Ebbers reported to federal prison to begin serving a 25-year term for leading a massive accounting fraud.

Hoyt imposed no fine in meting out his sentence to Fastow, noting that under terms of the plea agreement he had already forfeited $23.8 million and pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy. Hoyt sentenced Fastow to two years of supervised release upon completing his prison term. The judge recommended a minimum-security prison for Fastow, as well as drug treatment for the anti-anxiety medication he has been taking.

Fastow, 44, hugged his wife, Lea, a former Enron executive who had done prison time for tax fraud, before he was handcuffed by marshals and led from the courtroom.

His departure ended an emotional hearing punctuated by sobs from his family and friends who packed the courtroom. A parade of lawyers spoke in favor of a reduced sentence, all noting Fastow's willingness to lay out Enron's fraudulent deals in excruciating detail. In addressing the court, he paused often to maintain his composure.

"When I pled guilty I was consumed by despair and shame by what I had done," Fastow said, his voice cracking. "I know I deserve punishment. I accept it without bitterness."

Federal prosecutor John C. Hueston said no one "has cooperated more thoroughly and extensively than Mr. Fastow." Without his assistance, Hueston said, the government would not have obtained convictions against Skilling and the late Kenneth L. Lay, the company's founder and longtime chairman.

Fastow's attorney, John Keker, said that Scott D. Sullivan, the former WorldCom chief financial officer in a "parallel situation" to Fastow's, received a five-year sentence for his crimes.

"Nobody is asking he not get any punishment," Keker said of his client. Instead, he asked Hoyt to show mercy to a man "disgusted" with his deeds and "desperate to make amends."

Investor Brian Durbin was the only person to speak against reducing Fastow's sentence. When he bought a few thousand dollars of Enron stock, he said, the company appeared to be in prime financial health. But when Enron collapsed, he watched with growing resentment as friends lost their jobs and retirement savings.

"I'm here to convey my personal anger at the management of Enron," Durbin said, looking at Fastow, who returned his gaze. "We were the victims of a scam."

Former Enron employee Tracy Michel, when told of the sentencing, said Fastow should have gotten a longer sentence.

"It's not enough. He got off easy," she said. "But so much time has passed, I guess they hoped people will forgive and forget and move on. I'm sure he's humiliated, so hopefully this is hitting him hard."

Fastow's sentence was fair, given his willingness to cooperate with prosecutors, said Barry Boss, a Washington-based white-collar defense attorney. "People have lost perspective on how long six years is," said Boss, former co-chairman of the U.S. Sentencing Commission's Practitioners Advisory Group.

The sentence could open the door for Skilling to say he should get similar consideration, Boss said.

"Skilling's lawyers may argue that Fastow is the most culpable party. But they tried to play this card before and the jury didn't believe it," he said.

Said Anthony Sabino, professor of law and business at St. John's University in New York: "The sentence will have no effect on Skilling's sentencing. Jeff Skilling is going away for a long, long time."

Tuesday's 75-minute hearing capped a four-year legal battle for Fastow, a Northwestern University business school graduate once regarded as a talented, hard-charging comer.

Federal indictments handed down in October 2002 took a different view of the brash executive and the complex financial deals that set him apart. From 1997 to July 2001, prosecutors said, Fastow engineered a complex series of "clandestine transactions" that hid staggering Enron debt, inflated profit and diverted millions of dollars to himself, his family and his friends.

As the fraudulent partnerships began to unravel, Enron stock collapsed. In December 2001, the company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

In 2002, Fastow was indicted on 78 counts of fraud, money laundering, insider trading and other charges. He pleaded not guilty but changed his mind after the government brought charges against his wife for signing a tax return that failed to declare her husband's improperly pocketed gains as income. Lea Fastow, a former Enron assistant treasurer, served a one-year sentence. The couple sought to stagger their prison time so that one parent could remain with their two sons.

In March, Fastow testified against Lay and Skilling at their federal fraud trial. Both defendants were convicted in May. Lay died of a heart attack in July. Skilling is to be sentenced Oct. 23.

Enron's Fastow Gets 6 Years (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

HOUSTON, Sept. 26 -- Andrew S. Fastow, the finance chief who helped Enron Corp. mislead investors at the same time he stole millions of dollars from the company, was sentenced Tuesday to six years in prison by a judge who said Fastow deserved mercy because of "exceptional" government cooperation and the toll on his family.

U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt significantly discounted the 10-year prison term spelled out in Fastow's plea deal with the Justice Department two years ago. The judge said that Fastow, 44, had been "the subject of great persecution," including threats and religious slurs, as the primary scapegoat for an accounting fraud that cost thousands of employees of the Houston energy company their jobs and retirement savings.

Disclosures nearly five years ago about Fastow's questionable business partnerships foreshadowed not only Enron's bankruptcy but also a string of corporate fraud cases across the country. Federal prosecutors said Tuesday that the Enron debacle remained the largest such investigation in history and that Fastow's help unlocked the case, giving them a priceless window onto the 50th floor of the company's gleaming office tower.

The judge acknowledged Fastow's efforts to repair the harm he has done. Fastow's wife, Lea, who sometimes nodded along with the judge's remarks, already served nearly a year in prison after pleading guilty to underreporting the couple's income. Criminal charges against Lea Fastow helped pressure her husband to cooperate with investigators.

"Seldom does a man's public fall cause an equally public fall for his wife," the judge said.

Rejecting a request that Fastow remain free until next month to assist shareholders pursuing a lawsuit against banks that are accused of helping Enron conceal its debt, Hoyt nonetheless allowed the couple a few moments to embrace before a U.S. marshal cuffed Fastow's hands behind his back. Until the Bureau of Prisons decides where Fastow will serve his term for the two conspiracy counts, he will spend his days in Houston's high-security federal detention center, the same place his wife served the bulk of her sentence.

Clad in a gray suit, white shirt and dark tie, a withered, snowy-haired Fastow showed none of the blinding confidence he wore with pride in the years before Enron collapsed. During the 1990s, Fastow reaped awards and collected tens of millions of dollars in salary and bonuses for engineering the company's unflagging revenue growth.

But the past five years have taken a personal and physical toll. Struggling to keep his composure, Fastow walked slowly into the 11th-floor courtroom crowded with more than two dozen friends and relatives, including his parents, in-laws and brother, who sat in the front row. The judge recommended that Fastow be placed in a residential drug treatment program administered by prison officials, to help wean him from the undisclosed substances he used to mask his anxiety.

In the most emotional moment of the proceeding, Fastow broke down as he apologized to employees and shareholders, including one who told the judge he bought Enron stock as a "no-brainer" investment. Fastow pivoted to speak directly to Brian Durbin, an engineer whose wife worked at Enron and who lost money when the company filed for bankruptcy protection in December 2001: "To Mr. Durbin especially, and to all the victims, I apologize to you. I wish I could undo what I did at Enron, but I can't."

Earlier, Durbin expressed anger and condemned the company's leaders for engaging in an "elaborate scam, if not outright theft."

"When theft and fraud occur from within the company, what chance does an investor have?" Durbin asked.

Hoyt said he received letters from about a dozen others who wrote about the loss of their jobs or insurance policies, difficulties in supporting their children, and "the bankruptcy of spirit that has entered their lives." One unidentified former employee wrote that he is working three part-time jobs to replace his tattered retirement savings account. "I'm not guilty of anything, but my sentence will be longer than Fastow's," the former employee wrote.

The substantial reduction in Fastow's sentence underscores the importance of insiders, who can help prosecutors unravel complex business cases. Fastow was sentenced the same day WorldCom Inc. founder Bernard J. Ebbers reported to a Louisiana prison to serve a 25-year sentence. With time off for good behavior and the successful completion of the drug rehabilitation program, Fastow could cut more than a year from his sentence.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston said Tuesday that without 1,000 hours of briefings and "unflappable, remarkably consistent" testimony by Fastow, the government never would have been able to convict former Enron chief executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay in a fraud trial that ended earlier this year.

Lay, whose lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, scowled at Fastow from a seat in the jury box Tuesday, died of heart disease in July. Skilling faces decades in prison when he is sentenced Oct. 23.

The Fastows -- who have two sons, ages 8 and 11 -- and their relatives have already forfeited nearly $30 million to the government, and their lawyer, John W. Keker, said the couple "will be living in a barrel if these civil cases continue." Fastow on Tuesday pledged to help shareholder lawyers recover even more money from companies that he says helped Enron manipulate its financial reports. In recent weeks, Fastow has spent hundreds of hours guiding them through the company's byzantine business partnerships.

"Man cannot earn mercy," the judge said, reading from prepared remarks. "It comes to a man who is shipwrecked, whose back has been broken . . . who finds himself in a conspiracy of circumstances."

Rabbi Shaul Osadchey, who married the Fastows and who appeared at the courthouse with them Tuesday, told reporters that he had spoken to Fastow a day earlier. "I think he felt he was ready to be sentenced, that he was ready to move on and see an end to this."

Fastow Gets Six Years As Judge Calls For Mercy (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And John M. Biers

Andrew Fastow, Enron Corp.'s former chief financial officer and a central figure in the scandal at the fallen energy giant, received a surprisingly lenient sentence of six years in prison followed by two years of community service.

The sentence, handed down in a Houston federal court by Judge Kenneth Hoyt, was significantly less than the 10 years of imprisonment that had been envisioned in the 2004 plea agreement between Mr. Fastow and federal prosecutors, who were investigating Enron following its December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy proceedings. The lower sentence apparently reflects the extensive cooperation the 44-year-old Mr. Fastow provided to government investigators following his plea agreement. Under federal rules, the determination of a sentence is up to a judge.

Judge Hoyt ordered Mr. Fastow be immediately taken into custody yesterday.

Mr. Fastow was a major prosecution witness in the criminal trial this year in Houston federal court of Kenneth Lay, Enron's former chairman, and Jeffrey Skilling, its former president. Both men were convicted in May of conspiracy and fraud charges. Mr. Lay died of heart-related problems in July. Mr. Skilling is scheduled to be sentenced on Oct. 23 in Houston by Judge Sim Lake. Observers believe Mr. Skilling could receive a sentence of about 20 years.

Some found the reduced sentence for Mr. Fastow troubling. "I was very surprised," said Leslie Caldwell, the original director of the special Justice Department task force that investigated the Enron scandal. Ms. Caldwell, who is currently a partner with Morgan, Lewis & Bockius in New York, said the 10-year sentence included in the 2004 plea deal contemplated that he would provide full cooperation. In return for that cooperation and his pleading guilty to two felony counts, the government dropped a 98-count indictment against Mr. Fastow that could have sent him to prison for 20 years.

At yesterday's sentencing hearing, prosecutor John Hueston described Mr. Fastow's cooperation as a "key breakthrough" in the probe. Mr. Fastow was "critical" to winning the convictions of Messrs. Lay and Skilling, said Mr. Hueston, who was one of the three lead prosecutors in that trial.

Mr. Fastow also received robust praise from plaintiffs attorneys representing the University of California and other investors in civil litigation against financial institutions that helped to created some of Enron's most controversial deals. They said Mr. Fastow had provided helpful information about some of those dealings, including a 25-page declaration that he signed just Monday. But plaintiffs attorneys were unsuccessful in requesting that Mr. Fastow's prison sentence be delayed until next month, so he could be deposed.

In his written declaration, Mr. Fastow said several of Enron's bankers helped to devise structures that they knew "created the false appearance" of financial health at the company. Mr. Fastow added that he and other Enron executives had provided assurances to the financial institutions of a guaranteed return in certain transactions. Such a guarantee can nullify the legitimacy of a deal for financial accounting purposes and leave the participants open to criminal charges.

The statements in Mr. Fastow's declaration are similar to conclusions reached previously by others. For instance, a 2003 report by a court-appointed examiner in the Enron bankruptcy proceeding said there was evidence that major financial institutions had knowingly "aided and abetted" company executives in transactions aimed at manipulating the energy giant's financial results.

A person familiar with the Enron criminal investigation said the information in the Fastow declaration has long been known to federal investigators and isn't viewed as likely to produce any new criminal charges. In late 2004, four former Merrill Lynch & Co. officials were convicted of conspiracy and fraud in a Houston federal court in connection with a 1999 deal involving the sale of some Enron electricity barges. Those convictions were recently overturned on appeal.

When he addressed the court yesterday at his sentencing hearing, Mr. Fastow, his voice cracking, said: "I wish I could undo the harm I caused," adding, "I am trying to be the best person I can be going forward."

Judge Hoyt noted that Enron's collapse had caused widespread damage. Thousands of company employees were laid off and billions of dollars were wiped out as Enron's stock fell to zero. Nonetheless, Mr. Fastow's cooperation, along with his very public fall from grace, "calls for mercy" in sentencing, Judge Hoyt said.

Mr. Fastow has been a much vilified figure. While Enron's chief financial officer, he also ran and partly owned two private partnerships, known as LJM1 and LJM2, which prosecutors subsequently identified as major tools for illegally manipulating the company's financial statements.

Coincidentally, former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers also started his incarceration yesterday. The 65-year-old Mr. Ebbers reported to a federal prison in Oakdale, La., to begin serving a 25-year sentence for his role in the $11 billion accounting fraud at the telecommunications giant. Mr. Ebbers was convicted by a jury in New York federal court last year of securities fraud and other crimes. He had remained free pending an appeal that was recently turned down by one higher court. His attorney has said Mr. Ebbers will continue to appeal.

Fastow Gets Lighter Prison Sentence Of Six Years (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, September 27, 2006

Andrew Fastow, designer of the infamous accounting tricks that destroyed former energy giant Enron, was sentenced Tuesday to a six-year prison term.

DOJ_NMG_0069767

The sentence was lighter than the 10-year term the former chief financial officer of Enron agreed to in 2004. Fastow pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit wire fraud and securities fraud and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors to build a case against other executives.

The judge, U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt, said Fastow deserved a more lenient punishment because he and his family had suffered enough. Fastow has turned over nearly $30 million in cash and property. "Prosecution is appropriate, but persecution is not," Hoyt said.

Fastow, 44, who also is barred from serving as an officer or director of a public company, could shave a year from his prison term by joining a drug-treatment program. The judge recommended Fastow to serve at the federal prison in Bastrop, Texas, followed by a two-year probation.

"I'm ashamed of what I did," a crying Fastow said in court. "I wish I could undo what I did at Enron, but I can't. I understand that I deserve punishment."

Fastow's wife, Lea, served a year in jail for not reporting the income received from his Enron partnerships. The toll on the family factored into the judge's sentencing. "Your family has taken a particularly acrimonious hit," Hoyt said. "That calls for mercy."

Enron lingers as one of the biggest frauds in U.S. history. The energy company had been worth more than $68 billion. Its failure wiped out the savings and retirement funds of thousands of employees who also lost their jobs.

Some were surprised Fastow's sentence was reduced. "Enron was such a notorious fraud," says Michael Perino, professor at St. John's University School of Law.

But the sentencing decision speaks to how the judge was convinced Fastow has already suffered, says Bill O'Neill, partner at Latham & Watkins. "All of us are surprised by this, but not all of us are sitting where the judge is sitting," he says. "If someone is honestly contrite, and an experienced judge sees contrition, he will grant leniency."

Meanwhile, in a sign of the legal battles still to come, Fastow said in a filing Tuesday as part of an investors' securities-fraud case that Enron banks Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, Royal Bank of Scotland (RBS), Deutsche Bank and Barclays all knew of his schemes. Merrill, Credit Suisse and Deutsche declined comment.

Spokeswoman Carolyn McAdam said RBS will defend itself vigorously. David Braff, lawyer for Barclays at Sullivan & Cromwell, called the credibility of Fastow's filing "highly suspect."

Enron's Fastow Is Sentenced To Six Years In Jail (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

HOUSTON, Sept. 26 — In a courtroom crowded with teary family and friends, Enron's former chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, was sentenced to six years in jail today for his role in the collapse of what was once the world's largest energy company.

He will serve two additional years at home under court supervision. The total sentence of eight years is two years less than the maximum provided in his plea agreement with government prosecutors.

Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt of the Federal District Court in Houston set the sentence after three lawyers representing Enron shareholders said Mr. Fastow, who pleaded guilty to two counts of wire and securities fraud in 2004, was a crucial witness in their cases against several banks that allegedly participated in fraudulent deals to conceal Enron's massive debt.

While thousands of people lost their jobs and savings when the company declared bankruptcy in 2001, only one disgruntled investor appeared in court to argue against leniency. Brian Durbin said he and his family had been "victims of an elaborate scam" and said Mr. Fastow should serve no less than the 10 years specified in his plea agreement. "A deal's a deal," he said, though he said he had prepared his statement before he knew Mr. Fastow was cooperating in the shareholder lawsuits.

In explaining his decision, Judge Hoyt said he had to "examine the relationship between justice and mercy." Although Mr. Fastow had "drunk the wine of greed," he said, the former high-flying executive had been the "subject of great persecution" including anti-Semitic slurs and personal threats.

The judge also cited the incarceration of Mr. Fastow's wife, Lea. She served a year in jail for her role in a fraudulent Enron tax return. During that time, Mr. Fastow was left to care for his two young sons alone. Acknowledging Mr. Fastow's devotion to his family and community service while simultaneously working to redress his crimes at Enron, Judge Hoyt said, "The best evidence of remorse is what you do going forward."

Although Mr. Fastow's lawyers and government prosecutors asked that he be allowed to surrender voluntarily after the Yom Kippur holiday on Monday, Judge Hoyt refused. Mr. Fastow was allowed to briefly embrace his wife before U.S. Marshals escorted him from the courtroom in handcuffs.

"We're very disappointed he was remanded into custody," said Chris Patti, counsel for the University of California, which is a plaintiff in pending shareholder litigation. "I'm not sure what this will mean for us."

Mr. Patti and other lawyers involved in Enron civil cases had asked the judge at today's hearing to allow Mr. Fastow to remain free until at least October 23, the date they hoped to conclude his deposition. October 23 is also the date Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey Skilling, will be sentenced.

Another lawyer representing shareholders, Lawrence Irving, testified that Mr. Fastow was "critical" to their case. Referring to Mr. Fastow's testimony in the trials against his former bosses Mr. Skilling and Kenneth Lay, Mr. Irving said, "I have never seen a more impressive witness." Mr. Lay died of a heart attack in July before serving any jail time.

United States Attorney John Hueston testified that the cases against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay were weak until Mr. Fastow agreed to help the Justice Department's Enron Task Force: "He allowed the U.S. government to bring jurors inside the executive suite."

Mr. Hueston said Mr. Fastow worked with prosecutors for "in excess of 1,000 hours to untangle the web" of deceit and proved "credible, contrite and truthful" on the witness stand. Moreover, Mr. Hueston said Mr. Fastow was "truly repentant" and "not the same person introduced to the Task Force in 2003."

Mr. Hueston requested that Mr. Fastow be imprisoned in a federal penitentiary in Bastrop, Texas, where he can be treated for his dependency on anti-anxiety medication. The judge said he would recommend that facility but that the decision would be made by the Bureau of Prisons. During his remarks, Mr. Hueston did not argue for or against the maximum 10-year sentence.

Mr. Fastow also addressed Judge Hoyt. Choking back tears, he said he felt shame and regret for his actions. Turning to face Mr. Durbin, the shareholder, Mr. Fastow apologized. Speaking of his friends and family, he said, "I've failed them and have to work everyday of my life to regain their trust."

Former Enron Financial Officer Fastow Sentenced To 6 Years In Prison (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Andrew Fastow, the former Enron Corp. financial whiz, was sentenced Tuesday to six years in prison for his role in the energy company's collapse that wiped out thousands of jobs and millions of dollars in retirement savings.

Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, had agreed to serve a maximum 10-year term when he pleaded guilty in 2004.

His attorneys, David Gerger and John Keker, on Tuesday asked for a lesser sentence, citing Fastow's admission of his guilt and his help in the federal government's successful prosecution of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and the former chief executive, Jeffrey Skilling.

Enron, once the seventh-largest U.S. company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out more than $60 billion (now â,¬47.3 billion) in market value along with thousands of jobs and more than $2 billion (â,¬1.6 billion) in pension plans.

Fastow was originally indicted on 98 counts, including fraud, insider trading and money laundering. He pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy, admitting to running various schemes to hide Enron debt and inflate profits while enriching himself. He also surrendered nearly $30 million (â,¬23.6 million) in cash and property.

At their trial, Fastow testified Lay and Skilling were aware of fraudulent financial structures engineered by Fastow and his staff.

Skilling and Lay were convicted in May of conspiracy and fraud. Lay's attorneys are working to erase his convictions since his July 5 death from heart disease. Skilling is to be sentenced next month.

Fastow's wife, Lea, pleaded guilty in 2004 to a misdemeanor tax crime and served a year in prison for helping him hide ill-gotten gains from his schemes.

Fastow Accuses Enron Bankers (FT)

By Ben White And Sheila McNulty

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

Andrew Fastow, the former chief financial officer of Enron, has accused 10 leading investment banks of helping the now-bankrupt energy group falsify its books in return for big advisory fees.

The declaration from Mr Fastow, who was sentenced on Tuesday to six years in prison for his role in Enron's collapse, could put new pressure on banks that have not yet settled in the class-action case.

In his statement, Mr Fastow said he viewed Enron's bankers as well-paid "problem-solvers" who knowingly helped Enron created financial structures that made the energy trading company seem more profitable than it really was.

Mr Fastow singled out Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, RBS and Barclays as especially involved with creating what he described as deceptive structures.

Attorneys for Enron shareholders, led by Lerach Coughlin, have already won $8bn in settlements from a group of banks including Citigroup, Bank of America and JP Morgan Chase.

A federal judge has previously dismissed Deutsche Bank and Barclays from the class action suit. But William Lerach, the lead attorney in the case, plans to ask that the two banks be reinstated in light of the declaration.

G. Paul Howes, an attorney for the Enron plaintiffs, spoke on Mr Fastow's behalf at the sentencing hearing in Houston on Thursday, asking for leniency to reflect his co-operation with the shareholders' suit.

Legal experts noted that Mr Fastow's statements were tainted by his desire for leniency and his admission of falsifying financial statements.

However, experts also said that Mr Fastow was well positioned to describe Enron's dealings. Mr Fastow was deeply involved in creating the off-balance-sheet partnerships that helped cloak Enron's mounting debt.

"He is in the best position to know exactly what was said or not said and what kinds of winks and nods were going on," said Henry Hu, professor of law and business at the University of Texas.

Mr Hu added that Mr Fastow's co-operation with the shareholders' suit would increase pressure on the remaining banks to settle.

Mr Lerach defended Mr Fastow's credibility: "Everything Fastow will say is documented by the damning and incredible e-mails these bankers wrote to each other when these schemes were going on," Mr Lerach said.

Mr Fastow, 44, broke down repeatedly when addressing the federal court, saying: "I wish I could undo what I did at Enron, but I can't."

Fastow Sentenced To Six Years In Federal Prison (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, September 27, 2006

After listening to a tearful Andrew Fastow, the former chief financial officer at Houston's Enron Corp., express remorse for his actions that led in part to the downfall of the energy company, U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt of Houston on Tuesday sentenced Fastow to six years in federal prison and two years of supervised release.

The sentencing, shortly after noon, came nearly three years after Fastow pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. The plea bargain he agreed to in January 2004 in United States of America v. Andrew S. Fastow called for a sentence of up to 10 years in prison.

After briefly hugging his wife, Lea, Fastow was handcuffed and led out of the courtroom, as Lea and other family members and friends watched. Hoyt turned down a request from Fastow's lawyers to let the 44-year-old voluntarily surrender to federal custody in October to give the former Enron CFO opportunity to give a deposition in Enron civil litigation.

In brief remarks to Hoyt, Fastow said he has been "consumed with despair and shame" for what he did at Enron. He has admitted to conspiring with other Enron executives to manipulate the company's financial reports and admitted to enriching himself. He forfeited about $24 million.

During the sentencing hearing, John Keker, a defense attorney for Fastow, asked Hoyt to sentence Fastow to five years in prison and three years of supervised release. Keker suggested that Fastow should spend those final three years doing full-time community service.

Keker told Hoyt during the hearing that Fastow has profoundly changed since Keker first met him, from a man in denial to a man who has faced what he's done.

"He is disgusted by it," Keker, a partner in Keker & Van Nest in San Francisco, told Hoyt.

Keker told Hoyt that Fastow has accepted responsibility for his actions and that Fastow's cooperation with federal prosecutors in criminal prosecutions of former Enron officials Kenneth Lay, Jeffrey Skilling and Richard Causey was "extraordinary." Keker also pointed out that Fastow has now pledged to help the plaintiffs in the shareholder securities class action filed by disgruntled Enron investors.

Tuesday, lawyers in the shareholder securities suit, In Re: Enron Corp. Securities Litigation filed a declaration from Fastow in connection with the civil litigation. In that declaration, Fastow alleges that some of the banks that did business with Enron when he was CFO "understood that some of the transactions were done primarily for generating certain accounting benefits and financial-reporting objections for Enron, including higher funds flow from operations, lower debt and increased [current period] income."

G. Paul Howes, a lawyer for the lead plaintiff in the securities litigation, told Hoyt during the hearing that Fastow has agreed to testify during the upcoming trial in the securities litigation and will provide crucial testimony to tie banks to the downfall of Enron.

Howes, a partner in plaintiffs firm Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins in San Diego, told Hoyt, "Mr. Fastow ... is the one person who can tell the story that hasn't been told: the role of the banks."

Howes, who said Fastow's testimony could help the plaintiffs recover billions of dollars from defendant banks in the shareholder securities suit, also urged Hoyt to allow Fastow to remain free from federal custody so he could give the civil deposition in October.

Prosecutor John Hueston, an Assistant U.S. Attorney who is a member of the Enron Task Force, told Hoyt that Fastow's decision to cooperate with the government in the Enron investigation was a "key breakthrough" that allowed the government to bring criminal charges against Causey, the former chief accounting officer; against Skilling, the former chief executive officer; and finally against Lay, the former chairman of Enron.

Causey pleaded guilty to a securities fraud charge and is awaiting sentencing.

Skilling and Lay were convicted in May of criminal charges. Lay was found guilty of one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud, two counts of wire fraud for making false and misleading statements and three counts of securities fraud. Skilling was found guilty on one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud, 12 counts of securities fraud, five counts of making false statements to auditors, and one count of insider trading. Lay died in July following a heart attack, but Skilling's sentencing is set for Oct. 23.

Fastow was "thoroughly debriefed" by the government, Hueston said.

Like Keker, Hueston told Hoyt that Fastow has changed immeasurably since the time when he was introduced to the Enron Task Force in 2003, and he's now "truly repentant."

In explaining his sentence, Hoyt said that Fastow received justice in court, but he also deserves mercy, because he is helping Enron shareholders in the civil litigation, because he was the subject of "great persecution" for the collapse of Enron, and because his family took a "particularly acrimonious hit" when his wife, Lea, was also prosecuted. Lea Fastow spent one year in prison after pleading guilty to one misdemeanor count of filing a false tax return.

"Seldom does a man's public fall cause an equally public fall for his wife," Hoyt noted.

Talking through tears, Fastow said, "I'm ashamed of what I did. I wish I could undo what I did at Enron, but I can't."

Ebbers Reports To Prison In Mercedes (USAT)

USA Today, September 27, 2006

Former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers — convicted in 2005 for his role in the company's $11 billion accounting fraud, the biggest in corporate history — reported Tuesday to a medium-security federal prison in Oakdale, La., to begin serving a 25-year sentence. Ebbers drove his Mercedes to prison.

Ebbers Starts 25-Year Term For Fraud At WorldCom (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters And Amy Joyce, Washington Post Staff Writers

Former WorldCom Inc. chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers reported yesterday to a federal prison in central Louisiana to begin serving a 25-year sentence for his role in the $11 billion accounting fraud that laid low the nation's second-largest telecommunications company.

Ebbers, 65, arrived at 1:18 p.m. at the low-security facility in Oakdale, according to a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons. The facility, which has 1,400 inmates, is more than 200 miles from Ebbers's family's home outside Jackson, Miss. Officials said Ebbers will probably be housed in a double-bunk cell with a steel door.

For the onetime billionaire, prison marks the end of an extraordinary arc, and it left former WorldCom employees and investors wondering whether the weight of the punishment suited the crime. A former milkman and high school basketball coach, Ebbers built a tiny Mississippi long-distance company into a powerhouse and dazzled Wall Street with down-home rhetoric and extraordinary profit margins. During the late 1990s, rival phone companies were excoriated by Wall Street for failing to match WorldCom's dizzying growth.

But it all came crashing down when the company announced in June 2002 that its chief financial officer, Scott D. Sullivan, had been boosting the bottom line by secretly reclassifying the firm's operating expenses as capital expenditures. WorldCom filed for bankruptcy protection the next month, and eventually 20,000 jobs were wiped out, including 4,000 in the Washington region. Hundreds of thousands of investors lost billions of dollars, and the fraud -- along with the 2001 collapse of Enron Corp. -- helped spark a major revision of corporate accountability laws.

Ebbers will spend at least the next 21 years in prison. The federal system does not have parole, but inmates can receive up to 15 percent off their sentences for good behavior. Ebbers is appealing his conviction and sentence to the Supreme Court.

Sullivan, 45, cut a deal with prosecutors and became the chief government witness at Ebbers's 2005 trial. He is serving a five-year sentence at a medium-security facility in Jesup, Ga., and is scheduled to be released in 2010.

The contrast between Ebbers's sentence and that of Sullivan and other high profile white-collar felons, such as former Enron finance chief Andrew S. Fastow -- who was sentenced yesterday to six years in prison -- preoccupied Ebbers's attorney Reid H. Weingarten.

"A very, very sad day," Weingarten wrote in a brief e-mail. "That sullivan gets 5 and now fastow 6 and bernie faces 25 makes me crazy . . . somehow, someway justice will be done here."

Former WorldCom employee Gayle Dennis, 39, has mellowed somewhat in her views toward Ebbers in the years since the fraud was revealed, but she still says he belongs in prison.

"He may not have actively said, 'Book these fraudulent entries,' " she said. "But he created the environment and the culture to encourage that behavior and almost require that behavior."

Dennis, who worked in the company's finance unit from 1993 to 2006, estimates that she lost $50,000 to $100,000 in retirement savings and stock options. And after the fraud was uncovered, she spent a spent a year helping clean up the books, working seven days a week, often until midnight.

"During those times, I was very anti-Bernie as well as anti-Scott Sullivan," she said. "They weren't my favorite people at that time."

In Clinton, Miss., where WorldCom had its headquarters before the scandal and which once proudly claimed to be the smallest city to host a Fortune 500 company, Mayor Rosemary Aultman took a more charitable view.

"I feel for his family," she said, adding that Ebbers's sentence seemed excessive compared with the penalties handed to other top executives convicted of similar crimes.

Ebbers had originally asked to be sent to a prison in Yazoo City, Miss., which is much closer to his family's home in Ridgeland, just north of Jackson. But yesterday, he left his home in the gated community of Bridgewater shortly before 8 a.m. and reported to Oakdale Federal Correctional Institution a little more than five hours later.

In addition to serving a lengthy prison sentence, Ebbers has also been forced to forfeit assets to a restitution fund for WorldCom investors and former employees. Liquidating Ebbers's assets, including a timber farm and a variety of other businesses, has raised $40 million so far, according to lawyers who are preparing to distribute a fund totaling $6.2 billion. That fund also includes money from settlements with WorldCom's bankers, accountants and directors, along with assets forfeited by Sullivan.

A team of class-action lawyers led by John P. "Sean" Coffey has processed 1 million WorldCom claims and found about 700,000 to be valid. The checks are expected to start rolling out in late October or early November, Coffey said. Holders of WorldCom stock will receive only pennies on the dollar for their losses. Bondholders will do far better because WorldCom's underwriters paid large settlements to avoid being on the hook for the company's default. Some bondholders will receive as much as 66 cents on the dollar. WorldCom, which emerged from bankruptcy protection as MCI Inc., has since been bought by Verizon Communications Inc.

There is a second pot of settlement money: the $750 million recovered by the Securities and Exchange Commission as part of its settlement with WorldCom. The distribution plan for those funds has been challenged by a group of WorldCom creditors and is tied up in litigation, SEC spokesman John Nester said.

No matter how those claims are processed, former WorldCom employee Andy Sharp said he felt a sense of relief yesterday as he heard Ebbers was about to start serving his sentence. "I'm less bitter about it . . . and even a little less bitter today now that he's arriving at jail," he said.

Sharp started working for WorldCom subsidiary UUNet Technologies Inc. in 1997 and left in June 2003 because he worried every morning that he would be laid off. His wife, Kristen Stahl-Sharp, who also worked there, was let go in 2002.

Andy Sharp, who now works in business development for a software company in State College, Pa., said he has tried to forget about how much money the two of them lost. He views his tumultuous years with WorldCom more as an experience and less as a catastrophe.

"When things were good, they were good," he said. "It's just too bad it had to end the way it did."

Special correspondent Katherine R. Dougan in Jackson, Miss., contributed to this report.

Lawyers Discuss Scrushy's New-Trial Request (WSJ)

A federal judge ordered defense attorneys and prosecutors to a noon conference call today to discuss HealthSouth Corp. founder and former Chief Executive Richard M. Scrushy's request for a new trial on political-corruption charges.

Attorneys for Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman say their June convictions should be thrown out because some jury members may have communicated with one another via email outside the courtroom before and during deliberations. Defense attorneys also say the jurors improperly viewed articles and information on the Internet during deliberations.

Copies of the defense attorneys' motion, including copies of purported email exchanges, briefly appeared in the public online docket when filed Monday before U.S. District Court Judge Mark Fuller placed them under seal. The email copies and separate affidavits from a juror and his wife and pastor gave names and other details that made it possible to identify jurors.

Mr. Scrushy was convicted of six counts, including conspiracy, in connection with paying $500,000 in bribes in return for a spot on a state regulatory panel. Mr. Siegelman was convicted on 10 political-corruption counts, six related to Mr. Scrushy.

The Hurd And Dunn Show (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

Now leaks are a serious breach of board collegiality and confidentiality. In principle, something should be done about them. But you've heard nothing like the Hewlett-Packard saga before, and that's no accident.

GM Chief Rick Wagoner merely contented himself with venting to the L.A. Times a few weeks ago about his own leaking board, though the GM leaks were more manipulative than any that came from H-P. Coke's board, which then featured investing legend Warren Buffett, was a veritable leakfest two years ago during its hunt for a CEO, when one name after another surfaced in the press prematurely, including that of Gillette's James Kilts, who abruptly withdrew from consideration.

Or take the case of Ira Stepanian, bounced from his job as Bank of Boston's chief. He showed up at the company's annual meetings for years afterward to make speeches about the need to investigate the board leaks that preceded his firing. His replacement CEO acknowledged the leak problem, said the board had discussed it, but concluded the bank's interests wouldn't be served by an investigation.

H-P followed a different wisdom. Its board chairwoman, Patricia Dunn, beset by leaks through four years of strategic and leadership turmoil, decided to get proactive. She sponsored private investigators to track down the leakers, leading to a boardroom rupture when it emerged that these sleuths had (in vernacular terms, if not legal terms) stolen the phone bills of directors and reporters in an attempt to discover who blabbed to whom.

A rule of journalism is that a story that on Day One is "man bites dog" must be flipped 180 degrees on Day Two: It must be given deeper significance. It must represent a trend: Men are biting dogs all over.

The H-P snafu is devoid of larger meaning, but the snafu now has its own consequences, hence the unusual suspense, and unusual stakes, of tomorrow's spectacle before a House committee concerned with data privacy.

The questions only begin with which executives will invoke the Fifth (likely only those directly involved in the record filching). Will Ms. Dunn take full responsibility for driving the investigation or seek to share it with CEO Mark Hurd? Until now, the markets have viewed the H-P scandal as a board scandal, and tellingly, of little relevance for the company's shares. Then an email revealed Mr. Hurd had given his blessing to a plan for a fake email leak to a reporter in hopes of ferreting out the real leakers.

His Friday press conference was not a triumph. He seemed to admit what he couldn't deny, and minimized: He approved the email scam but "doesn't recall" approving a tracking software attachment (though it's hard to see how the scheme made sense otherwise). He was in a meeting, "briefly"; he received a report but "didn't read it." He takes "full accountablity" for what happens next, not for what happened before.

But Mr. Hurd was new on the job, Ms. Dunn's investigation was already underway when he arrived, and he had his hands full turning around H-P's business (which he seems to have done admirably). Shareholders would not like to see him go. In the last two days, a unspoken deal has glimmered in the comments of the corporate governance crowd and its media helpmates. They see a chance to pleasure themselves by remaking the H-P board to their specifications as a test bed for various nostrums of "good governance." In return, they signal a willingness to treat the scandal as primarily a "board scandal." Expect Mr. Hurd to take them up in tomorrow's hearing.

Another element of suspense is Congress. Will it confine itself to what the H-P saga has to say about "pretexting" -- the scamming of phone companies and others into allowing unauthorized access to records?

This subject was on the committee's radar screen already. Or will H-P become an excuse to become even more prescriptive on corporate governance along the lines of the poorly considered Sarbanes-Oxley law in the wake of Enron?

That corporate snafus are evidence of a "crisis" of governance, calling for a straitjacket to be lowered over companies presumably to prevent future snafus and improve corporate performance, is already being brutally repudiated by reality as public companies and executive talent flee to private equity.

More SOX is the last thing America needs. Even a company that otherwise qualifies as a "monopoly" in the good or service it provides must compete with the entire world for investment dollars. There are 11,000 public companies in America, each competing with 10,999 others for investor interest. That's not including thousands of foreign companies, Danish housing bonds, unleaded gas futures and every other contender for investor cash.

The right answer to the question (a renewed favorite in the wake of the H-P shakeup) of whether the chairman's job and the CEO's job should be separate is: Yes, in the case of companies where separation is a good idea, and no, in cases where it's a bad idea.

Most corporate governance questions (including executive compensation questions) can be answered in the same vein. It depends. Companies should be left to figure out for themselves what's best, try one thing and then another, in the unceasing quest to gain the confidence of investors who have nearly infinite choice about where to put their money.

To Buy Or Not To Buy HP? A Question Of Ethics (WP)

By Rob Pegoraro

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Few corporations deserve to be equated to Richard Nixon's White House or Enron, but Hewlett-Packard seems richly entitled to that comparison. And unlike those two arch-villains, HP awaits your judgment the next time you walk into any computer or electronics store. What do you do?

In case you missed it, from March 2005 to May 2006 the onetime Silicon Valley icon engaged in an orgy of intrusive, probably illegal surveillance as it tried to find the source of leaks about its board meetings. It sicced investigators on its board members, its board members' families, its own spokespeople, its former chief executive, reporters and their spouses, and even one reporter's father.

HP's hired goons pursued those suspects in a variety of creepy ways. They employed pretexting -- a tool of identity thieves more generally known as lying -- to gather people's telephone records. They considered planting spies in the newsrooms of the Wall Street Journal and Cnet and even attempted to infect a journalist's computer with spyware that would record to whom she forwarded an attachment.

A public apology finally came on Friday, but the only person to be punished was Chairman Patricia Dunn: She had already agreed to quit, but HP kicked her out immediately instead of letting her stick around until January. Meanwhile, chief executive Mark Hurd -- who should have been aware of what was being done in his name but apparently was not -- was given Dunn's old job while keeping his current gig. Nice work if you can get it, huh?

So, Nixonian or Enronesque? You pick the adjective. And you pick the response: Do you give HP your business or not? Does its vile conduct outweigh the finer points of its products?

That question can come up in any consumer transaction -- whether it's deciding between buying a steak at Safeway, Whole Foods or the farmer's market or choosing between trekking out to Costco or Wal-Mart for the next bulk purchase of toilet paper -- but it has been coming up more often in the tech industry.

Just picking out a Web search engine can involve a complicated moral calculus. Google's Chinese subsidiary censors search results to suit the dictates of the Chinese government -- but Yahoo has turned over the names of Chinese dissidents who used its Web-mail service.

Lest you throw up your hands and say this is just business, not a moral issue, remember that most companies want to be judged on this level. That's why they go to the trouble of putting testimonials to their "corporate citizenship" and "core values" up on their Web sites and sponsoring NPR and local symphony orchestras. (For a cheap laugh, visit http://www.hp.com/hpinfo/globalcitizenship .) It's only fair to take up a company on such a clearly expressed offer and evaluate its character.

Not all corporate misdeeds require a consumer response. It's possible to like a product even when its manufacturer can act like a jerk at times. Apple has engaged in thuggish -- but, fortunately, unsuccessful -- lawsuits against Web sites that published leaked information about upcoming products, but that hasn't stopped the iPod from dominating the music-player market. And then there's Microsoft: Being nailed for repeated antitrust violations didn't seem to make any meaningful dent in its sales.

But some conduct begs for retribution at the cash register. The brain trust at HP let its megalomania outweigh any other considerations, like common decency or simply the desire not to look like felons when the whole sorry operation inevitably came to light. If this doesn't affect HP's bottom line, how much lower does a company have to sink before its customers rebel?

In one respect, HP faces more trouble than most companies that run afoul of the law. Like most manufacturers of Windows computers, it doesn't make anything that you can't easily get from another source. It builds commodity products with only a few minor tweaks. Replacing an HP with a Dell or a Sony entails far less distress than boycotting an airline, a vacation destination or a particular make of car.

Unfortunately, punishing HP or the next corporate criminal doesn't mean you can expect to move your business to a truly upstanding firm, as opposed to one that's merely less evil. The "my company right or wrong" mind-set rules too many corporations these days, and no place more decidedly than in their executive suites -- where leaders first demand to be compensated as if they alone deserve credit for the company's success, then cry about the unfairness of laws like Sarbanes-Oxley that hold them directly responsible for the company's misdeeds.

Go ahead, make HP your punching bag the next time you shop for a printer or a computer. Just don't overestimate the deterrent effect that might have on the rest of corporate America.

Options Probe Has Cost Investors $7.9 Billion In Market Value (BLOOM)

By Rick Green

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

Sept. 27 (Bloomberg) -- The scandal over backdating stock options, used by companies to reward top executives with shares granted at below-market prices, has so far cost investors at least $7.9 billion in market value.

More than two-thirds of 117 companies that announced investigations into their options grants by Aug. 31 fell in the stock market the next day, data compiled by Bloomberg show. The declines sliced an average 2.6 percent from their market value, 2.5 percentage points more than the average return on the same day for Standard & Poor's and Bloomberg indexes of similar companies.

The losses add grist to 220 investor lawsuits against 70 companies, including Apple Computer Inc. and Home Depot Inc., which demand restitution and damages. The inquiry into backdating and fortuitous timing of option grants rivals the probe three years ago into improper mutual-fund trading, which led to $4.3 billion in penalties.

``It's yesterday coming back to haunt you today," said Howard Silverblatt, equity market analyst at Standard & Poor's in New York. ``It's another blow against corporate governance and another reason why individuals will find it difficult to have trust and faith in management."

Companies grant options to give executives an incentive to boost the stock price. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department are looking at whether the companies backdated grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low, giving recipients a built-in profit, and cases where they may have failed to properly account for awards.

Probe Costs Jobs

Backdated options that aren't disclosed can hide compensation costs from shareholders, distort income taxes and earnings and thus obscure a company's financial statements, prosecutors and regulators said. At least 19 companies including Broadcom Corp. and Applied Micro Circuits Corp. already have restated profits by $2.5 billion. More than 30 companies have said they may revise earnings, among them Cablevision Systems Corp. and Cheesecake Factory Inc.

Probes also have cost about 20 executives and directors their jobs at more than a dozen companies, such as Gregory Reyes, chief executive officer at San Jose, California-based Brocade Communications Systems Inc., the world's largest maker of switches for storage networks, and Kent Roberts, general counsel at McAfee Inc., the Santa Clara, California-based maker of anti-virus software.

Five former executives at two companies face criminal charges, including Reyes and Kobi Alexander, ex-CEO of New York- based Comverse Technology Inc.

Peer Performance

Investment returns are based on a Bloomberg analysis of companies that disclosed probes from Jan. 1 to Aug. 31. Companies that announced probes before 2006 or after August weren't included. Stock prices were measured for a day, a week and a month, starting from the day the company first disclosed an investigation through Sept. 1.

The analysis then compared those returns to a peer group using an S&P index composed of similar companies. In three cases where an S&P peer group didn't match closely, a Bloomberg index was substituted. Houston-based Crown Castle International Corp. and Boston-based American Tower Inc., which own communications towers, were compared with the 110-member Bloomberg U.S. Communications Index. Stolt-Nielsen SA, a London-based shipping company, was compared with the 13-member Bloomberg Dry Ships Index.

Some of a stock's movement might have been explained by issues affecting the entire industry or market. To account for this, the calculation of how much a stock rose or fell, and how much its market value changed, was adjusted by subtracting the movement of market indexes of similar stocks on the same day.

Monster Decline

In the case of Monster Worldwide Inc., the New York-based job service, the stock's 8.1 percent loss on June 12 cut the company's market value by $433.9 million. Since its peers lost 1.8 percent that day, just 6.3 percentage points were attributed to the options announcement, reducing the loss of market value to $339.7 million, according to Bloomberg data.

The adjusted decline in market value totaled $7.9 billion for all companies on the first day of trading. Unadjusted, the total would have been $10.8 billion.

The review didn't consider the effect of accusations made by researchers, news reports and lawsuits -- many of them unsubstantiated -- which sent some stocks tumbling before formal announcements.

First-Day Trading

Shares of 78 of 117 companies fell in the first trading day, and 80 trailed their peers. The biggest declines included QuickLogic Corp., a Sunnyvale, California-based developer of low-power programmable microchips, on July 27, and SafeNet Inc., a Belcamp, Maryland-based maker of products to protect computer communications, on May 19. Their shares tumbled 22 percent on days when indexes of similar companies were little changed.

After a week, 62 of 114 stocks hadn't recovered and 71 of them lagged behind their peers. The entire group posted an average weekly loss of 2 percent, trailing their respective peers by 2.6 percentage points.

In addition to SafeNet and QuickLogic, the worst performers included Comverse, the world's largest maker of voice-mail software. Its shares fell more than 21 percent in the week following the company's March disclosure, and trailed the 115-member S&P Supercomposite Technology Hardware and Equipment Index by 26 percentage points.

The stocks slid an average 5.6 percent after a month, and trailed their peers by 4.3 percentage points. Shares of 53 of 79 companies that compiled 30-day records by the review's cut-off date sold for less than their pre-announcement levels, and 51 lagged behind their benchmarks.

Fleeting Damage

Vitesse Semiconductor Corp. fell the most, losing 52 percent in the 30 days after the Camarillo, California-based designer of microchips for computer networks said on April 18 it was investigating its options grants. The 39-member S&P Supercomposite Semiconductors Sub-Industry Index fell 4 percent, according to Bloomberg data.

For some companies, the damage proved fleeting. Asyst Technologies Inc., a company in Fremont, California, that makes semiconductor equipment, fell 4 percent June 14, a day when similar companies rose 1.7 percent. The gap with its peers widened to 8.6 percentage points after a week. By mid-July, though, Asyst shares were 11 percent above the pre-announcement level, and almost 13 percentage points ahead of its rivals.

The shock value of the revelations may also be wearing off. The average one-day loss for the first 30 companies to disclose investigations, from March 14 to May 25, was 2.9 percent, or 2.8 percentage points worse than their peers. The last 30 disclosures as of Aug. 31 prompted an average decline of 1 percent, trailing peers by 1.2 percentage points.

Hardest Hit

Some of the hardest-hit companies, including Comverse and Vitesse, have changed their top management. Alexander, Comverse's founder, became a fugitive after failing to appear to face charges in August stemming from the backdating probe. Vitesse, which fired CEO Louis Tomasetta and two other top officers on May 17, faces probes by an internal panel, the SEC and the Justice Department, more than a dozen investor lawsuits and pressure from hedge funds to repay debt immediately because it violated bond agreements.

Price declines reflect doubts by investors about management's integrity, said Charles Di Bona, a software analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. in New York. He said investors remain wary even after top executives have been replaced.

``Companies that are inclined to do this don't necessarily have shareholders' interests at heart," said Di Bona, ranked among the industry's top three analysts by Institutional Investor magazine. ``There are easier ways to make money than taking a gamble that conditions have changed."

Most Are Honest

The problems remind investors of ``greedy and venal" executives, said Bill Riegel, chief equity manager at New York-based TIAA-CREF, which oversees $380 billion of assets. ``It gives me some pause."

Most managers are honest, Riegel said, and that might make the declines of some companies a chance to buy. He cited shares of Apple Computer, the Cupertino, California-based maker of iPods and computers, which TIAA-CREF already owns.

Apple said June 29 it was investigating stock-option grants, including an award to CEO Steve Jobs. The stock dropped more than 6 percent in the next week. The stock has since gained 37 percent, compared with 9.7 percent for the S&P index that tracks computer and peripheral equipment makers.

``The market has a tendency to overshoot on fear," Riegel said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors In C.I.A. Leak Put Spending At $1.4 Million (AP)

The Associated Press, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 (AP) — Prosecutors said Tuesday that they had spent $1.44 million investigating the leak of a Central Intelligence Agency officer's identity in 2003.

Because the special prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and other lawyers in the case were already on the government payroll, most of the costs were covered as a "paper transfer" from one government account to another, Mr. Fitzgerald's office said.

The only additional cost to taxpayers was $333,000, mostly for travel and contractual services like research and court recorders. Investigators did not rent office space here, eliminating an expense that drove up costs for other investigations of top officials.

"We do believe we were very conscientious with the expenditure of taxpayer funds," a spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald's office, Randall Samborn, said.

Since 2003, Mr. Fitzgerald has been investigating the leak of the identity of Valerie Wilson, who says her name was disclosed as retribution for her husband's criticism of the Bush administration's intelligence before the Iraq invasion.

Nobody has been charged with leaking her name. The sole person charged in the case, I. Lewis Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, faces charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. Mr. Fitzgerald's costs were compiled and reported to the Government Accountability Office, which audits special prosecutors two times a year. The G.A.O. is expected to release a report Friday on Mr. Fitzgerald's spending for the last six months.

His office released the total, current through Aug. 31, in response to a request on Tuesday by The Associated Press.

For comparison, another independent counsel, David M. Barrett, spent more than $20 million in an investigation of former Housing Secretary Henry G. Cisneros that lasted a decade. The investigation of President Clinton's business dealings cost about $70 million after evolving into an examination of his sexual behavior that resulted in his impeachment.

Independent and special prosecutors are not required to include Federal Bureau of Investigation salaries in their figures. Neither the C.I.A. leak case nor the Cisneros investigation included those costs. The Clinton investigation totals included the F.B.I. salaries.

Mr. Libby is due in court on Wednesday for a closed hearing over whether he can use President Bush's daily terrorism briefings and other classified documents as evidence. He wants to show that he did not lie to the authorities, saying he simply did not remember because he had more weighty issues on his mind.

Prosecutors have said Mr. Libby is trying to sabotage the case by requesting so much classified information that the government will be forced to withhold it and let the case be dismissed.

CIA Leak Probe Relatively Inexpensive (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who investigated whether senior Bush administration officials illegally leaked the name of a CIA operative for political payback, has spent $1.4 million in his probe over the past three years, his office reported yesterday -- a figure that establishes him as remarkably frugal in the ranks of recent special investigators.

Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr's investigations of President Bill Clinton's affair with Monica S. Lewinsky and his ties to the failed Whitewater land investment cost $71.5 million and took eight years. Independent Counsel David M. Barrett's examination of Clinton housing secretary Henry G. Cisneros over an extramarital affair and potential illegal payments cost $21 million and lasted 10 years.

Nevertheless, some are already arguing about whether the parsimonious prosecutor's expenditures in the Valerie Plame case were worth the results.

Fitzgerald's probe roiled the White House, laid bare an Oval Office intent on squelching a critic of the Iraq war and forced reporters to do the unthinkable -- name their confidential sources. Though Fitzgerald debated for months whether to charge Bush Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove with a crime, the investigation eventually led to no charges of a criminal leak.

Instead, Vice President Cheney's chief of staff was charged with obstruction of justice, perjury and lying to investigators. I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who resigned his post the day he was indicted in October 2005, is scheduled to stand trial in January.

The true cost to taxpayers of Fitzgerald's operation is actually $333,000, according to his spokesman Randall Samborn, because Fitzgerald has relied on a handful of federal prosecutors in Chicago, where he is the U.S. attorney, and in the Justice Department in Washington, and made use of government offices in both locations.

The government would pay rent and utilities for that office space anyway, and those prosecutors would be getting a government paycheck even if they weren't now spending their work hours marshaling evidence against Libby and duking it out with his defense lawyers in pretrial skirmishes. The probe's salary and building costs total $1.1 million.

Judge To Weigh Evidence In CIA Leak Case (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Associated Press, September 26, 2006

A closed-door hearing beginning Wednesday will deal with a crucial issue in the trial of a former White House aide: whether President Bush's daily terrorism briefings and other sensitive documents should be disclosed in the CIA leak case.

The hearing, which could last several days, will help establish what classified information is relevant to the case against Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

He is accused of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about his conversations in 2003 with reporters regarding CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Libby wants to use the daily intelligence briefings and terrorism threat assessments as evidence to show he had important things on his mind and honestly didn't remember details about his conversations with reporters.

Prosecutors have said Libby is trying to sabotage the case by requesting so much classified information that the government will be forced to withhold it and let the case be dismissed. It's a legal tactic known as "graymail."

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued in court papers filed late Monday that the intelligence briefings fall outside the rules of evidence and should not be allowed as evidence.

Fitzgerald was less opposed to Libby's request for records regarding former Ambassador Joseph Wilson's trip to Niger, saying they could be considered on a case-by-case basis. Wilson, Plame's husband, discounted reports that Saddam Hussein sought to buy uranium from the African country — a claim Bush later included in his State of the Union address.

After the hearing, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton will decide what documents should be allowed as evidence. He will then hold a second hearing, which also could take days, to decide how the documents should be blacked out or summarized to protect national security.

If, after those hearings, government officials still believe national security would be jeopardized, they can refuse to release the classified information. That could lead to the case being dismissed before trial starts in January.

Gotti Jurors Say They're Deadlocked (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The federal jury in the racketeering conspiracy trial of John A. Gotti sent a note to the judge this afternoon saying they were deadlocked and unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

Judge Shira A. Scheindlin read the panel the Allen charge, an instruction meant to encourage juries to continue working until they reach a verdict, and sent them back to continue deliberating.

It is unclear how long the jurors — seven women and five men — will continue to deliberate, but Judge Scheindlin told them if they felt they were close to reaching a verdict by later this afternoon that the court would pay for dinner and give them rides home.

If the jury is unable to reach a verdict, it would be the third mistrial on the racketeering charges in the past year for Mr. Gotti. This is the sixth day of this jury's deliberations. In Mr. Gotti's first trial, the jury deliberated for eight days. In the second, the deliberations lasted one and a half days.

"We have vigorously debated each charge," read the note from the jury to Judge Scheindlin. "We have been unable to reach a unanimous verdict."

The jurors did say that of the four counts Mr. Gotti is facing, they had been able to reach a decision on only part of one of the racketeering conspiracy charges: the kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and radio talk show host.

The jury's note did not say what decision it had reached on that count.

Mr. Gotti, known as Junior, faces two racketeering counts, as well as counts of witness tampering and conspiracy to commit construction industry extortion.

During the deliberations, it became apparent from the notes seeking explanation from Judge Scheindlin that the jury was having a difficult time reaching a verdict on the key element of the case — whether Mr. Gotti had quit the Gambino organized-crime family at some point before July 1999.

If Mr. Gotti did withdraw from the crime family before that date, he would be immune from prosecution because the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges would have expired. Mr. Gotti's defense is that he did, in effect, resign from the mob in 1999 after receiving permission from his father, John J. Gotti, who was known as the Dapper Don. The elder Gotti, who was the boss of the Gambino family from the mid-1980's to the late 1990's, died in prison in 2002.

During the current trial for the younger Gotti, both the government and the defense played F.B.I. recordings of Mr. Gotti while he was serving a prison sentence on unrelated racketeering charges from 1999 to 2004 in Ray Brook federal penitentiary in upstate New York.

During some of the tapes, Mr. Gotti is heard telling visitors that he had left his previous life of crime behind. In others, it sounds as if Mr. Gotti still had a role in the Gambino family, even behind bars. Prosecutors said that Mr. Gotti was aware he was being recorded when he made remarks about having quit the Gambino family, but Mr. Gotti's lawyers said his remarks had been heartfelt.

After the jury's note was read today, prosecutors left the courtroom with grim faces, while Charles Carnesi, Mr. Gotti's lead lawyer, flashed a broad smile.

There has been a gag order during the trial, which bars lawyers from discussing the case.

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A jury deliberating the fate of John "Junior" Gotti at his third racketeering trial told the judge Tuesday it was unable to agree on a verdict. The judge asked the jury to try again.

The jury released a note after noon saying it had only been able to agree on one of two acts it must decide before reaching a verdict on the racketeering charge.

"We have been unable to reach a unanimous verdict on all charges," the jury said. "We feel we are deadlocked."

From the start, the jury has sought evidence aimed at deciding whether Gotti quit the Gambino crime family before July 1991, as he claims. If so, a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before prosecutors brought new racketeering charges in 2004.

The jury was in its sixth day of deliberations. It had asked for some evidence to be read back as it deliberated over the last week, but the panel has not been particularly noisy in a courthouse where jurors can sometimes be heard shouting at one another.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin encouraged the jurors to give it another try, saying the case would likely have to be tried again and it was unlikely that another jury would be better able to judge the evidence. Two previous juries in the last year wound up deadlocked, with resulting mistrials.

"I know it's been long but there's still no hurry," she said. "I ask you with great respect that you continue your deliberations and I await your word whatever it may be."

Defense lawyers say Gotti paid a large fine when he pleaded guilty to a racketeering charge in another case in 1999 and was permitted to keep the property and businesses which remained, regardless of where the money originated.

Gotti has also been accused of ordering two 1992 attacks on radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa, including one in which Sliwa was shot twice before he escaped out the window of a car.

Prosecutors have said Gotti was retaliating for on-air attacks against his father, John Gotti, who was sentenced in 1992 to life in prison without parole. He died in prison in 2002.

If convicted, Gotti could face up to 30 years in prison. He is free on $7 million bail.

DOJ Can Question Staffers In Crawford Probe (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

The Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee has agreed to turn over documents and allow three staffers to provide testimony to the Justice Department as part of the federal investigation into Lester Crawford, the former head of the Food and Drug Administration.

The Senate approved a resolution on Monday authorizing the committee to cooperate with the federal investigation. Under Senate rules, no evidence in the Senate's possession may be turned over to an outside body unless the full chamber approves it.

"Chairman [Mike] Enzi (R-Wyo.) and the committee staff are working to be helpful to the U.S. attorney's office and cooperating fully with their investigation at this point," said Craig Orfield, communications director for the panel.

Crawford resigned as head of the FDA in September 2005 after only two months on the job. Prior to his resignation, Crawford sold more than $50,000 in stock in a company regulated by the agency, according to The Associated Press. Crawford now works at the lobbying firm Policy Directions Inc.

Crawford, who held several senior posts at the FDA before becoming commissioner in July 2005, has refused to testify in a lawsuit that challenges the FDA's handling of the controversial contraceptive drug known as the "morning-after pill" or "Plan B," which is manufactured by Barr Pharmaceuticals.

Crawford's lawyer told reporters earlier this year that he would not testify in the case because it might incriminate him in a grand jury probe of his financial holdings. The attorney, Biz Van Gelder, could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

Nuclear Engineer Guilty Of Conspiracy, Tax Evasion (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 26, 2006

A nuclear engineer who formerly worked for Westinghouse Electric Corp. pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court to conspiracy and tax evasion.

Initially, Mark M. Kaushansky, 55, of Monroeville, was charged with helping Russia's former atomic energy minister steal more than $9 million in aid money from the U.S. Department of Energy.

But the plea before Senior U.S. District Judge Maurice B. Cohill included just nine of the original 20 counts against him, and they all related to tax evasion.

"He admitted there's some tax problems," said Mr. Kaushansky's defense attorney, Fred Thieman. "It's been our position from the beginning: We denied there was a scheme to skim money from the energy contracts with Russia."

Now the question will be how much money Mr. Kaushansky owes in unpaid taxes.

The government contends the amount is more than $5 million, dating to the mid-1990s. Mr. Thieman, believes, however, that the loss is "substantially lower."

"We intend to show it's neither the magnitude [nor] underlying scheme the government alleged," Mr. Thieman said.

He hopes to convince the judge at Mr. Kaushansky's sentencing hearing in February that the money the government alleges was involved in the case is not taxable in the United States.

At a loss between $2.5 million and $7 million, Mr. Kaushansky would likely face a prison term of 46 to 57 months.

The sentencing hearing, scheduled to begin on Feb. 5, is expected to last at least four days for both sides to dispute that figure.

Mr. Kaushansky came to the United States from Ukraine in 1979. He met his co-defendant, Dr. Yevgeny Adamov, in 1990 when acting as a translator for him in talks with Westinghouse officials.

According to the U.S. attorney's office, Mr. Kaushansky and Dr. Adamov began working together. They incorporated two businesses, one in Pennsylvania and another in Delaware, and used two shell investment companies, with accounts in the United States, France and Monaco, to divert some of the money earmarked for NIKIET, a Russian nuclear research institute headed by Dr. Adamov.

That institute was designed to modernize nuclear reactors in Russia and Eastern Europe like the one at Chernobyl where there was a meltdown in 1986. Sixteen different countries contributed funds to it, including the United States.

As part of his plea agreement, Mr. Kaushansky agreed to forfeit any proceeds in the bank accounts in Monaco. He did not, however, agree to cooperate in the government's case against Dr. Adamov.

The Adamov case has been put on an indefinite hold since Swiss officials ruled in December that Dr. Adamov would be returned to Russia to stand trial instead of being extradited to the United States.

Man With Russian Ties Pleads Guilty In Fraud (PTR)

By Jason Cato

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069782

The Monroeville business partner of former Russian nuclear energy minister Yevgeny Adamov pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to conspiring to defraud the United States and to a litany of tax evasion charges, though he disagrees with prosecutors about how much he owes.

Mark Kaushansky, 55, will try to prove during a four-day hearing in February that he owes significantly less than the $5 million prosecutors say he owes. That could earn him significantly less time in prison than the approximately five years he faces if the government is right.

In pleading guilty to nine counts of conspiracy and tax evasion, Kaushansky avoided more serious offenses of money laundering and interstate transportation of stolen property. He maintains his long-standing argument that he was not involved in an international scheme to rip off the United States with Adamov.

"I just decided to admit that some irregularities were made," Kaushansky told U.S. District Judge Maurice Cohill when asked why he was pleading guilty. He originally pleaded innocent in May 2005, when he and Adamov were indicted and accused of stealing more than $9 million intended to upgrade security at Russian nuclear plants.

Prior to serving as Russia's nuclear energy minister from 1998 to 2001, Adamov headed a secret Russian energy technology institute known as NIKIET. The institute was to handle the international money earmarked for nuclear plant improvements.

Prosecutors say Kaushansky and Adamov routed $15 million provided by the United States and other countries to bank accounts in Pittsburgh, Delaware and Monaco between 1993 and 2003.

Kaushansky's lawyer, former U.S. Attorney Fred Thieman, said instability in Russia at the time caused his client and Adamov to move the money the way they did. Otherwise, it would have been at risk if kept in Russian banks.

Charges against Adamov will not be dropped, although prosecutors doubt he will ever come to the United States to stand trial.

Adamov, 67, was the main target of the federal investigation.

The U.S. had him arrested in Switzerland in May 2005, but lost an extradition battle with Russia. Adamov was returned to Moscow, where he faces fraud and abuse-of-office charges.

Kaushansky moved to the United States from the Soviet Union in 1979. He was working as a nuclear power plant engineer at Westinghouse Electric Corp. when he met Adamov in the early 1990s.

Man Pleads In Russia Nuclear Cash Case (WP/AP)

By Dan Nephin, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

PITTSBURGH -- A former nuclear engineer accused of helping a former Russian official steal more than $9 million earmarked for improving the safety of that country's Chernobyl-style reactors pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy and tax evasion.

Mark M. Kaushansky, of Monroeville, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government and eight tax evasion counts. Like former Russian nuclear energy minister Yevgeny Adamov, he also has been charged with additional conspiracy counts and money laundering, but Kaushansky's attorney, Fred Thieman, said he expected those charges to be dropped at sentencing.

Asked by the judge why he was pleading guilty, Kaushansky said, "I just decided to admit that some tax-related irregularities were made."

Kaushansky had a business partnership with Adamov, whom Russian President Vladimir Putin fired in 2001. Prosecutors allege the defendants stole $9 million from the U.S., other countries and corporations by setting up corporations in the U.S. to funnel money to themselves that was intended to improve Russia's nuclear safety.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said in a statement that the indictment alleges Adamov was primarily responsible for diverting the money, but that Kaushansky "was most directly involved with the concealment and expenditure of those funds."

U.S. prosecutors wanted to try Adamov here, but Russian officials said he should face trial in his home country. He has denied the charges against him and awaits trial in Russia.

Kaushansky, who emigrated from the Soviet Union in 1979, was working as a researcher at Westinghouse Electric Corp. and as a translator when he met Adamov, according to the indictment.

Kaushansky's sentencing hearing was scheduled for Feb. 5, but is expected to take several days because both sides will present evidence about the amount of income for which he tried to evade taxes. Prosecutors say the counts involve income of more than $5 million, but Thieman said it is a fraction of that figure.

In 1986, a shattered reactor at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant spewed radiation across much of Europe, contaminated 77,220 square miles and forced the Soviet government to permanently evacuate more than 300,000 people. Dozens died within months, and the U.N. health agency estimated last year that the ultimate death toll from Chernobyl-related cancers will be more than 9,000.

By RICHARD MAUER And LISA DEMER

Anchorage Daily News, September 27, 2006

FBI agents returned last week to the legislative office of Senate President Ben Stevens and seized more evidence, including a copy of a sworn statement that implicated Stevens in an alleged payment scheme involving fisheries legislation brought by his father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

Word of the second search, and what was taken by the FBI, came from Ben Stevens himself, who disclosed the information in a letter to the Daily News dated Sept. 22. In his letter, Stevens denied a request by the newspaper for a copy of any FBI search warrants which may have been served on him or his office, and the government's receipts for items seized. But Stevens provided what he said was a "complete listing of what was obtained from my legislative offices" on Aug. 31 and Sept. 18.

Stevens, a Republican who is not seeking re-election this year, said he voluntarily consented to the two FBI searches, though federal agents said they had a judge's warrant for the Aug. 31 search.

Among the material hauled off by agents, Stevens said, were binders on the proposed natural gas pipeline and revised oil taxes, as well as information on a board that doled out federal marketing money to fisheries companies, some of which paid him as a consultant. Stevens was chairman of that board until about six months ago.

The vast majority of items on Stevens' list were public records that could have been obtained by anyone, sometimes under a formal public information request, sometimes just for asking. For instance, the FBI seized the 2006 Legislative directory, the 2003 Legislative Ethics Training Manual, federal and state laws governing North Slope gas, and a "piece of paper" with the tax identification number for Stevens' consulting firm, Stevens and Associates.

Though much has been made of the FBI's apparent interest in the relationship between legislators and the politically active oil field service and construction company Veco -- the company itself was searched, and it was mentioned in other search warrants -- Stevens listed only a single Veco document taken by the FBI: an undated memo to Veco president Pete Leathard.

Stevens' list couldn't be independently verified and he wouldn't elaborate on anything. The FBI has said little about its investigation, aside from acknowledging serving 24 search warrants Aug. 31 and Sept. 1. The offices of six legislators were targeted Aug. 31, and Stevens is the only one the FBI returned to for a second round, said FBI spokesman Eric Gonzalez. No one has been charged.

It was also impossible to determine the significance of any particular item seized -- whether it was scooped up to determine its relevance later, or central to the inquiry. That's normal in a federal investigation, said former U.S. Attorney Wev Shea, now in private practice in Anchorage. FBI agents will seize records through a warrant rather than simply ask for them as public records to make sure they are getting everything, he said. Plus, the drama of the FBI raids themselves may have been designed to stir things up and get people talking as the investigation continues.

"They don't know what phones are tapped. Nor do they know who is wired," said Shea, who added that he doesn't have inside information of the case.

The FBI has been asking some state legislators about the debate on the gas pipeline and oil taxes, and those subjects make up the largest haul from Stevens' office Aug. 31.

The government also seized Stevens' Rolodex containing business cards and a phone log, made a copy of the hard drive of a Gateway computer, and took an 80-gigabyte hard drive, an untitled compact disc and something described as an "e-mail found on printer."

Some of the material goes beyond issues known to be important to Veco like the gas pipeline and touch on fishery subjects that involve Ben's father, long-time U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska. Since 2005, Ted Stevens has chaired the Senate Commerce Committee, through which all fisheries legislation passes. Before that, he chaired the Senate Appropriations Committee, one of the most powerful seats in Congress.

Among fishery-related items, Ben Stevens reported that in the second search, the FBI seized "Victor Smith affidavit" and a 2004 "UFA" letter -- United Fishermen of Alaska. Agents also took two April 2006 letters he wrote to the U.S. Department of Commerce regarding the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, which he headed from its creation by Ted Stevens in 2003 until his resignation earlier this year.

Through a spokesman, Ted Stevens said he had no comment.

Ben Stevens, a former crab-boat captain, has maintained an active fisheries consulting business since being named to a vacant Senate seat in 2001, disclosing $775,435 in income from nine companies and associations since then. He has never publicly said what he has done for the money.

Victor Smith, a former Southeast Alaska salmon fisherman who now operates a barge in north Puget Sound, said Monday he has signed three affidavits regarding Ben Stevens. The affidavits helped form the basis of complaints brought against Ben Stevens at the Alaska Public Offices Commission and other agencies by Ray Metcalfe, a government watchdog and founder of the independent Republican Moderate Party in Alaska.

It could not be determined which of Smith's affidavits the agents seized. In one, he reported attending a 2004 meeting of the Purse Seine Vessel Owners Association in which officials of that organization and the Southeast Alaska Seiners Association discussed how it would pay Ben Stevens after congressional passage of a $50 million loan program to reduce the seine fleet.

Smith said he learned Ben Stevens was supposed to be paid "through convoluted accounting" $5,000 a month to secure a plan, and $10,000 a month if successful, until he was paid $500,000.

While the loan program passed Congress and was enacted into law, fishermen complained it was too expensive for them to use.

Bob Thorstenson Jr., executive director of the seiners association and president of the United Fishermen of Alaska, denied paying Ben Stevens to lobby Ted Stevens. In an interview last year, he said the payments of $3,000 a month were made starting in June 2004 to an Anchorage company, Advance North, in which Stevens and one of his father's former aides, Trevor McCabe, were 50-50 partners. McCabe became sole owner of the company in October 2005.

In both searches of Stevens' offices, FBI agents seized documents involving the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board. The organization was created in 2003 in legislation by Ted Stevens to provide federal grants to companies to promote Alaska seafood. It has distributed between $5 million and nearly $10 million a year in grants.

At least three of the beneficiaries of grants from the board paid consulting fees to Ben Stevens. Metcalfe complained to the APOC last year that those fees were thinly disguised "kickbacks," but the commission only ruled on a technicality: Ben Stevens' failure to disclose his chairmanship of the board in 2004. It fined him $150.

Ben Stevens resigned from the marketing board about six months ago, according to its executive director, Bill Hines. Hines wouldn't say whether he has recently spoken to federal agents.

"I think that's between me and the FBI," said Hines, an employee of the U.S. Commerce Department.

Ben Stevens was a member of the Senate Ethics Committee and some of the seized documents were connected to that committee, including a 2003 ethics complaint against former Sen. Jerry Ward. An investigation concluded the complaint was without merit.

No Leniency: Ailing Gambino Captain Sent To Prison For 12 Years (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- An ailing 74-year-old Gambino crime family captain who once recommended an undercover FBI agent for mob membership asked a judge for leniency Tuesday but received more than 12 years in prison instead.

"Give me one more shot," Gregory DePalma, who uses a wheelchair, asked U.S. District Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein, who presided over a trial in which DePalma was convicted of racketeering.

"If you were in my shoes," the judge replied, "I don't think you would."

"You gotta do what you gotta do, so let's do it," DePalma then grumbled shortly before he was sentenced to 12 years and seven months in prison for crimes he committed after he was freed from prison in early 2003.

When the judge rejected the Department of Probation's suggestion that DePalma receive less than the minimum of 12 years called for by sentencing guidelines and imposed the sentence, DePalma said, "I'll be dead maybe in about five."

The judge, calling DePalma "a man thoroughly immersed in criminal activity," said he could not be lenient because leniency toward DePalma in the past had not led him to avoid crime when he was out of prison.

DePalma was convicted June 6 by a jury in a case that featured the exploits of Joaquin Garcia, a rotund FBI agent who capped a career of disguises by posing as "Big Jack" Falcone.

DePalma believed Garcia's act enough that he recommended he be made a member of the crime family. Before that could happen, DePalma and 31 others were arrested.

DePalma's lawyers had protested the government's use of sophisticated bugging devices placed in their client's cellular telephone that enabled investigators to listen to conversations even when the telephone was off.

Lawyer John L. Pollok had accused the government of turning DePalma into a "human microphone" with the eavesdropping devices.

The judge said the government received proper approval from courts as it steadily increased the scope of its audio surveillance, trying to destroy the new leadership of the crime family during a three-year probe.

The ruling cleared the way for the government's use of parts of 5,000 hours of taped conversations showing DePalma working energetically from 2003 to 2005 extorting restaurants, construction companies and a Bronx topless nightclub, where he was introduced to the undercover agent.

DePalma once was photographed with Frank Sinatra and enjoyed exaggerating or boasting of his connections.

On tapes, DePalma described getting a former manager for Liza Minnelli to finance a $12,000 eight-day trip for mob wives to Las Vegas. Prosecutors called the man one of DePalma's victims.

At a trial in which DePalma used an oxygen tube in his nose, prosecutors made his health an issue, telling jurors he had boasted after a 1999 racketeering guilty plea that he had duped the judge with an illness act worthy of an Academy Award.

They played tapes of him bragging that he wore an oxygen mask and did not shave for a week before sentencing, leading the judge to say he had never sentenced a man so sick.

On Tuesday, DePalma told the judge he wanted to show prosecutors his swollen legs to prove how ill he remained from heart and lung problems.

The judge disallowed it, but he did engage DePalma in conversation in which both of them alluded to their military careers and talked about the perils of aging.

DePalma said the 72-year-old judge seemed in better health than he was, a fact the judge did not deny.

"Then again," the judge told DePalma, "I haven't lived your life."

Judge Has No Mercy For Gambino Gabber (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 27, 2006

Gabby Gambino capo Greg DePalma had a few things to say before a Manhattan federal judge sentenced him to 12 years and seven months in prison on racketeering charges yesterday.

"Give me one more shot," DePalma said in asking for leniency.

"If you were in my shoes," Judge Alvin Hellerstein replied, "I don't think you would."

Hellerstein noted that DePalma, 74, had returned to a life of crime after pleading guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 and receiving a break at sentencing then.

DePalma, who in his salad days posed beside Frank Sinatra and fellow wiseguys for an infamous 1976 photo, was brought into court in a wheelchair, hooked up to an oxygen tank.

He has had a lung removed and suffers from a heart ailment that has left his legs swollen and cracked. Attorney John Meringolo asked that DePalma be allowed to show the judge his legs but was turned down.

"I'll be dead, maybe in about five [years]," DePalma predicted.

In addition to the prison time, Hellerstein ordered DePalma to pay some $70,000 in restitution to two extortion victims.

"How much?" DePalma asked. "Can I give them my Social Security check?"

DePalma's motor-mouth was intercepted by a bug the FBI placed in his cell phone with the help of undercover agent Joaquin Garcia, who so deeply infiltrated the mob that DePalma was ready to sponsor his Mafia induction.

Defense attorney Martin Geduldig told Hellerstein that his client could never again return to a life of crime because the recordings had implicated so many mobsters that DePalma's life was in jeopardy.

"Five thousand hours of recorded conversations had the effect of making him an informant for the FBI," Geduldig said. "He's put himself in a position where he can't go back to some of his old compatriots."

Politicos Mull Data Retention By Web Hosts, Registrars (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 27, 2006

Broadening their inquiry beyond ISPs, they ponder mandates for storage of user records to aid child porn investigators.

WASHINGTON--Politicians on Tuesday urged domain name registries and Web hosting companies to do more to keep illicit child pornography off the Internet and indicated mandatory retention of user records is an option under consideration.

At a hearing here convened by a U.S. House of Representatives subcommittee on oversight and investigations, Michigan Rep. Bart Stupak, the panel's top-ranking Democrat, asked company representatives how they would feel about being subject to a law in the works that would require Internet service providers to retain customer records for one year.

"If we do compel data retention, is there any reason Web hosting sites should be treated differently than ISPs?" Stupak asked the general counsel for GoDaddy.com, which bills itself as the largest domain name registrar in the world, and the CEO of Blue Gravity Communications, a New Jersey-based Web hosting firm. Both executives were participants on a panel at the latest in a series of hearings on the topic of online child exploitation.

"A year might be a little long," replied Thomas Krwawecz, Blue Gravity's CEO, later adding: "It would be something we would definitely be open to if there were some guidelines for maintaining that data for a specific period of time."

Christine Jones, general counsel for GoDaddy, said requirements to maintain particular customer data for hosting companies and ISPs alike would be "productive" for law enforcement. But the data, she added, should be limited to identifying information about subscribers, such as IP addresses and credit card numbers, and should not include the content of their communications.

Privacy and industry groups have generally voiced opposition to calls for mandatory data retention, which have become a fixture on the congressional agenda ever since Attorney General Alberto Gonzales touted the practice's necessity earlier this year.

Opponents to the mandate argue that existing laws already provide law enforcement with ample tools. For instance, a 1996 federal law called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act requires a practice known as "data preservation"--that is, Internet providers must retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity." Another federal law requires Internet service providers to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding that report to the appropriate police agency.

Some companies, such as Comcast, already voluntarily retain user data for longer periods. Blue Gravity, which hosts primarily adult pornography sites, retains data for seven to 14 days but plans to increase that window to 30 days to keep up with prevailing industry practices, Krwawecz said.

Last week, Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, said she hoped to introduce by the end of this week a proposal that would require Internet service companies to retain customer records for a period of one year. She described the proposal, whose language is still not finalized, as requiring maintenance only of information useful in locating a customer, such as an IP address, and not about the content of his or her communications.

A DeGette spokesman said Tuesday that the congresswoman continues to negotiate the language with Republican Reps. Joe Barton and Ed Whitfield. He could not predict exactly when the bill would be introduced or what its precise language would be.

At least two possibilities could be in play. One form of data retention legislation could require Internet providers and perhaps social networking sites and search engines to record for a year or two which IP address is used by which user. The other form would be far broader, requiring companies to record data such as the identities of e-mail correspondents, logs of who sent and received instant messages (but not the content of those communications), and the addresses of Web pages visited.

With or without such a mandate, the hosting and domain name firms should conduct more self-policing of the sites that live on their servers, said Whitfield, chairman of the oversight and investigations subcommittee. "Is there any kind of technology to monitor (for child pornography sites) that would be available for either GoDaddy or Blue Gravity?" he asked. "Is there technology you could acquire to do this in a more proactive manner?"

"If I had a staff of 1,000 people that could go and review all of our hosted pages every day, we would," said GoDaddy's Jones, adding that the company did investigate nearly 2,000 customers over allegations of child pornography or inappropriate child modeling Web sites in the last year. "But at $1.99 per month for a hosting account, the economics are not really there for us to do that."

D.C. Police Seize Electronics From Home Where Lawyer Was Killed (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 27, 2006

Police have seized computers and other electronics from the Dupont Circle home in Northwest Washington where lawyer Robert Wone was stabbed to death Aug. 2, according to an affidavit in a search warrant for the house that was recently made public.

The evidence, which included two laptops, a desktop computer, diskettes and USB drives, was among the material police confiscated during their monthlong search of the home at 1509 Swann St. N.W.

Wone, 32, who was the general counsel for Radio Free Asia, was found shortly before midnight "showing no signs of life" in the second-floor bedroom of the house, owned by his college friend Joseph Price, a partner at Arent Fox, according to the Aug. 4 affidavit by Detective William Xanten III. Price's partner, Victor Zaborsky, a marketing manager at the International Dairy Foods Association, co-owns the house. A third man, Dylan Ward, also lived there. All three were home the night of the murder.

One of the occupants told police that an intruder had come through the back door, but police say there were no signs of forced entry.

After their initial search of the house, police asked the court for an additional search warrant for electronic equipment because Wone and "one of the occupants" had e-mailed before the visit and had made phone calls in the "recent time period before the decedent was killed," according to the affidavit. In a separate search warrant for Price's office computer, police say that Price had spoken with Wone before he was killed.

But the material collected by police has not led to any arrests. Police believe the crime scene was tampered with before they arrived and are awaiting the results of forensic tests that will identify the blood that appeared to have been cleaned up in the area where Wone was found.

Supreme Court Accepts Arizona Death Penalty Case (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, September 27, 2006

The Supreme Court accepted an appeal Tuesday from Arizona, which wants to execute a twice-convicted killer who says his lawyer didn't do enough to ward off a death sentence.

Justices said they would review a decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said a lower court should consider Jeffrey Landrigan's claims that his lawyer was ineffective.

Landrigan escaped from an Oklahoma prison in 1989, where he was serving a 20-year term for murdering an acquaintance. A month later, he killed Chester Dyer, who picked up men on the Phoenix streets by flashing large sums of money.

As Landrigan and the man were drinking beer in the victim's Phoenix apartment, Landrigan strangled Dyer with an electrical cord and repeatedly punctured him with a screwdriver. He was convicted of killing Dyer and sentenced to death.

Dale Baich, who represents Landrigan in his appeals, said his client might have won a life term instead of a death sentence if his trial lawyer had submitted evidence that he was predisposed to violence and suffered brain damage that made him unable to appreciate his crimes.

Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said Landrigan told the trial judge he did not want his lawyer to introduce evidence that would have mitigated against a sentence of death.

The Arizona Supreme Court, a federal district judge and a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit all rejected Landrigan's claims before the full appellate decided otherwise in March.

The case is Schriro v. Landrigan, 05-1575.

Biker Brawl Trial Opens In Las Vegas (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-Videotape images show rival motorcycle gang members wielding guns, knives, wrenches and chairs in a brawl that killed three and injured at least a dozen in a southern Nevada casino in 2002.

Federal prosecutors are expected on Tuesday to tell jurors that the bikers plotted to attack the rival Mongols gang at the Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino after years of friction erupted into violence at a crowded motorcycle rally.

They are the first of 42 men - from California, Washington, Arizona, Alaska and Nevada, and ranging in age from 28 to 63 - to stand trial in the brawl. All face the possibility of life in prison if convicted of the most serious charge, racketeering-attempted murder.

Each has pleaded not guilty, and defense lawyers say the men will argue they were attacked first.

"The tapes are going to reveal clearly that the Hells Angels were threatened and were engaged in lawful self-defense," said lawyer David Chesnoff, who represents defendant Calvin Schaefer of Chandler, Ariz.

Chesnoff has argued previously that police knew trouble was brewing and federal agents missed a chance to prevent violence at the 2002 Laughlin rally, an annual event that draws tens of thousands of motorcycle enthusiasts to the Colorado River resort town about 100 miles southeast of Las Vegas.

Two Hells Angels were shot to death and a Mongols member died of stab wounds at the event. Another Hells Angels member was later found shot to death near his wrecked Harley-Davidson motorcycle on Interstate 40 in California, about 100 miles from Laughlin.

Court officials say the trial could take three months or more, with 11 defense lawyers questioning witnesses.

How A Google Search Can Become A Security Threat (NYT)

By David Strom

DOJ_NMG_0069789

WHEN Ralph Nader wrote “Unsafe at Any Speed” in 1965, he exposed how certain design decisions had made some automobiles inherently unsafe. Much the same can be said for Web sites these days.

Many sites contain inherent design flaws that leave them ripe for exploitation. Unlike lack of seat belts in cars, these flaws are not immediately obvious and the fixes are not simple.

One widespread vulnerability can be exploited through a practice that has come to be known as Google hacking. The term refers to the use of an Internet search site — Yahoo, Ask, Google or any other — to uncover useful and compromising information that has been inadvertently left on a Web site.

“Some Web site owners may simply not understand that their sites aren’t as secure as they think,” said Jeff Williams, chief executive of a Columbia, Md., consulting company, Aspect Security. Mr. Williams is also the chairman of the Open Web Application Security Project, a Web site that describes many of the vulnerabilities and provides tips on how to prevent or fix them.

Examples of the material that can be uncovered include the locations of Web security cameras, administrator passwords for applications like payroll or other personnel matters, private phone numbers for company executives and even the contents of Internet commerce transactions.

In most cases, intruders can enter sites and extract data without leaving a trace because the information is already indexed and stored on the servers of various Internet search sites.

“There is a lot of privileged informa- tion that wasn’t supposed to be played out in the public that is available with these sorts of attacks,” said Jeff Pettorino, a senior consultant in the Global Security Consulting department of VeriSign and a former p olice officer in Colorado.

Much of the data indexed by the search sites can be used for nefarious means, and site owners may not realize that sensitive or confidential information is so readily available as part of a search index.

“If you are dealing with sensitive data or data that you care about, you have to think about these exploits,” said Michael Howard, a senior security program manager at Microsoft in Redmond, Wash.

As more businesses put up Web sites, the chances increase that more of this information is available.

“A business owner has risks even if they aren’t doing e-commerce and if they just have a Web site,” said Shena Crowe, an agent in the F.B.I.’s San Francisco field office who has helped prosecute cybercriminals who used Google hacks and other techniques. “Once you are plugged into the Web, your backyard can become open, and it is easy to have your information taken from you.”

“At any given time, you can find thousands of sites that are subject to Google hacks,” says Howard Schmidt, a former White House cybersecurity adviser and now a private security consultant in Issaquah, Wash.

Johnny Long, a security researcher with the Computer Sciences Corporation in El Segundo, Calif., said he had found vulnerabilities “in every Web site and application I have audited.”

Mr. Long, who maintains a Web site cataloging Web security vulnerabilities, johnny.ihackstuff.com, added, “Some Google hacking style vulnerabilities are more revealing than others, but it is a pervasive threat.”

Google acknowledges that its index can be misused. “Search engines reflect what is on the Web,” said Barry Schnitt, a Google spokesman. “We still work to try to prevent and stop exploits and encourage Webmasters to employ best practices and effective security for their Web sites.” On Google’s site you can find tips on how to remove sensitive data from its index, for example.

Law enforcement is just stepping up to the challenges presented by search-based Web site intrusions.

“This is very underreported,” says Kevin Patten, network services manager with the Florida Department of Law Enforcement in Tallahassee. “There are far more site breaches that take place than are actually reported. It is an embarrassing incident, and to report it could be monetarily devastating for a company.”

Google hacks are an issue for both large and small businesses, but for different reasons.

Smaller companies generally have simpler sites but may be less sophisticated when it comes to auditing their software. And smaller businesses often rely on independent Web contractors that may not have the ability to build secure applications.

Larger companies usually have better security practices, but they use hundreds or even thousands of Web applications, which must be maintained by more people — some of whom may try to get at sensitive information they shouldn't see.

"Google hacking can find application vulnerabilities in many applications at once, so it works better as a shotgun than a rifle," Mr. Williams of Aspect Security said. "These vulnerabilities can be found and exploited with a minimum of effort by relatively unskilled attackers."

One way for businesses to protect themselves is to try the Google hacking methods themselves, using tips at johnny.ihackstuff.com and on the Owasp.org sites.

There are also free scanning tools that are available from numerous sites, including SPIdynamics.com, Qualys.com and ScanAlert.com. The tools check for open ports that allow outside communication with particular software programs or points of entry that could be used to compromise a Web site.

But using scanners is just the first step.

Business owners need to specifically address the security audits and testing services when they hire outside programmers to build their sites.

"What you have to get across," said Mr. Schmidt the security consultant, "is that 'I am not buying a service, I am buying a secure service.' " The Owasp site, he said, offers boilerplate contract language that can be used in dealing with programmers.

And the vigilance must be continuous. "It is always an arms race between security professionals and cybercriminals," said Scott Larson, a former F.B.I. computer intrusion manager who now works at Stroz Friedberg, a technical services firm in New York.

Even after "Unsafe at Any Speed" shook up the automobile industry, it took a while for Detroit to make safety a priority in designing cars. "And it's going to take years for the software industry to start building applications that adequately address security," said Mr. Williams of Aspect Security.

For wary business owners, it's time to buckle up.

Surging Losses, But Few Victims In Data Breaches (NYT)

By Steve Lohr

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

THE theft last May seemed scary. The personal information of more than 26 million military veterans was stolen from the home of an employee at the Department of Veterans Affairs. The personal details on the worker's laptop and an extra hard drive included veterans' names, birth dates and Social Security numbers — the nuggets most sought after by identity thieves.

Privacy groups warned darkly that 26 million people could become victims, politicians voiced outrage, and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales vowed to show "zero tolerance" in cases of identity theft traced to the lost data of veterans.

Last month, the case was solved, when three teenagers were charged in what proved to be a routine residential burglary in suburban Maryland. They had taken jewelry and cash, along with the laptop and hard drive. "They were a bunch of young thieves breaking into homes," said Lt. Mike Mancuso, deputy director for the major crime division of the Montgomery County Police Department. "They didn't know what they had."

The veterans' laptop episode underscores the crucial distinction between data loss and malicious data theft — a distinction that has often been glossed over or ignored in the recent wave of alarming disclosures of data breaches at government agencies, universities, companies and hospitals. In most cases, the consequences — financial and otherwise — of the data losses have been slight.

In the last 12 months alone, the personal records of nearly 73 million people, from Social Security numbers to credit-card accounts, have been lost or stolen, in reported incidents compiled by ID Analytics, a San Diego company that provides fraud-detection services to banks, cellphone operators and other companies. The total is the equivalent of nearly one in four Americans.

But while high-profile data breaches are common, there is no evidence of a surge in identity theft or financial fraud as a result. In fact, there is scant evidence that identity theft and financial fraud have increased at all. Even when computer networks are cracked into, and troves of personal information intentionally stolen, fraudsters can typically exploit only a tiny fraction of it.

Credit-card fraud is the most common crime of identity thieves, accounting for about two-thirds of cases. Banks and credit-card systems like Visa and MasterCard say they have seen surprisingly little fraud traceable to incidents of computer data lost or stolen.

"The threat of identity theft from data losses is being greatly exaggerated," said Fred H. Cate, the director of the Center for Applied Cybersecurity Research at Indiana University in Bloomington. "And that's because a lot of people have fallen into the trap of equating data loss with identity theft."

There may be a longer-than-expected lag between data breaches and online crime, law enforcement authorities concede. But all the personal information lost or stolen recently, they warn, is an ominous development. "We don't have the correlation to crime yet, but the potential is certainly there," said Raul Roldan, a special agent at the Federal Bureau of Investigation and section chief at the government's Internet Crime Complaint Center.

"Look at the crime on the Internet," Mr. Roldan said. "Most all of it is initiated by misusing identity information to disguise, mislead or impersonate someone else" — from pornography to phishing, a common fraud that usually involves using phony e-mail messages or Web sites to get a person's bank account or credit-card numbers.

One explanation as to why there has not been more crime recently, some computer security experts say, is that the volume of personal information lost or stolen might not have increased much over the last year or two. What has changed, they contend, is the attention given to data breaches.

The environment changed after the disclosure in February 2005 that thieves had duped the world's largest commercial data broker, ChoicePoint, into handing over personal information on more than 150,000 consumers.

In the aftermath, anxiety about the security of private consumer information rose, as did political pressure to take steps to help consumers. There has been a proliferation of state laws requiring companies to publicly disclose security breaches. By now, laws requiring companies to notify consumers when personal data has been lost or stolen have been adopted in 32 states.

"What's happened in the last 18 months is not an explosion in data loss and data theft," said Mark Rasch, a former Justice Department prosecutor who is now a legal consultant in Bethesda, Md., specializing in computer security. "It's an explosion of laws requiring notification of data loss."

Identity theft is not predominantly a computer crime, at least not yet. The most common forms of data loss, surveys say, are lost or stolen credit cards, wallets or checkbooks. In the majority of cases, identity thieves are family members, relatives, neighbors and co-workers. It seems that toxic social networks — not leaky computer networks — are the real hazard.

"Even if you solve the data breach problem, you will solve only a small part of the identity theft problem," said Mike Cook, a co-founder of ID Analytics.

Yet Mr. Cook, like other security experts, predicts a looming problem as more commerce moves to the Internet, a virtual marketplace of faceless transactions and instant credit. Lost and stolen consumer records, he said, can only worsen the problem.

Data breaches vary considerably, and so does the risk that financial fraud or identity theft may result. Customer or employee records on a computer disk or tape that have simply been lost in shipment — fallen off a truck, for example — are at little risk, computer security experts note.

Not all thefts are the same, either. Criminals who are after computer hardware, as in the Veterans Affairs case, are unlikely to exploit the personal information that happens to be stored inside. But the thefts that carry more risk, security experts say, involve criminals whose target is personal information, as in the ChoicePoint incident. Or when computer hackers last year got the account information of 40 million credit-card holders from CardSystems Solutions, a payment processor.

The kind of personal information stolen is also important. Pilfered credit-card accounts can be used to make fraudulent purchases, but those numbers alone are not enough to create false identities to open new credit or bank accounts. Federal law limits a consumer's liability to $50 for purchases made with a stolen credit card, and major card companies, including Visa, MasterCard and American Express, have zero liability policies.

Regardless of the data breach, a rise in financial fraud has not surfaced. Visa and MasterCard report that about 2 percent of the card accounts lost or stolen in the last 18 months have been used to make fraudulent purchases. That is within the range of the 1.5 percent and 4 percent of consumers who reported being victims of financial fraud or identity theft, surveys say.

Card companies say that fraud losses in 2005 over all were about 6 cents per $100 for merchandise bought on credit, a low level that has varied little in the last few years. (Numbers were much higher years ago; for example, in 1992, losses accounted for nearly 16 cents per $100 for merchandise bought on credit.)

"The amount of fraud from these data breaches is remarkably small," said Chris Thom, the chief risk officer for MasterCard.

In recent years, the card companies have used increasingly sophisticated computer technologies — like predictive modeling and neural network software — to track and curb fraud. Such tools can spot suspicious purchasing patterns, even as the purchases are being made. A result is that fraud rates have been cut by more than half over the years. "Despite the data breaches, we've been able to keep fraud at very low levels," said Nancy Hilgers, the vice president of processing and emerging products at Visa. "That shows that the technologies we use to control fraud are working."

Credit-card fraud cost banks in the United States $1.1 billion last year, according to bank reports compiled by The Nilson Report, a card-industry newsletter. That is a large but manageable number for the banking world, and it is a figure that raises questions about some alarming estimates of the nation's losses from identity theft, like a study issued by the Federal Trade Commission in 2003 that placed the annual loss at $48 billion.

Not all financial losses from identity theft are credit-card fraud. Merchant losses from fraud, for example, are estimated to be more than banks' losses, perhaps up to twice as much. But most industry analysts are skeptical that the actual losses are near the $48 billion estimate, which is widely quoted.

A study earlier this year by the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics came up with a far lower figure: $3.2 billion in identity theft losses during the six-month period it studied.

The data breaches of the past year or so still point to a worrying vulnerability. "It shows that punks and the criminal fraternity do have the ability to steal personal information," said Mr. Thom, the risk specialist at MasterCard.

There are already illicit Web sites that trade and sell stolen credit-card and personal information. The fear is that this cottage industry in crime will develop rapidly — exploiting the low costs and global reach of the Internet — into a broader, deeper and highly efficient worldwide market for fraud, said Naomi B. Lefkovitz, a lawyer with the F.T.C.'s division of privacy and identity protection. Combating the threat, she said, will require steady improvement in industry countermeasures, law enforcement and consumer awareness.

Even today's skeptics have qualms. "I do think the challenge to the future of computer security is tremendous," said Mr. Cate of Indiana University's cybersecurity center. "My concern is that by overstating the current problem, we will end up paying less attention and responding less effectively when far more serious problems do surface. It's like the boy who cried wolf."

Execution Sought For Two D.C. Men (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Federal prosecutors have filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty against two D.C. men charged with running a violent drug gang in Southeast.

The men, Antwuan Ball and David Wilson, reportedly led the Congress Park Crew, which authorities say dealt hundreds of kilograms of crack cocaine in Southeast for more than a decade. The gang resorted to homicide, assault and armed robbery, authorities said.

The move to seek the death penalty marks the second time in a year that the U.S. Department of Justice has declared it will seek capital punishment in the District.

In the other case, Larry Gooch, described as an enforcer in the M Street Crew in Northeast, has been charged in five killings and is expected to go to trial in January.

Only two capital murder cases have gone to trial in the District since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976. The District has no statute for the death penalty, but capital punishment can be pursued in federal cases if authorized by the U.S. attorney general.

However, there are questions about whether the move to seek the death penalty against Ball and Wilson came too late.

Judge Roberts wrote that the Justice Department did not comply with his order setting a Sept. 15 deadline for a decision on whether to seek capital punishment. On Monday, the U.S. attorney's office filed the notice to seek the death penalty and asked Judge Roberts to reconsider.

"The process took as long as it did not because the government was insensitive to the speedy trial rights of the defendants, but because we were giving additional and extra careful consideration to defendants' interests," Assistant U.S. Attorneys Glenn S. Leon and Ann H. Petalas told Judge Roberts in a memo.

The filings also state that additional deliberations in the case and the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks contributed to the delay.

Attorneys for Ball and Wilson could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the District-based nonprofit Death Penalty Information Center, said yesterday that the Bush administration seems to have pursued death-penalty cases in jurisdictions where capital punishment is banned.

"There is a lot of discretion," Mr. Dieter said. "The current distraction appears more aggressive than the prior administration in seeking the death penalty in jurisdictions that don't have their own death penalty."

Mr. Dieter also said gang-related cases seem to be getting more attention in recent years.

"Gangs are not just one of the highlighted areas in the federal system, but states are looking at them, too," he said.

In Greenbelt, federal prosecutors have begun putting on trial those suspected of belonging to the MS-13 gang, including nine defendants facing the death penalty.

In the District, prosecutors filed charges against Ball, Wilson and more than a dozen other Congress Park Crew suspects under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, which was passed more than 30 years ago to target organized crime. The indictment includes four first-degree murder charges.

Prosecutors said Ball fatally shot Troy Lewis on Jan. 23, 1996. Ball and Wilson also are accused of conspiring to kill members of a rival gang, the 10th Place/Trenton Place Crew. Authorities said the two gangs have fought turf wars since the mid-1990s.

In addition, prosecutors said Ball used "intimidation and physical force" to keep witnesses to slayings silent.

Prosecutors said Ball used to be a lieutenant in the 1-5 Mob, whose leader, Tommy Edelin, faced the death penalty but was sentenced to life in prison in 2004.

The only other death-penalty case to go to trial in the District ended last year with the defendants sentenced to life in prison. Jurors deadlocked on giving the death penalty to Murder Inc. gang members Kevin L. Gray and Rodney Moore.

US Arrest Threat To Gambling Executives (FT)

By Andrew Ward And Roger Blitz

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

Louisiana police have warned all online gambling companies to stop accepting bets in the state or risk having their executives and directors arrested if they visit the US.

The police official responsible for the arrest of Peter Dicks, former chairman of Sportingbet, on a Louisiana warrant in New York three weeks ago, said the state was pressing ahead with its clampdown, in spite of what appears to be a rethink about the case in other political jurisdictions.

In his first interview since the arrest, Captain Joe Lentini, head of the casino section of Louisiana's Police Gaming Enforcement division, said the state had issued four arrest warrants for individuals associated with Sportingbet, including Mr Dicks.

He would not name the other three but said it was reasonable to assume they were executives or directors.

Other online gambling companies were also under investigation and their executives and directors were also at risk of arrest, said Mr Lentini, without naming which companies.

It is understood Louisiana has sealed warrants against more than 50 people working or connected to at least a dozen online gambling or related companies.

"We have agents all over the state working this daily," he said. "There are other sites we're looking into."

Louisiana is one of several US states that has its own laws prohibiting internet gambling.

Mr Lentini's comments came as lawyers continued to wrangle over the fate of Mr Dicks, who is scheduled to appear in a New York court on Thursday to learn whether he will be extradited to Louisiana.

Mr Dicks was allowed to return to the UK on bail two weeks ago to give New York and Louisiana authorities time to examine questions about the legitimacy of the arrest warrant.

George Pataki, governor of New York, has withdrawn the New York warrant required for his arrest and extradition. The case has also reached the office of Kathleen Blanco, governor of Louisiana, which last week said it was "doing due diligence on the case and reviewing the entire situation".

The New York hearing comes at a critical time for the industry, as the US Senate prepares to decide whether to pass a bill tightening federal laws against online gambling. The bill is being championed by Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, who is trying to get an online gambling provision attached to a weighty bill, such as defence or security.

Mr Lentini said the hold-up in the Dicks case was caused by a "glitch" in New York state laws that appeared to allow extradition only in cases where the alleged crime was committed in one of the two states involved.

Mr Dicks' lawyers have argued that their client cannot be extradited because he has not been in Louisiana for more than 20 years and therefore cannot have committed a crime there.

But Mr Lentini said his agency would press ahead with its pursuit of online gambling companies, even if Mr Dicks wins his bid to avoid extradition.

Gang Named In Violent Spell (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

2 alleged members of growing Hispanic group on trial for conspiracy

Mata, viola, controla.

The Spanish words for "murder," "rape" and "control" are the battle cry for La Mara Salvatrucha, a violent street gang known as MS-13 and responsible for a recent wave of attacks across Southern Maryland, according to federal prosecutors.

The racketeering conspiracy trial against two alleged MS-13 members -- Edgar Alberto Ayala, known as "Pony," and Oscar Ramos Velasquez, known as "Casper" -- started Tuesday with allegations that the men participated in a well-oiled criminal organization responsible for at least six homicides and five attempted killings.

Formed in California by Salva doran immigrants who have spread eastward, MS-13 "is without any doubt a criminal enterprise," Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson told jurors Tuesday. "The objective of this gang is to kill people."

Dubbed one of the nation's most violent and fastest-growing gangs, MS-13 has a relatively low profile outside of the Washington suburbs. But experts say its strength is growing throughout Maryland as the overall Hispanic population expands its reach beyond Prince George's and Montgomery counties.

"We know that they've moved up into the Laurel area," said Gaithersburg police Detective Patrick Word, president of the Mid-Atlantic Regional Gang Investigators Network. "They keep inching their way north."

Last month, Baltimore County police charged four suspected MS-13 gang members, accusing them in the stabbing deaths of two men whose bodies were found near a school in Arbutus in January. Officials say the killings are the first related to MS-13 activity in the county.

Substantial signs of the gang's activity have also been seen in Howard County. Anne Arundel, Baltimore and Harford counties recently formed new efforts to combat gang activity, concerned in part about MS-13 as well as other violent street groups moving in.

The federal trial under way in Greenbelt is expected to last up to two months, and the inner workings of MS-13 in Maryland might be exposed in a courtroom for the first time. Prosecutors indicted nearly two dozen suspects in the case, including a Baltimore carpenter. Three have pleaded guilty.

The lead prosecutor Tuesday described Velasquez and Ayala as integral players -- or at least knowing bystanders -- in murders, rapes and assaults against gang rivals as well as new recruits between 2001 and this year.

Wilkinson promised to show jurors over the course of the trial how the gang operated nationally and locally.

Showing jurors pictures of both men supposedly flashing gang hand signs in the shape of a claw, Wilkinson described the pair as members of different cliques but bonded by a similar MS-13 mission.

"The cliques are nothing more than franchises," Wilkinson said.

They all pledge allegiance to the gang by attacking sworn rivals, wearing gang colors of blue and white, paying dues, attending meetings and initiating new members through a violent beating ritual that lasts 13 seconds. The head of each clique, the prosecutors said, is known as "the word."

Neither Velasquez nor Ayala was identified as a leader, but Wilkinson said witnesses for the prosecution would finger them as participants or observers in retaliatory murders and gang rapes of teenage girls.

Defense attorneys told jurors Tuesday that being gang members would not be enough to prove the conspiracy charges outlined in the seven-count rack eteering indictment.

"My client never killed any one," Ayala's attorney Gary Ticknor said. "My client has never raped anyone."

The defense lawyers also drew comparisons in the case to a pope who had been a member of the Hitler Youth and a presi dent who had been a member of the Ku Klux Klan, saying that all members are not necessarily guilty of all crimes committed in a group's name.

MS-13's Primary Goal Is Killing, Prosecutor Says At Start Of Trial (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Members of the MS-13 street gang live by the motto "We kill, we rape, we control" and follow the orders of leaders known as "The Word," a prosecutor said yesterday as the federal racketeering trial of two alleged gang members began.

MS-13, a violent Latino gang also known as Mara Salvatrucha, has rules that include a standing edict to kill rival gang members, Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson said in her opening statement in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt.

"The objective of the gang is to kill people," Wilkinson said.

Prosecutors said in court papers that the gang has 10,000 members in 10 states and the District, as well as in El Salvador, Honduras and Mexico. Wilkinson said MS-13 has many cliques, which she compared to business franchises.

Each clique has a leader, "The Word," and each leader has a top lieutenant, "The Second," Wilkinson said.

The defendants, Oscar Ramos "Casper" Velasquez, 21, of Baltimore and Edgar Alberto "Pony" Ayala, 28, of Suitland, are the first two of 19 scheduled to go on trial. They are being tried under the federal RICO law, which was enacted in the early 1970s to target Mafia groups.

MS-13 gang members have conspired to commit murder, rape, kidnapping and robbery and to obstruct justice by attacking or intimidating witnesses, federal prosecutors allege in their original indictment and two superseding indictments.

The original indictment charges the gang with six homicides and four attempted murders between April 2003 and June 2005. Eight of the attacks were in Prince George's County, the other two in Montgomery County.

A superseding murder indictment handed up last week cites an additional case, from January 2005, when, it alleges, two MS-13 gang members fired into a group of youths sitting outside an apartment building in Fairfax County. One man was killed and two juveniles were wounded in that assault.

Neither Velasquez nor Ayala is charged with murder. Neither faces the possibility of the death penalty if convicted, although nine defendants do.

In their opening arguments, defense attorneys for Velasquez and Ayala said prosecutors were trying to convict their clients for the actions of others.

Gary A. Ticknor, Ayala's defense attorney, told jurors that President Harry S. Truman was a member of the Ku Klux Klan for a time. "You can be a member of a horrible organization and be a decent human being," he said.

Richard C. Bittner, Velasquez's attorney, said the government's case against his client amounts to "guilt by association."

According to prosecutors, Velasquez and others accused of being MS-13 members sexually assaulted two teenage girls at a "skipping party" -- in which students ditch school -- May 12, 2003. In her opening statement, Wilkinson said Velasquez wielded a gun during the assault, adding that the victims were 15 and 16 at the time.

Velasquez is also accused of helping assault rival gang members outside a Langley Park nightclub in September 2004 and of attending an MS-13 meeting at which dues were paid.

Ayala is accused of driving with fellow gang members to the Fairfax County apartment building where a man was fatally shot. Ayala is also accused of giving false testimony to a Prince George's grand jury that investigated the beating death of Ashley Antonio Urias in May 2004. Wilkinson said in her initial statement that Ayala was covering up for MS-13 members.

Deaths Of 3 D.C. Teens Shock City (WP)

By Allison Klein And Martin Weil

First there was a 14-year-old shot in the back in a public housing complex. About 13 hours later, police found a lifeless 15-year-old at a construction site. And seven hours after that, a 16-year-old died after he was shot in the head.

The teenagers were found dead in a 24-hour span in the District on Sunday and Monday, raising alarm across the city. D.C. police said none of the three cases appears to be related, but all three are homicides. That raises to 15 the number of slayings of victims in the city this year who were younger than 18. In all of last year there were 12.

Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said last night that a man, about 50, had been taken into custody in the death of the 15-year-old, Dominick A. Dixon. Ramsey said the man had made a statement about the killing to police.

No arrests have been reported in the other two killings. Police said last night that Dixon's death was a homicide. But they did not say how he was slain, and autopsy results had not been released.

After a search near where Dixon's body was found Monday, police discovered a knife late last night. The youth's mother, Gloria Dixon, said police indicated to her that the small folding knife was "part of the crime."

The teenager's body was found in boxer shorts at a work site near his home. His mother has said she thought he had been strangled. Even after the discovery of the knife last night, she said she had not seen knife wounds on her son's body.

Dixon also said police indicated to her that the man whom they were questioning apparently had been at an abandoned house near where the body was found.

She said she believed she had spoken to the man yesterday. She said the man had expressed sympathy for her son's death and told her, " 'I don't know who could have done this.' "

She added: "Maybe me talking to him made him" give a statement to police

Ramsey said he could not recall a 24-hour period that claimed so many young lives. "You hope it's something that's just an aberration," said Ramsey, in his ninth year as chief.

All but two of this year's juvenile victims were teenagers. The others were a 2-year-old boy and a five-month-old boy. Only one victim was female: Cynthia Gray, 17, killed last month after shielding her godson from bullets on a Southeast Washington street.

The uptick in juvenile homicides echoes the horrific toll of 2004, when 24 youths were slain in the city, causing great concern among residents, community activists, D.C. police and the D.C. Council, which held a hearing that explored the root causes of youth violence.

Two adults were slain in the same 24-hour stretch this week.

The burst of violence comes toward the end of the city's crime emergency, which was declared in July after a spike in homicides and robberies. As part of the emergency, the city pushed back its juvenile curfew to 10 p.m., and police got $8 million for overtime and increased patrols across the city.

Ramsey and other police officials said the steps have had an impact on street violence. But he said he is not ready to ask for the crime emergency to be prolonged and added: "This runs a whole lot deeper than police deployment."

Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) said yesterday that he expects to extend the earlier curfew hours when they expire tomorrow and to introduce legislation to extend other provisions of the crime emergency legislation.

Council member Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), the Democratic mayoral nominee, said in a statement that he wants more than short-term fixes. He voted last summer against the crime emergency package.

Police said 14-year-old Andre Pee and 32-year-old Curtis Watkins were fatally shot about 11 p.m. on the dead-end block, which is notorious for drug dealing and gunfire. A 15-year-old was slain on the same block on New Year's Eve.

Pee had just started his first year at Ballou Senior High School. Police said they had picked him up twice this year for curfew violations.

On Monday, while authorities were sorting out what happened to Pee and Watkins, police were called to the work site near 51st Street and Sheriff Road NE, and found Dixon. He had been missing since Saturday. A family friend had found him with purple marks around his neck and wrists.

Dixon began the school year at Ronald H. Brown Middle School but was to start classes this week at Spingarn Senior High.

Police have released few details about his death.

The third juvenile victim was CeQuawn Brown, 16, who was found shot in his head in the 5300 block of Astor Place SE at 7:20 Monday night.

His mother, Nika Brown, said she had moved her son out of that neighborhood about a year earlier because she didn't think it was a safe place for him. But he went back there because that's where his friends were, she said.

Brown said she believes her son, an 11th-grader at Eastern High School, was targeted by someone in the neighborhood with whom he had an ongoing dispute.

"I just think that society is going against one another and taking matters into their own hands," Brown said.

The fifth killing in the 24-hour stretch happened Monday night, when William Downing, 25, of the 300 block of 44th Street SE was discovered in the 1900 block of 17th Street about 11:40 p.m.

Ronald Moten, co-founder of Peaceoholics, said yesterday that he thinks school being back in session is contributing to the violence. "A lot of people are clashing with each other, they are seeing each other again," he said. "When school starts up, they have to cross different paths and things are ignited once again."

Copper Thieves Get Killed Cutting Into Power Lines (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, September 27, 2006

At least seven men in five states have been fatally electrocuted since July while hacking through power lines to steal wire made of copper, which has been commanding near-record prices, police say.

“It is a growing problem with the rise in the price of metals,” says Lt. Shea Smith of the Greenville County Sheriff's Office in South Carolina. Smith says one thief died Aug. 30 and another July 7. Both were found with wire cutters and other tools that suggested their intent. He says at least 30 more copper thefts have occurred in the county so far this year.

“It's surprising to find two deaths in such a short time frame,” Shea says. “Most people who steal copper find the easiest way to do it,” such as taking it from a construction site.

"It's three (deaths) this year alone" in Detroit, says 2nd Deputy Chief James Tate of the city's police. On Monday, he says, the body of Walter Marihugh, 24, was discovered after he apparently tried to cut cables from a public lighting box in a vacant lot. Tate says a similar electrocution occurred two months ago and a third earlier in the year.

Police have reported three deaths since July in Fort Worth, Pineville, W.Va., and Aurora, Colo. There are no national figures, but the number of copper thefts and related deaths is "probably at the highest level it's ever been," says Kenneth Geremia, spokesman for the Copper Development Association, a trade group. He says copper is completely recyclable and can sell for $3 a pound at scrap yards. Demand from China, India and other countries for copper for use in housing and industry has doubled the metal's value in a year.

Thieves don't always take precautions.

"It's a Russian roulette kind of situation. If they cut the wrong wire, they're at risk," says Stan Partlow, director of physical security for American Electric Power, a utility with 5 million customers in 11 states.

He says a rise in thefts from its power lines and substations has left the public and utility workers with power outages, loose wires or exposed equipment and has caused the deaths of two thieves in Boone County, W.Va., and Pike County, Ky.

"It's very difficult" to tell if scrap copper is stolen, because much of it is very commonly used material, says Bryan McGannon, spokesman for the Institute of Scrap Recycling Industries, an association of 3,000 scrap yards. He says workers are trained to look for stolen items, and his group alerts scrap dealers by e-mail of large thefts.

Man Charged In Fake-robbery Scams (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 27, 2006

A Philadelphia man was charged yesterday with staging fake armed robberies in scams that netted $385,000 from the state's victim-assistance program.

David Toomer, 36, is accused of staging robberies from 2000 to 2002, then enlisting the help of a former accomplice, an unnamed chiropractor, to help him stage fake accidents this year.

The money Toomer netted was about half of the $385,000 he sought to fraudulently obtain, said U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan, who announced the charges yesterday at a news conference outside the state victim-assistance office on Cherry Street.

"When you steal from this program, you contribute to the suffering of crime victims," Meehan said. "The compensation program exists to ease the burden of those victims."

The state crime victim-assistance program was created in 1976 and offers up to $35,000 to help victims and their families cope with injuries.

Toomer's first alleged scam occurred in September 2000, when he told Philadelphia police that he had been robbed of $10,000 worth of jewelry and $1,000 in cash. He obtained $35,000 from the victim-assistance fund.

In April 2001, authorities said, Toomer repeated the crime, enlisting three others to act as additional victims. Each received $35,000 from the victim fund.

In April 2002, Toomer allegedly staged his third crime - a mugging at gunpoint in which he and four others were supposedly beaten. Each supposed victim netted $35,000.

Toomer was arrested by the FBI on April 28 in the parking lot of the Holiday Inn on Packer Avenue as he allegedly conspired with an unnamed chiropractor to stage a fake accident.

By then, the chiropractor had begun cooperating with authorities, according to an affidavit by FBI Agent Therese Nestor, and had been audiotaped and videotaped discussing the scam.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Lewis D. Lappen filed a criminal information against Toomer yesterday, a process prosecutors often use when a defendant is expected to plead guilty.

He was accused of creating a fake company to give mortgage companies the false impression that certain customers had good credit.

Feds Charge Repeat 'Victim' (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 27, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday charged a Philadelphia man with staging fake armed robberies to defraud the state's Crime Victims Compensation Assistance Program to the tune of $175,000.

The program reimburses crime victims for medical expenses not paid by health insurers for injuries suffered in the crime.

The feds alleged that David Toomer, 36, of Watkins Street near S. 22nd Street, faked four robberies in which he claimed he and others were the victims.

Toomer, who used at least two aliases during the alleged scheme, was charged with mail fraud and health-care fraud. His attorney said yesterday that Toomer plans to plead guilty.

The scheme lasted from September 2000 until April 28 this year, the feds said.

In September 2000, Toomer allegedly told cops that two armed men rear-ended his car and robbed him of $10,000 in jewelry, $1,000 cash and credit cards.

On another occasion, in April 2001, Toomer used an alias, "David Garvin," and allegedly told cops that he and three companions had been accosted by seven males outside a bar and robbed of cash and jewelry. He told officers that one of the perps had wielded a gun, the charging papers said.

Toomer would report the fake armed robberies to police, who then processed the necessary paperwork to support his claims.

He would then file claims with the victims-compensation fund to recover medical expenses for injuries he claimed to have suffered in the fake crimes.

The state fund caps individual benefits at $35,000.

The feds said Toomer aimed to collect $385,000 in benefits intended for real crime victims, but the scheme actually netted about $175,000.

"When you steal from this program, you contribute to the suffering of crime victims," said U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan. "The compensation program exists to ease the burden of those victims. This is a theft against them."

The feds said Toomer also arranged to stage two fake vehicle accidents involving numerous "victims" in a separate scheme in April to defraud insurance companies.

Toomer used various healthcare providers including three doctors and at least one hospital, the feds said. The providers were identified only by their initials.

Unbeknownst to Toomer, one provider was a local chiropractor cooperating in the investigation.

Toomer made arrangements with the chiropractor to bill insurers for medical treatment that purportedly would be provided to the phony accident victims.

According to the feds, Toomer agreed to split the proceeds with the chiropractor.

Toomer later arranged to obtain two vehicles and auto insurance for the scheme. When he couldn't get the second vehicle, Toomer had the chiropractor deliver a vehicle to him. That's when FBI agents arrested him.

Authorities said the investigation is continuing. Toomer is out on bail.

Feds: Seven Scammed Katrina Aid (DEN)

Detroit News, September 27, 2006

About $30K in relief funds were accepted by residents of Metro area to buy drugs, cars, U.S. says.

Five Detroit-area women, an Indiana man and a Mississippi woman fraudulently obtained nearly $30,000 in relief money intended for Hurricane Katrina victims and used the cash to buy cars, narcotics and other items, the federal government alleged in criminal complaints filed Tuesday.

"Disasters and crises of this nature most often bring out the best in people," said Detroit U.S. Postal Inspector D.L. Carter, whose agency investigated the alleged crimes.

"Unfortunately, they also bring out the worst."

Charged with fraud are: Pamela L. Reason, 45, of Detroit; Krystal P. Hubbard, 23, of Southfield; Curtisine Ingram, 52, of Detroit; Krystal J. Young, 21, of Detroit; Andrea J. Johnson Reason, 53, who recently moved from Detroit to Indiana; Dwight V. Reason, 35, of Bloomington, Ind.; and Patricia A. Hubbard, 48, of Bude, Miss.

None was directly affected by the Aug. 29, 2005, storm that slammed the Gulf Coast, killing more than 1,800 people and leaving tens of thousands homeless, the government alleges.

But each obtained between $2,000 and $12,750 in Federal Emergency Management Agency aid, mainly by falsely claiming they lived in New Orleans when the storm hit, according to complaints filed in U.S. District Court.

Two of the women -- Johnson Reason and Ingram -- told investigators they used some of the Katrina money to buy narcotics, according to the complaints and Carter.

Other items allegedly purchased with the $28,182 include two cars, clothing, eyeglasses and food.

Young, who said she used some of the $12,750 she received to buy a car and pay living expenses, told The Detroit News she got involved in the fraud because others she knew were doing it.

"Everybody was in my ear," about obtaining the benefits, she said after her arraignment.

"I feel bad for what I did."

The accused were released and ordered to return to court Oct. 16.

AP, September 27, 2006

DETROIT -- Seven people have been charged with fraudulently obtaining nearly $30,000 in relief money intended for Hurricane Katrina victims.

In criminal complaints filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Detroit, federal authorities accused the suspects of using the money from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to buy cars, clothing, drugs and other items.

"Disasters and crises of this nature most often bring out the best in people," said U.S. Postal Inspector D.L. Carter, whose agency investigated the case. "Unfortunately, they also bring out the worst," he told The Detroit News.

Ex-paper Chief Sent To Prison (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 27, 2006

Former head of American Tissue in Hauppauge gets 15 years for $300M fraud that cost 4,700 jobs

The former head of a Hauppauge-based national paper manufacturing conglomerate was sentenced yesterday to 15 years in prison for a $300-million fraud involving his firm, American Tissue, which was once the nation's fourth-largest producer of paper towels, tissues and toilet paper.

Mehdi Gabayzadeh, 62, of Great Neck also was ordered to make restitution of $65 million and serve five years' supervised release by U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert in Central Islip.

Gabayzadeh was convicted last year of fraud, conspiracy to commit perjury, and obstruction of justice in the scheme, which cost investors and suppliers $193million - after his company's assets were liquidated in bankruptcy - and resulted in the loss of 4,700 jobs, 800 on Long Island.

"I'm very sorry for my family and the United States of America for my criminal conduct," Gabayzadeh said before he was sentenced.

Gabayzadeh, a paper manufacturer in his native Iran, fled that country after the fall of the shah in the 1970s and began a relatively small operation in Hauppauge, which mushroomed in size, acquiring many small paper manufacturers around the country and selling $1-billion worth of goods a year. One of the companies he took over, AmPad, is credited with inventing the yellow legal pad.

But a drop in paper prices resulted in sharp financial losses that Gabayzadeh attempted to cover up by lying to lenders, and then to creditors after the company was forced into bankruptcy, according to prosecutors.

Among the scams: moving huge toilet-paper manufacturing machines between Mexican and U.S. locations, ahead of creditors seeking to seize them; fabricating fraudulent sales and inventory documents to obtain loans; and lying as well as getting employees to lie to investigators.

Gabayzadeh could have theoretically been sentenced to life in prison because of the large monetary loss to investors and suppliers under advisory sentencing guidelines.

Federal prosecutors and probation officials had recommended that Gabayzadeh be sentenced to 20 years. Defense attorneys urged 10 years on the grounds that Gabayzadeh was ill with heart problems, diabetes and bipolar disorder.

A number of his former employees wrote to the court asking for the stiffest possible sentence for Gabayzadeh.

One of them, Gerard Coulombe of New Berlin, N.H., said that after Gabayzadeh's former paper mill there was forced to close, a number of his 800 employees went bankrupt themselves and were forced to sell their homes. Several also found that they owed tens of thousands of dollars in medical bills, Coulombe said. They had been paying medical premiums to the mill's self-insurance plan, but there were no funds after the bankruptcy, Coulombe said, adding that the small town itself has been devastated by the loss of workers who have been forced to find employment elsewhere.

A new firm has taken over the plant's operation, but it employs only 350 workers, said Coulombe, who was a millwright at the plant and is now the head of the local chapter of the United Steel, Paper and Forestry Workers union.

In imposing the sentence, Seybert said that the federal prison was capable of caring for Gabayzadeh's illnesses. "The purpose of this sentence is to [show] that white-collar crime hurts as much as blue-collar crime," Seybert said.

Afterward, Gabayzadeh's attorneys, Raymond Perini and Benjamin Brafman, said he might consider an appeal.

Brafman said he found the sentence too harsh, "but post-Enron we have come to expect double-digit sentences in white-collar crimes."

In a telephone interview, after the sentence was imposed, Coulombe said: "For what he did, 20 years was not enough. He should have gotten life."

He Destroyed North Country Mills, Now He's In Jail (MANUL)

By Lorna Colquhoun, Union Leader Correspondent

Manchester Union-Leader, September 27, 2006

Berlin – Five years after he declared bankruptcy that forced the closure of two North Country paper mills, the CEO of what was once the fourth largest tissue maker in the country was sentenced yesterday in a New York court for a $300 million fraud scheme.

Mehdi Gabayzadeh, 61, who was simply known in the region with a bite of disdain and loathing as "Mehdi," was the owner of the pulp mill in Berlin and the paper mill in Gorham.

He will spend the next 15 years in a federal penitentiary, must make $65 million in restitution and will be on probation for five years after he serves his prison term. He could have faced up to 60 years.

"It's not enough time, but we have to put it behind us and move on," said Gorham Town Manager Bill Jackson.

"It was more than I expected him to get, but it wasn't enough," said Berlin Mayor Bob Danderson. "I'd like to see him spend the rest of his life there because that's what he deserves. He exemplifies the worst of American greed."

Gabayzadeh was convicted in April 2005 in U.S. District Court in Islip, N.Y., on eight counts of bank and securities fraud and conspiracy.

His sentencing hearing was postponed a number of times for health reasons. His attorneys said Gabayzadeh suffered diabetes, high cholesterol, depression and bipolar schizophrenia that caused him to lose 60 pounds after his trial and had asked for leniency in sentencing.

"To think this guy is depressed," U.S. District Court Judge Joanna Seybert said of Gabayzadeh. "He has no idea what depressed is."

The summer of 2001 was one of uncertainty and apprehension in Berlin and Gorham, communities whose roots are in the paper industry. Paychecks and tax payments bounced and other financial obligations were not met. Gabayzadeh was accused of inflating sales and inventory to obtain loans to keep the company going.

In late August 2001, the pulp mill, followed by the paper mill, shut down, putting nearly 900 people out of work.

Yesterday's sentencing was a relief, said Gerry Coulombe, president of the paper workers union.

"At least he got something," he said. "I wish he had gotten more time."

Prior to sentencing yesterday, Gabayzadeh apologized, according Newsday.

"I'm very sorry to my family and to the United States of America," he said. "I'm very embarrassed; I beg for mercy." The newspaper also reported that the court received more than 100 letters from millworkers and others before the sentencing hearing.

Jackson wrote two of those letters, on behalf of the town of Gorham; Coulombe wrote another last May.

"My fellow brothers and sisters were devastated by Mehdi and his illegal actions of lying and stealing their medical insurance, vacation pay and other monies owed to them," Coulombe wrote. "This man was responsible for the breakdown of so many people's lives here in the North Country."

The union workers were among 2,700 people in Wisconsin, Vermont and Tennessee who lost their jobs when the mills closed.

The mills in Berlin and Gorham were bought by Fraser Paper in May 2002 and eventually both reopened, with a smaller work force. The pulp mill, which had dominated the economy and landscape of Berlin, closed permanently last May.

"We had hoped the judge would not show any leniency because of the damage he has done to families in Berlin and Gorham," Jackson said. "They deserved that satisfaction. He never apologized."

Defense attorney Raymond Perini portrayed Gabayzadeh as a hard-working Iranian immigrant duped by others, but Assistant U.S. Attorney John G. Martin said in his closing arguments it was "simply unreasonable to believe, to accept or even consider that the CEO ... simply steps back and doesn't get involved."

Coulombe said yesterday afternoon that there has been great anticipation around Gabayzadeh's sentencing.

"People have been very curious -- people have been stopping me on the street to ask about it," he said. "This is something that affected the whole city and the whole North Country. It has finally come to an end. I wish he could have gotten more time."

Danderson was curious to know where Gabayzadeh would serve his prison time. One of the initiatives that came about after the closure of the mills in 2001 was bringing a federal prison to Berlin, a project that could break ground at the beginning of the year.

Former American Tissue CEO Sentenced To 15 Years (AP)

By Frank Eltman, The Associated Press

AP, September 27, 2006

CENTRAL ISLIP, N.Y. – The former CEO of one of the nation's largest makers of paper products was sentenced Monday to 15 years in prison after being convicted last year of engineering a $300 million fraud in a fruitless bid to save the failing company from bankruptcy.

In seeking a stiff sentence, prosecutors had compared Mehdi Gabayzadeh's misdeeds to those of better-known white-collar corporate criminals, including Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas and former WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers.

"The purpose of this sentence is to demonstrate that white-collar crime hurts just as much as blue-collar crime," said U.S. District Court Judge Joanna Seybert.

Gabayzadeh was convicted in April 2005 of all charges in an eight-count indictment, including bank and securities fraud and conspiracy, following a nine-week trial on Long Island.

His sentencing had been delayed numerous times because Gabayzadeh suffers from several ailments, his attorneys said.

They sought to have his sentence reduced because of his health. Those efforts continued Monday with defense attorneys saying that Gabayzadeh suffers from diabetes, high cholesterol and bipolar schizophrenia, and that he has lost more than 60 pounds since his conviction.

But Seybert said to him, "I can't predict how long you're going to live any more than the court could predict how long Mr. Rigas would live, any more than anyone could have predicted how long Mr. Lay was going to live."

Kenneth Lay, the disgraced founder of Enron, died in July, several weeks after being convicted of fraud.

Gabayzadeh was ordered to pay $65 million in restitution and sentenced to five years' probation after his prison term.

Gabayzadeh, 61, of Great Neck, was accused of swindling banks, financial institutions and investors of nearly $300 million while he was chief executive officer of American Tissue Inc., once the nation's fourth-largest maker of toilet tissue and other paper products.

He was accused of inflating American Tissue sales and inventory in an effort to defraud a group of banks that loaned the company $145 million, and bondholders who in 1999 purchased $165 million in American Tissue bonds.

The company's failure caused mills in Berlin and Gorham, N.H., to close in September 2001.

Prosecutors estimated 2,700 people across the country, including Wisconsin, Vermont and Tennessee, lost their jobs.

"I'm very sorry to my family and to the United States of America," Gabayzadeh said before being sentenced. "I'm very embarrassed; I beg for mercy."

Another company reopened the mills in June 2002, but in May 2006, the Berlin mill was permanently closed after the operator cited rising costs of wood, energy and chemicals.

The mill workers' union and others wrote to the judge, hoping she understood how Gabayzadeh's crimes affected individual workers and their families.

Seybert, who said she received more than 100 letters, alluded to one from a single mother who said she was being evicted from her home and wondered how she would feed her children after losing her job at one of Gabayzadeh's plants.

"To think this guy is depressed," Seybert said of Gabayzadeh. "He has no idea what depressed is."

Gabayzadeh's participation in a series of complex deals – including the creation of phony documents indicating the company had sold million-dollar pulp contracts that didn't exist – ultimately led to American Tissue's collapse.

"Like Gabayzadeh, Rigas lied to public investors about Adelphia's financial and operational performance," U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf wrote in a pre-sentencing letter. "Like Gabayzadeh, Ebbers claimed at trial that the frauds at his company were perpetrated solely by his employees, including the company's CFO, and that he was unaware of them."

Defense attorney Raymond Perini portrayed Gabayzadeh as a hardworking Iranian immigrant duped by others, but Assistant U.S. Attorney John G. Martin said in his closing arguments it was "simply unreasonable to believe, to accept or even consider that the CEO . . . simply steps back and doesn't get involved."

The bogus deals were documented in part to help American Tissue keep open a revolving line of credit it enjoyed with LaSalle Bank of Chicago, prosecutors said.

Without the line of credit, the company was doomed to fail, according to Ed Stein, the company's former chief financial officer who testified for the prosecution after pleading guilty to two federal charges of securities and bank fraud in 2003.

Ex-Paper Chief Gets 15-Year Term In Fraud (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The former chief executive of American Tissue, Mehdi Gabayzadeh, was sentenced yesterday to 15 years in prison for organizing a fraud that cost banks and investors almost $300 million when the paper manufacturer collapsed.

Judge Joanna Seybert of Federal District Court in Central Islip, N.Y., who sentenced Mr. Gabayzadeh, also ordered him to pay $65 million. Mr. Gabayzadeh was convicted of eight criminal charges, including conspiracy and wire fraud, after a 10-week trial last year.

"This case involved a massive corporate fraud and breach of trust that led to the bankruptcy of a major corporation, hundreds of millions of dollars in losses to lenders and investors and the elimination of jobs for thousands of former employees," Roslynn R. Mauskopf, a United States attorney in Brooklyn, said in a statement.

Prosecutors said Mr. Gabayzadeh, 61, inflated American Tissue's accounts receivable and net income in an effort to defraud both a group of banks that loaned the company $145 million and the purchasers of $165 million in bonds from American Tissue, based in Hauppauge, N.Y.

Mr. Gabayzadeh's lawyer, Raymond Perini, did not return a call seeking comment.

Money Laundering Conspiracy Sends Man To Prison (LYNNA)

Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, September 27, 2006

A New York man will serve one year and eight months in prison for his role in an investment scheme that bilked a Lynchburg resident out of more than $385,000.

Dennis Testa, 47, of Queens, was convicted in March of conspiracy to commit money laundering. He was sentenced Friday in U.S. District Court in Charlottesville.

Testa will be ordered to pay some restitution, but the exact amount hasn't yet been set, according to Heidi Coy, spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney John Brownlee.

A co-conspirator, Nicholas Lanza, 44, of Staten Island, was convicted in March of the same offense. He was sentenced Sept. 1 to 2½ years in prison and ordered to pay $30,000 in restitution.

The pair's scheme began in 1997, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. They used a bank account, mailing service and phone-answering service to fool people into thinking they were purchasing stock for a New York company.

The company didn't exist. Checks sent in by the victims paid for the services used to keep up the ruse while the rest were made out to cash or to the defendants.

The Lynchburg resident was the biggest victim of the scam. In all, the pair took more than $400,000 from seven people in five states.

How A Reviled Court System Has Outlasted Many Critics (NYT)

By William Glaberson

"A farce in these days," Gov. Alfred E. Smith pronounced New York State's town and village courts in 1926.

"An outworn system," said his successor, Franklin D. Roosevelt, not long after a state commission called it "a feeble office respected by no one." A few years after that, another commission said the local court system had "lost all contact with reality."

In all, at least nine commissions, conferences or other state bodies — including representatives of both major political parties and all three branches of government — have denounced the local courts over the last century, joined by at least two governors and several senior judges.

Their language has often been blistering, and their point has been the same: These courts, with their often primitive trappings and amateur judges, are an anachronism that desperately needs to be overhauled or discarded.

Although they are key institutions of justice in more than 1,000 small towns and suburbs across New York, trying misdemeanor cases and lawsuits, a vast majority of the justices who run them are not lawyers, and receive only a few days' legal training. The justices are often elected in low-turnout races, keep few records and operate largely without supervision — leaving a long trail of injustices and mangled rulings.

Yet these justice courts, as they are known, remain essentially as they were when New Yorkers started complaining nearly a century ago. In recent weeks, state officials have decided to take some steps to increase training, supervision and record-keeping. But the cries for any sweeping change have all but died out over the last few decades, even as the abuses have continued.

One way to understand why a much-criticized institution has come to seem so entrenched is to revisit three big battles over the justice courts. In each, the people seeking to change the system tried in a different arena: the Legislature, the voting booths and the higher courts. And each time, their defeat was so stinging that it effectively killed any further discussion there:

¶In 1962, state leaders accomplished something they had been trying to do for more than a century, revamping a state court system that was badly out of date. But in several back-room political maneuvers, they left the justice courts untouched, passed the task of altering the system to local governments, and added a maze of procedural barriers that made any major change difficult.

¶In 1967, local activists took up the cause in Rockland County, one of the few counties where a push to replace the justice courts made some headway; a referendum was held on the issue. But a fiercely emotional campaign vanquished the proposal, and helped create a sense in other counties that fighting the system was futile.

¶And in 1983, a challenge to the system's constitutionality reached the state's highest court, the Court of Appeals. Attorneys for an upstate teenager facing a jail sentence argued that the right to a lawyer, guaranteed by the Constitution, was meaningless if the judge lacked the training to understand the lawyer's arguments.

That appeal failed by a single vote. New Yorkers, the majority on the seven-member court decreed, do not have to be tried by a judge schooled in the law — a ruling that has stood ever since.

In interviews, people who were deeply involved in these episodes — including political deal-making that took place out of public view and was never reported — pointed to a battery of forces that have doomed change: The powerful idea that communities should choose their own destinies, including their own judges. The considerable costs of updating courtrooms and hiring lawyers to preside. The always-popular calls to keep lawyers out of people's lives. And, not least, the power of the justices, who are often important players in local politics, wired into the same party mechanisms that produce the state's lawmakers, judges and governors.

Dale C. Robbins, a former Republican supervisor of Busti, a small town in western New York, said he and others who tried to replace the justice courts in the 1990's ran into a buzz saw of resistance from local justices fighting for their jobs, and something of a populist uprising fueled by suspicion of the lawyers who would be judges in any new system.

He said the defeat was typical of the gridlock on many big issues in New York. "Nothing gets done," he said. "Who wants to face this battle when there are so many other battles you have to fight?"

A Moment in Albany

It was January 1959. The new governor and political star, Nelson A. Rockefeller, was making his first address to the Legislature in Albany. "The highest priority" of his administration, he promised, would be modernizing the state court system.

Court reform, he knew, was a popular issue he could ride, yellowing papers in the Rockefeller archive show. People across the state were sick of the slow, confusingly organized system and the patronage appointees — many of them unqualified, unresponsive or corrupt — who filled it from top to bottom. Complaints that had been pouring in for decades had reached critical mass in recent years, as the latest state panel to tackle court reform, known as the Tweed Commission, drew up detailed proposals for change.

Soon after his speech to lawmakers, Governor Rockefeller appointed his young counsel, Robert MacCrate, to draw up amendments to the State Constitution that would be needed to reorganize the courts, and then to marshal support in the Legislature.

But Mr. MacCrate quickly learned that the lowliest part of the court system posed one of the highest political hurdles.

Governor Rockefeller, with his elite background and downstate roots, had to be careful not to offend the rural upstate powers in his own party, whom he was trying to convince that he was a real Republican. And, Mr. MacCrate said in an interview for this article, any effort to change the justice courts, a prime source of the party's patronage, would be "really shaking the tree."

Upstate Republicans often spoke as if criticism of the system was an attack on a way of life. "You boys from New York City have never seen a justice court," State Senator Austin W. Erwin, a central player in the courts battle, said during a debate that year. "These justices are the backbone of honest-to-God human justice in our state."

Governor Rockefeller, for all his talk of change, was surrounded by staunch defenders of the justice courts. Many were former justices, including Senator Erwin and L. Judson Morhouse, then the state Republican chairman and one of the governor's earliest supporters.

The justices of the peace "were inside the system," Elizabeth T. Schack, who led the League of Women Voters' lobbying for court reform, said in an interview. Back in the legislators' districts, too, the justices were powers to be reckoned with. "They were often people of importance and influence" who knew the lawmakers personally, Mrs. Schack said. "And you don't like to go up against your friends."

Most important, Mr. MacCrate said, upstate Republicans held such power in the Legislature that the administration knew that court reform could not pass without them. "We would find a way to bring them around," he said.

They didn't have to find a way; it came to them. Mr. MacCrate said that Fred Young, an influential state Court of Claims judge whom Governor Rockefeller would later choose as state Republican chairman, soon approached with an offer.

"Bob, if you take out that provision about abolishing the justices of the peace," Mr. MacCrate recalled him saying, "I'll have the votes for you" to approve statewide court reform that day or the next.

The deal was made.

That breakthrough would allow the entire court structure in New York to be streamlined and brought for the first time under centralized control. Yet while it included a requirement that local justices receive some basic training, it largely ensured there would be no other change in the biggest piece of the system: the hundreds of town and village courts.

"That was a turning point in terms of understanding how strong the opposition was," recalled Fern Schair, the former chairwoman of the state's leading court-reform group, the Committee for Modern Courts.

But the justices and their supporters did not stop there. To keep future legislatures from tampering with the system, they persuaded the administration to adopt language requiring a local referendum for any move to replace the town courts with more professional district courts. And for that referendum to pass, a simple majority of votes would not suffice; whether in a county or part of one, the proposal would have to win separate majorities in both urban and rural areas, so city dwellers could not impose modern courts on their country neighbors.

Even that, it turned out, was not enough. A year later, as Mr. MacCrate moved to secure approval from lawmakers, supporters of the justice courts demanded a provision requiring a majority vote in each town, Mr. MacCrate wrote in a memo. Towns where the referendum was defeated would be left out of any new system — a complication that would further discourage any reform effort.

New Yorkers approved the court-reform amendment at the polls, and to this day, those protections for the justice courts are enshrined in the State Constitution. No place in New York has replaced its town and village courts since western Suffolk County began a district court system in 1962 — the year Governor Rockefeller signed his reforms into law.

A Showdown in Rockland

"If you oppose 'school busing,' Expanded Welfare, Down zoning, Charter Government, Mob rule legislation, Crime in the Street, Black Power," vote no on Proposition No. 1, said the newspaper advertisement by the Conservative Party.

But Proposition No. 1 was not about any of those things. It was a ballot proposal to replace justice courts with a system of district courts in which the judges would be lawyers. After all the battles in Albany, it was the people's turn to decide.

This was 1967 in Rockland County, a rural place fast becoming a suburb as new residents arrived by the carload from nearby New York City. Some newcomers were alarmed by their encounters with eccentric justices who could wield sweeping powers over people's lives.

"The feeling was, they weren't professionals and they were too closely connected to people who brought their cases to court," Gloria English, a New City resident who worked for the proposal as a member of the League of Women Voters, said in a recent interview. "They often heard their friends' cases."

The league had several potent allies, including the county bar association and some leaders of both major political parties. The Democratic Party sponsored an ad saying it was high time the courts were modernized. The leading newspaper in the county ran editorials urging that the justice courts be brought into the 20th century.

On the other side were the justices and their supporters, including leaders of the county Conservative Party. They warned that the fancy new courts and their lawyer judges would cost more. The bar association estimated that expense at about $200,000 a year countywide, about $50,000 more than justice courts cost at the time. "I used that to bring to the attention of people: 'It's just another boondoggle,' " William E. Vines, then a justice in Clarkstown with a local insurance business, recalled in a recent interview.

There was also grass-roots backing for the justice courts, particularly among longtime residents. Arnold Becker, who was county public defender, said some people felt that familiar local justices would be more lenient than professional district judges.

But the campaign also played on emotions that had little to do with law or money.

The referendum's opponents were not shy about fanning resentment toward outsiders. The warnings about mob rule and black power spoke to fears about turmoil in the cities, and about the city people moving in. There were stirring appeals to patriotism.

"Justice courts are as much of your American heritage as those Stars and Stripes," one justice told a group of Jaycees two weeks before the election. "Don't let them take it away."

Adele Garber, then a young mother who had moved up from Queens and gone door to door on behalf of the ballot proposal, said that kind of passion easily overpowered her side's arguments about fairness and efficiency. Voters without a vested interest in the justice courts, she said, did not seem to care much.

The referendum lost by a 2-to-1 ratio.

Mrs. Garber said the experience left her cynical, and she was not the only one. The Rockland vote and similar defeats in other counties helped create the impression that such fights are impossible to win.

Because of a change in state policy since then, if a county adopted a district court system today, the state would pick up the cost. Statewide, that expense could be significant, perhaps tens of millions of dollars.

County governments, though, might save millions by consolidating their many justice courts into fewer, more centralized district courts. But change has been stymied.

Keith D. Ahlstrom, chairman of the Chautauqua County Legislature, said that while he and others have long seen a need to modernize the courts there, the referendum process was so cumbersome it would almost certainly fail. For now, he and other officials are backing a state bill that would permit a few justice courts to merge to cut costs.

"We need to have a small success," he said.

A Near-Miss in Court

The case was unremarkable: a teenager was arrested in Conesus, near Rochester, in 1981 and charged with menacing and trespassing. He was identified only as Charles F. because he was a minor. He faced up to a year in jail.

But his lawyer, J. Michael Jones, saw that the case had the potential to bring down the justice-court system in New York, and possibly in other states. The United States Supreme Court had ruled 20 years earlier that any defendant facing a jail sentence was entitled to a lawyer. But what good was that right, he asked, if the judge — like the town justice Charles F. faced — could not follow the lawyer's arguments?

In a recent interview, Mr. Jones recalled that he spent thousands of dollars out of his own pocket taking the case through the appeals courts. "I thought this was a perfect opportunity for us to upgrade the local court system," he said.

The time seemed ripe. In recent years, there had been a nationwide movement to recognize defendants' rights. Justice courts around the country had been revamped after a 1967 presidential crime commission noted their long record of "incompetence."

Some of the biggest changes were prompted by the courts. In 1974, the California Supreme Court ruled that imprisonment by a judge who did not have legal training was a violation of due process, and essentially ordered an end to the state's justice courts.

"It seemed there was an opportunity, a movement afoot that was going to provide a court remedy where there had never been a legislative solution," said Rene H. Reixach Jr., a Rochester lawyer who wrote a friend-of-the-court brief in the Charles F. case for the New York Civil Liberties Union.

A United States Supreme Court ruling in 1976 appeared to offer the means for challenging New York's system. The court upheld the jailing of a Kentucky man by a justice who was a coal miner with no legal training, but only because state law guaranteed defendants tried by nonlawyer justices the automatic right to a new trial before a judge who was a lawyer.

In New York, however, there is no such right. A defendant can ask a county judge to take the case, but the judge can refuse — as happened in the Charles F. case.

When the case reached the state's top court, the Court of Appeals, in 1983, Charles F.'s lawyers argued that in an era of increasingly complex legal protections for defendants, it was basic fairness that a person facing jail should have a judge trained to understand those protections. At the court's chamber in Albany, Mr. Jones remembered, "we had lawyers from New York City who couldn't believe we had this system."

The court, which was developing a reputation for protecting defendants' rights, seemed receptive. On it was the state's chief judge at the time, Lawrence H. Cooke, and the two judges who would succeed him: Sol Wachtler and Judith S. Kaye.

Mr. Wachtler, in a recent interview, said the three strongly agreed that the state's use of justices without law schooling was a problem. "There was unquestionably a sentiment on our parts that this is just not right," he said.

But when the vote came, they were on the losing side of a 4-to-3 decision. New Yorkers, the majority ruled, had no absolute right to be heard by a judge trained in the law.

Richard D. Simons, the only surviving judge in that majority, said in an interview that the case posed a narrow legal issue: whether New York provided sufficient opportunity for a higher-court trial. The larger matter of the justice courts' fairness, he said, was for the Legislature to decide.

Mr. Wachtler said he believed that the case would have gone the other way if it had come to the Court of Appeals just a year or two later, given changes in the court's makeup and stance on defendants' rights.

But the court has not grappled with the issue since. Mr. Reixach, the Rochester lawyer, said the ruling discouraged him and others from raising further challenges. "The Charles F. case, whether you agreed with it or not," he said, "sealed the fate of the justice-court system in the state for a very long time."

Judge Kaye, who wrote the dissenting opinion, has since become a champion of court reform as New York's chief judge, heading the Court of Appeals and the administration of all the courts. But the legislation she has proposed to modernize the system since taking office in 1993 has consistently omitted the justice courts.

Only this summer did Judge Kaye address problems in the local courts, after the state comptroller warned that they could be mishandling millions of dollars, and after a commission she created to study legal services for the poor reported that those courts were routinely trampling on people's rights.

Her office has said that while it has limited control over the justice courts, it would begin trying to remedy some of their flaws, with measures that do not require legislative approval.

Those steps are the most ambitious attempted in several decades, but their very nature underscores the courts' deficiencies: Justices, according to the state's plan, will get two weeks of initial training instead of six days. For the first time, all justices will be given computers, fax machines and tape recorders, and be required to tape proceedings. A supervising judge will be named in each judicial district to oversee them.

And the improvements do not touch what critics of the justice courts have repeatedly said are their gravest defects: the use of part-time justices who are not lawyers, the reliance on towns and villages to finance the courts, and the state's weak authority over the courts.

Tackling those issues would involve the Legislature — and invite another battle. Judge Kaye declined requests for an interview.

One of the justice courts' most powerful defenders has been the State Association of Towns. Its executive director, G. Jeffrey Haber, said the group would be ready for another fight.

"If it came up," he said, "we would take the same position that we did before."

Forensic Skills Seek To Uncover Hidden Patterns Of Elder Abuse (NYT)

By Jane Gross

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. — The elderly man in the emergency room was covered with bruises, some purple and others fading to yellow. Despite signs of dementia, he told the same story over and over: His wife's burly home health aide had beaten him. But the health aide and the wife insisted he had fallen. Now it was up to the members of Orange County's Elder Abuse Forensic Center to decide which story was true.

As the man lay on a gurney, he was interviewed by a team from the center: a geriatrician, a social worker and an investigator from the sheriff's office. The bruises on the man's chest, they determined, were the result of being punched. There were bloody outlines of a shoe on the man's leg. His clear, consistent story, and cognitive tests, persuaded the prosecutor to charge the aide with a felony.

At the center here, public health and law enforcement officials are learning to speak the same language and using the same forensic techniques as those popularized on the three C.S.I. television series to diagnose elder abuse and neglect. For decades, the techniques have been the state-of-the-art approach for investigating child abuse and domestic violence. But elder abuse has lagged far behind, suffering from a lack of financing, research and data.

Now change is in the air, and forensic techniques are just one of many new initiatives nationwide to protect the elderly. Geriatricians at the Baylor College of Medicine in Houston, for example, review county autopsy reports looking for suspicious themes. Bank tellers at Wachovia branches nationwide are learning to detect irregular transactions in the accounts of elderly customers.

Congress is also expected to consider, before the October recess, the Elder Justice Act of 2006, which would create the first nationwide database on elder abuse, replacing inconsistent or unavailable data. The legislation, which has bipartisan support, also assigns a federal official to coordinate projects and technical assistance and helps replicate programs like Orange County's.

The legislation moved from committee to the full Senate on a unanimous vote within days of a celebrity scandal involving elder abuse accusations against the son of Brooke Astor, 104, the grand dame of New York society. The accusations against Mrs. Astor's son, Anthony D. Marshall, himself 82, include mismanagement of her fortune for his own enrichment and neglect as a result of cutting back on her care. Mr. Marshall has denied those accusations.

Mrs. Astor's situation is not exceptional. She is a member of the fastest-growing segment of the American population, those 85 and older. Half in that age group suffer from dementia and are often incapable of informed consent. The fact that the elderly control 70 percent of the nation's wealth makes them tempting targets for greedy relatives or swindlers.

Those are the circumstances that set the stage for most elder abuse, experts say. The most common form is physical neglect, like untended bedsores, dehydration or the reek of urine. A family member who is providing care, most often an adult child, is usually the guilty party. Greed is generally the motive, whether there is a multimillion-dollar inheritance or a monthly Social Security check at stake.

All this was well known to the assorted professionals in Orange County, but before the forensic center was established, each had to improvise without easy access to others' expertise. A social worker might need a public guardian to sort out conflicting claims from adult children over who had power of attorney. The social worker might also need advice from a detective about securing evidence, but calls to colleagues often went unreturned for weeks, and there was likely to be no doctor to consult because few were trained to detect elder abuse.

Now, in Orange County, such professionals meet face-to-face at least once a week, with a doctor at the helm, and often speak daily.

Some 6,000 cases of elder abuse are reported annually in Orange County. In California, 100,000 reports were filed in 2003, accounting for 20 percent of the 500,000 reports nationwide. But there is widespread agreement among professionals that those numbers may be low. In a 1996 study, only one in 14 cases of physical abuse and neglect were reported and one in 100 of financial exploitation.

In Orange County, Craig M. Cazares, a deputy district attorney, reviews about 120 cases a year that are considered potential crimes, twice the number before the creation of the forensic team. Half of the cases are prosecuted, Mr. Cazares said, with a 90 percent conviction rate including plea deals.

The team approach, he said, can lead to pitched battles because doctors and social workers "don't understand that not everything they want to be criminal is criminal."

Nevertheless, Mr. Cazares added, "we can make borderline cases better" because of shared information and, most important, the medical expertise to assess physical injury and mental capacity.

Confidentiality laws prohibit outsiders at team meetings at the Elder Abuse Forensic Center. But in interviews, members discussed three cases, one involving neglect, one abuse and one financial exploitation.

In the neglect case a 60-year-old woman had been providing substandard care to her 96-year-old husband, who has heart disease and dementia and uses a wheelchair. After home visits by a physician, a social worker, a detective, a public guardian, a mental health expert and an array of outside social service agencies, no criminal charges were filed.

When the team took the case, reported by a neighbor, the husband had an open wound on his thigh from a kitchen accident and showed signs of malnourishment. But Dr. Lisa Gibbs said the wife had not intended harm. "So we worked with her, educated her, sent in a lot of social services and she is trying to do a better job," Dr. Gibbs said.

In the abuse case, involving the elderly man in the emergency room, the home health aide first accepted a plea deal that would send him to jail for a year, but is now vacillating. If found guilty at trial, the aide could be sentenced to up to nine years in state prison.

The financial exploitation case, a classic sweetheart scam, ended when Jennifer Mitchell was sentenced to four years in a state prison and her husband, Anthony, an accessory, was given 12 months in the Orange County jail. Ms. Mitchell, described by investigators as "an attractive young woman," was convicted of defrauding three elderly men of a total of $300,000 by feigning romantic interest in them. Dr. Laura Mosqueda and Dr. Gibbs established that mental impairment, depression and isolation had made all three men vulnerable.

The couple was charged with multiple counts of financial abuse, which carry heavy prison sentences. But the judge offered a plea deal demanding full restitution.

"This case wasn't about the sentence," said Kenneth W. Johns, the deputy public guardian for Orange County. "These men needed their money back so they can be taken care of."

Some members of the team, including Kenneth Smith, a veteran investigator, say the typical abuser tends to be the "weak link" in a family, without a career or a home. The abuser often has mental health or substance abuse problems.

Mr. Smith said other family members were relieved to delegate the task of caring for an elderly person and turned a blind eye to incompetence and other factors that raised the risk of abuse, like the need for money.

Dr. Mosqueda fiercely objects to that stereotype, which ignores the stress on those taking care of the elderly. A police investigator may never encounter loving and attentive adult children driven to the brink, she said, because the police work at the margins of society, after other interventions have failed.

Dr. Mosqueda said she saw caretakers in her office every day and asked them, directly, if they had ever yelled at or struck the person in their care or even been afraid they might.

"If your mother has Alzheimer's," Dr. Mosqueda said, "and she's belittling you all the time, screaming, asking the same questions over and over, and you have a husband and kids and a job, at some point you're going to say, 'If she asks me that same damn question one more time, I'm going to hit her.' "

Dr. Mosqueda continued, " 'I'm doing the best I can' isn't an excuse, but sometimes it's really true, and it's our job to know the difference and help families solve it so it doesn't ever get to the team at the forensic center."

By Haya El Nasser

USA Today, September 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069811

An elderly woman from the East Coast roams the Arizona desert in search of her land. She's looking for a tidy lot in a subdivision and instead finds an arid wasteland in the middle of nowhere. She gets lost, runs out of gas and water and has to be rescued by a rancher.

She had bought the land on the Internet, sight unseen, according to Mary Utley, spokeswoman with the Arizona Department of Real Estate.

The Internet is reviving a grand old American tradition: land scams. Thousands of lots in phantom subdivisions that were sold decades ago to people who hoped to build retirement homes in warm states are reappearing on online sites such as the Internet giant eBay.

The new wave of land scams has the potential to snooker millions more around the world because of the Internet's broad and instantaneous reach.

Many of the lots being sold have never been developed because they are on swampland in Florida or isolated desert ranchland in Texas and Arizona. There is no road access, water or power. The land might be developed someday, but county officials who are busy processing a surge in deed transfers are skeptical.

"If someone does buy one of these parcels thinking they're going to build their dream home on it now, that's really a problem," says Bart Medley, attorney for Texas' Jeff Davis County.

Land scams are surfacing in:

•Florida. The state has a long history of bogus land deals. In Flagler County, a scam that began in the 1970s was revived recently when the same lots in a subdivision that has yet to be built appeared on eBay. Some paid $5,000 for parcels worth $500, Daytona Beach land-use lawyer Glenn Storch says.

•West Texas. Land there is plentiful, but not always hospitable. Arid acreage in Jeff Davis, Hudspeth and Culberson counties has been auctioned online to some unsuspecting buyers.

"Much of the property was advertised with photos showing things like running water, green trees and green grass — things that simply don't exist in that particular location," Medley says.

Most online land auctions are legitimate and much of the land sold can be developed. Interspersed among those listings, however, are offers for 2-acre and 5-acre lots tagged as "investment property."

Online sites say they just provide the vehicle to list properties. "The actual transaction happens directly between the buyer and seller," says Catherine England, spokeswoman for eBay, which lists and auctions properties in its real estate section.

In the 1960s, large land companies set up sales kiosks in cities around the world such as Hong Kong or Singapore, Storch says, "but you had to come to the kiosk to hear the sales pitch." Now, all of it can be done online from the comfort of home and at any hour in any time zone.

Medley has gotten calls from as far away as Belgium.

There is nothing illegal about selling worthless land to someone who's willing to pay. The key is to tell them what they're getting, Storch says.

West Texas is particularly attractive to land-scam artists. There is plenty of land, and county governments are small and ill-equipped to crack down.

The county clerk in Jeff Davis County is processing dozens of deed transfers on ranchland that can't be reached by car. The same lots were sold years ago to unsuspecting buyers who stopped paying property taxes when they realized they owned a worthless patch of dirt. The county took possession and sold the lots in one chunk. The new owner is selling the lots online.

"We're going to wind up taking some of these plots back," Medley says. "Eventually, we'll have to clean up the mess. … These scams are defrauding people out of their hard-earned money."

"Even though I can't find your land out there, I can't find any laws that will allow me to jump on anybody," he says. "I can't make a criminal act out of that."

Some of the Internet sales listings make it clear that the land can't be built on unless the owners find a way to supply water, sewer service and electricity. Others don't. Many tantalize with beautiful descriptions and pictures.

Medley cites the old adage that beauty is in the eye of the beholder, but "I want to meet the person who looks at this (land) and thinks it's beautiful."

Arizona state law requires anyone selling more than five lots in a subdivision to file an application and public report listing details such as road access and utilities.

"A lot of times, one lot will be sold three or four times over the Internet," Utley says. The agency is investigating numerous complaints filed in the past two years.

A Texas law prohibits subdividing land for residential use into small parcels without providing water, sewer, electricity and road access, Medley says.

"Many of these people are reselling these plots for the third or fourth time and they have absolutely no idea they're breaking the law," Medley says — especially someone in another country.

Until there's a complaint, he says, he can't get an injunction to stop the transactions.

The government scrutinizes companies that do large-scale developments more closely than individuals who sell single plots, says Tom Collier of the Better Business Bureau of Southern Arizona.

"That's when the buyer really, really needs to beware," Collier says. "People fancy themselves out on their porch watching the deer and antelope play."

'Girls Gone Wild' Filmmaker Fined $2.1 Million (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

The founder and owner of "Girls Gone Wild" has pleaded guilty to charges of failing to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers in his sexually explicit films.

Joseph Francis entered the guilty plea Monday before U.S. District Judge Margaret Morrow in Los Angeles. Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said Francis pleaded guilty to two counts filed under a law passed by Congress to prevent sexual exploitation of children.

The law protects against the use of minors in the production of sexually explicit material by requiring producers to create and maintain age and identity records for every performer.

Under the agreements, she said, Francis agreed to pay the maximum fine of $500,000 and his two companies agreed to pay an additional $1.6 million in fines and restitution.

Santa Monica-based Mantra Films Inc., which is owned and operated by Francis, entered a plea agreement on Sept. 12 at U.S. District Court in Panama City, Fla. A related company, MRA Holdings Inc., also entered a deferred prosecution agreement the same day. Sentencing in the case is scheduled for Dec. 18.

Mrs. Fisher said Francis, Mantra and MRA Holdings will make a public acknowledgment of criminal wrongdoing and have agreed to fully comply with the record-keeping laws.

MRA Holdings also agreed that for three years it will employ an independent, outside monitor selected by the government who will have complete access to the books, records and production facilities to ensure the company's compliance with federal law.

In statements filed in court, Francis admitted that "Girls Gone Wild," acting under his direction, filmed performers engaging in sexually explicit conduct and produced and distributed sexually explicit video materials during all of 2002 and part of 2003 while violating the record-keeping and labeling laws.

In May, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales asked the FBI to begin conducting regular inspections of records kept by producers of sexually explicit material.

Producers are required to keep records on performers that include true name and date of birth and to produce these records on demand, in order to prevent the hiring of minors.

BWXT Worker Pleads Guilty (KNOXNS)

DOJ_NMG_0069813

By Jamie Satterfield, Satterfield@knews.com

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), September 27, 2006

Man sentenced to 1-year probation for removing classified data from Y-12

Stupid? Probably.

Spy? Never.

Retired U.S. Navy man Everett Ashley Blauvelt Jr. had no intention of betraying his country when he played fast and loose with "secret restricted data" at the Y-12 National Security Complex in Oak Ridge, defense attorney Tom Dillard said Tuesday.

"It was just a bad mistake," Dillard said.

Blauvelt, 61, pleaded guilty before U.S. Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton to a misdemeanor charge he removed classified information from Y-12, where components for the country's nuclear weapons arsenal are made, while working there as an employee of contractor BWXT in 2000.

"He's relieved that his six-year ordeal is over," Dillard said after the hearing. "He's certainly sorry for what happened."

According to documents filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court by Assistant U.S. Attorney David Dake, Blauvelt worked for BWXT as a "shift technical adviser" and "held secret and Q-security clearances."

His job gave him access to classified information including documents labeled "secret restricted data" because of references to nuclear weapon making and the potential to cause "serious damage" to national security, Dake told Guyton.

The exact nature of the information at issue in Blauvelt's case was not disclosed in court records, although some of it apparently involved data on fellow employees.

"Mr. Blauvelt was familiar with the rules and regulations concerning access to and possession, use and storage of classified information," Dake wrote. "He served in the United States Navy for 27 years, held a security clearance and dealt with classified information."

At some point in late 2000, an allegation was made to Blauvelt's bosses that he had "compiled a database containing detailed personal and sensitive information about co-workers," Dake wrote.

A search of Blauvelt's office revealed "two diskettes containing personal and potentially compromising information," including "information classified at the secret restricted data level," according to court records.

The search also yielded "the presence of an unauthorized device on an unclassified and networked computer that would permit sending and receiving emails outside of the authorized and monitored system," Dake wrote. "Classified information was also found on this unclassified and networked computer, a strictly forbidden practice."

According to court records, Blauvelt was escorted off the Y-12 complex on Dec. 12, 2000. When agents with the FBI and the Department of Energy's Counterintelligence Unit showed up at his home armed with a search warrant, they found Blauvelt "attempting to erase data from his computer," Dake wrote.

It's not clear why Blauvelt broke the security rules, but Dillard insisted -- and the Justice Department agreed in allowing a misdemeanor plea -- that there is no proof that Blauvelt intended to market the classified information.

San Diego And The SEC (WSJ)

San Diego is approaching the bitter end-game on its pension-fund scandal, with the Securities and Exchange Commission expected to release its own report on the city council's decade-long bender of overpromising benefits and underfunding its pension fund. The SEC is likely to require the city's government to take steps to ensure that the fiasco isn't repeated, allowing it to re-enter the municipal-bond market.

But the nightmare won't end there for San Diego taxpayers, who are left holding the bag for the misfeasance of the city council. For them, two big issues remain: Will the extravagant promises to city employees be honored without regard to their cost or the improprieties involved in making those promises? Second, will the city council be held accountable for creating this mess?

Michael Aguirre, the pugnacious city attorney, has brought suit in federal court to have some of the benefits granted since 1996 rolled back on grounds that they violated federal conflict-of-interest laws. A self-described liberal Democrat, Mr. Aguirre deserves kudos for risking the wrath of the public-sector unions, but his prospects for success are uncertain.

If he loses, reining in the liabilities will become a matter of negotiation with the unions. Good luck with that. A victory, on the other hand, would send a signal that unfunded promises for public-sector employees are not etched in stone, which would be a valuable signal for other state and local governments grappling with extravagant retirement packages for public employees. As Mr. Aguirre points out, current retirees "are drawing 100 cents on the dollar from a pension fund that is only 60% funded." If this were a private company, creditors would demand a haircut for those lucky few. But it's a municipal government, so they're getting away with it.

The city council is another matter. Four of its current members were identified by name as "negligent" in the report on San Diego finances issued by former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt last month: Toni Atkins, James Madaffer, Brian Maienshein and Council President Scott Peters. Mr. Aguirre argues that Mr. Levitt didn't go far enough, and contends that the council members may be criminally culpable for ratcheting up pension benefits and intentionally withholding legally required contributions to the fund to pay for those benefits.

Both men would like to see those council members called to account, but the mechanism for doing so is less than clear. The SEC seems to be taking the position that it has little authority to discipline local politicians, and it may have a point. But San Diego needs access to the capital markets to issue bonds, and this gives the SEC a lever. At the moment, according to those who have reviewed the SEC's draft order, the pension underfunding is described as something that happened, not something that specific people caused to happen through deliberate acts. "They don't name names and that's wrong," Mr. Levitt told us. "These actions didn't occur by themselves."

Fingering the council members would at least offer a small measure of personal accountability. The SEC is justifiably wary of taking unprecedented steps against a local government, but the present system offers no enforcement mechanism at all against local politicians who have put their taxpayers on the hook for over $1 billion in unfunded liabilities. Identifying the culprits would at least signal that this sort of dereliction is as serious when it occurs at a public institution as it would be if it had happened at a private company.

San Diego's pension fund is now underfunded by some $1.5 billion, or about 30%. And its liabilities will grow by 8% a year for the foreseeable future, so it will take a great deal of money in addition to some stellar investment performance if San Diego is ever to climb out of the hole its city council has dug. Mr. Aguirre estimates that his lawsuit could reduce that liability by $500 million, but that still leaves a chasm in the budget. At the moment, 30% of San Diego's budget is going toward retirement benefits, a figure that could rise to 40% over time. Fingering the guilty is the first step back toward honest local government.

CIVIL LAW:

Justices To Decide On Use Of Union Fees For Politics (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The Supreme Court announced yesterday that it will decide whether states may require organized labor to ask some workers for permission to spend their union fees on political activity.

The case addresses the agency fees that some states require workers to pay to labor organizations for representation, even if they chose not to join the unions. The court said it would review a Washington state Supreme Court ruling that struck down a state law barring the use of those fees for political purposes without workers' consent.

The case pits the state of Washington and national right-to-work advocates, backed by campaign finance reformers, against organized labor. At stake, potentially, is much of the money that unions rely on to help fund their state-level political activities.

The law had been adopted by Washington voters as part of a referendum on campaign finance reform. But the state's high court ruled 6 to 3 earlier this year that the law violated unions' First Amendment rights because it presumes workers would object to labor leaders' spending choices.

Washington's state government and a group of five teachers appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. They argue the real free-speech violation lies in spending teachers' mandatory contributions to their union on candidates or causes they do not necessarily support -- and Washington's law is an appropriate means of preventing that.

The teachers in the case do not belong to the Washington Education Association, but they are represented by the union in collective bargaining and they receive the benefits and pay called for in the union's contract with the state's public schools. For that reason, Washington law requires them to pay the union an "agency fee" in lieu of union dues.

The specific question in the case is what the union must do before it spends those nonmember "agency fees" on politics.

The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld agency fee arrangements in general. But it ruled in 1986 that unions must tell those who pay an agency fee how much of it goes to non-collective-bargaining purposes and offer them a refund for that amount.

Washington's law, though, goes further, in that it places the burden on unions, not individual workers, to make sure that no agency fees are being used contrary to fee-payers' wishes.

That was the feature of the law that the Washington Supreme Court majority found unconstitutional.

The Washington Education Association, urging the court not to review that decision, said its impact would not extend beyond the state.

But a friend-of-the-court brief filed by the Campaign Legal Center, a D.C.-based nonprofit group that supports campaign-finance regulation, argued that the Washington decision, if left in place and followed by other state courts, could be used "as authority to strike down state law 'opt-in' restrictions on labor union political activity" in 14 other states.

The court will hear two consolidated cases, Washington v. Washington Education Association , No. 05-1657, and Davenport v. Washington Education Association , No. 05-1589. Oral argument is expected to take place in December, and a decision should come by July.

Top Court To Hear Union Fees Case (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

The Supreme Court said yesterday that it will decide whether a teachers union can collect fees from nonunion members and spend their money on political activity without their prior permission.

The court also agreed to hear a case that could determine whether the government may deport up to 8,000 criminal aliens, and accepted an appeal from Arizona to reinstate the death penalty against a two-time killer who says his attorney was ineffective.

In the union case, the court will decide whether the Washington Education Association (WEA) can spend money, collected from 3,000 nonunion teachers, on political activity without their prior consent. The teachers are required to pay fees to the union even if they don't belong to it because they are deemed to benefit from collective bargaining.

Washington state's Supreme Court ruled that the requirement is unconstitutional because it puts too much burden on the union to check with every nonmember.

The dispute actually involves two cases. One is an appeal by the state's attorney general defending the law, and the other is an appeal on behalf of teachers.

Stefan Gleason, vice president of the Fairfax-based National Right to Work Foundation, which is working on behalf of the teachers, said the case has big stakes because the state court's ruling could be seen to create a right to collect money even from nonunion teachers.

"We're trying to get the state Supreme Court overturned not necessarily because the underlying law is all that helpful, but particularly because of the bad precedent that was created," he said.

Charles Hasse, president of WEA, said that opponents are trying to turn the case "into a cause celebre" but that the union has taken steps to segregate nonmembers' fees so they don't pay for political activity. He said that means even if the high court overturns the state court ruling, the outcome will not penalize the union.

"We feel confident the courts will find we complied with the law as best anyone can with such a poorly worded initiative," he said.

The Supreme Court also agreed to hear a challenge to an appeals court ruling that the government says could prevent deportation of up to 8,000 criminal aliens. The case involves a Peruvian citizen who holds a green card, signifying legal permanent residence in the United States, and turns on whether aiding in a theft is a serious enough crime to warrant deportation.

In the death penalty appeal, the court said it would hear the case of a man who was serving time for murder in Oklahoma, escaped prison and a month later killed a man in Phoenix.

His death sentence was overturned on appeal when a court ruled his attorney should have made a better effort to submit evidence that he was predisposed to violence and suffered brain damage that made him unable to understand the criminal nature of his acts. But Arizona argued that the man, Jeffrey Landrigan, told the trial court that he didn't want to introduce evidence that would have argued against a death sentence.

Both the criminal alien and death penalty disputes are appeals of cases decided in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, as is another set of cases the court agreed to hear -- on whether companies are doing enough to notify customers about penalties or rate increases they assess because of adverse information in credit reports.

Justices To Hear Case On Use Of Union Fees (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — The Supreme Court on Tuesday began the months-long process of filling in its calendar for the new term that begins next week, selecting nine cases from among the nearly 2,000 that accumulated over the summer recess.

The most prominent among the nine cases, which will be argued in December and January, is a constitutional dispute over anti-union measures known as “paycheck protection” laws, which restrict how labor unions can use the fees that nonmembers are often required to pay.

The court’s precedents make clear that nonmembers who object to their fees being used for politics may request a rebate of the amount spent on those activities. The question in the new case, from Washington State, is whether a state may go further and require affirmative consent from nonmembers before the union can spend any part of their fees on political activity.

From the labor unions’ point of view, the difference between permitting nonmembers to “opt out” and requiring them to “opt in” is substantial. They argue that it is burdensome to have to seek permission from nonmembers, and that nonmembers who do not exercise their opt-out rights should be seen as acquiescing in the expenditures.

Washington adopted the consent requirement in a voter initiative in 1992, the first such measure to be adopted in the country. Last year, after a heated campaign, California voters narrowly defeated a similar provision that would have applied only to public employee unions.

The Washington Supreme Court, finding that the affirmative consent requirement imposed an “extremely costly” and “significant” burden on a labor union’s political activities, declared it unconstitutional in March. By establishing a “presumption of dissent,” the court ruled, the measure violated the First Amendment rights of free speech and association.

The justices agreed on Tuesday to hear two appeals from that ruling, consolidated for a single argument. One, Washington v. Washington Education Association, No. 05-1657, was filed by the state, which had brought an enforcement action against the union that is the exclusive bargaining agent for 70,000 teachers.

Of those teachers, some 3,500 have chosen not to join the union, and therefore pay “agency fees” rather than union dues. The state sued the Washington Education Association in response to a complaint that the union was violating the 1992 law by failing to get authorization from the nonmembers before using part of their fees for political activities.

The second appeal, Davenport v. Washington Education Association, No. 05-1589, was filed by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation on behalf of five teachers who had brought a class-action lawsuit to recover fees they alleged the union had spent improperly.

The foundation, which describes itself as dedicated to fighting “the abuses of compulsory unionism,” told the justices in its appeal that “while the power to persuade is protected by the First Amendment, the power to compel conformity (and financial support) is not.”

The union told the justices that the rights of objecting nonmembers were “fully protected” by advising them of their right to opt out.

The initiative added the labor union provision to Washington’s campaign finance law. Washington permits unions to use their general treasuries for political activities. Federal law, by contrast, requires labor unions to set up special segregated funds for political activity, to which members may make voluntary contributions.

The Supreme Court’s decision, consequently, will have no impact on the federal campaign law. According to one of the briefs in the case, five other states — Idaho, Michigan, Ohio, Utah and Wyoming — have laws prohibiting the use of union members’ dues for political purposes without their affirmative consent.

Another of the new cases the justices accepted on Tuesday was an appeal filed by the State of Arizona of a federal appeals court’s decision to permit a death row inmate to challenge his sentence on the ground that he had not received the effective assistance of counsel.

The state argues that the decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to permit the defendant, Jeffrey Landrigan, to proceed with his habeas corpus petition failed to give proper deference to the Arizona courts’ finding that it was Mr. Landrigan himself who had obstructed his lawyer’s effort to present mitigating evidence that might have spared his life.

Mr. Landrigan was convicted of killing a man in Phoenix in 1989, after escaping from an Oklahoma prison where he was serving a term for murder. His lawyer had called Mr. Landrigan’s mother and his former wife to testify on his behalf during the sentencing phase. But Mr. Landrigan instructed them not to testify, telling the judge: “I think if you want to give me the death penalty, just bring it right on. I’m ready for it.”

When the judge tried to clarify his position, Mr. Landrigan asserted that he did not want to present any mitigating evidence.

The question in the appeal, Schriro v. Landrigan, No. 05-1575, is whether the Ninth Circuit exceeded its authority under a 1996 federal law, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, in reopening the case rather than deferring to the Arizona courts’ conclusion that Mr. Landrigan’s complaint about his lawyer’s performance was “frivolous.”

Wacky Tobacco Lawsuit (LAT)

AN APPEALS COURT MUST DECIDE whether, as a matter of law, a federal judge in Brooklyn erred in refusing to block a class-action racketeering lawsuit against tobacco companies on behalf of millions of smokers of "light" cigarettes. But lay people are likely to scratch their heads over District Judge Jack B. Weinstein's decision to let this lawsuit proceed — especially when they learn that the damage supposedly caused by the tobacco industry was to smokers' wallets, not their lungs.

That's right, the lawsuit certified by Weinstein alleges not that smokers of "light" cigarettes were made sick by the cigarettes they purchased but that they were misled into thinking that "light" and "low tar" cigarette designations meant they were safer. It's much easier to allege that people were duped by marketing than to show that they got sick from smoking. The lawyers bringing the suit seek to force tobacco companies to disgorge their "ill-gotten gains."

In allowing the suit to proceed, Weinstein referred to the plaintiffs' legal theory as "elegant." That's an understatement. How do you prove that millions of people bought a specific kind of cigarette because of a specific claim made on its behalf? And how do you hold tobacco companies liable for marketing campaigns that were regulated by the government? Such questions led the Illinois Supreme Court to throw out a $10-billion verdict against Philip Morris USA Inc. in a similar case last December.

Because this is a class-action suit, most "victims" will not have to come forward to explain how they specifically were snookered into paying for cigarettes that were more harmful than advertised.

If Weinstein isn't overruled, his decision will be a windfall for lawyers, a disaster for tobacco companies — which already have agreed to pay out billions of dollars as part of a settlement with state attorneys general — and a travesty for the cause of due process.

This case has little to do with ameliorating the health effects of smoking. In a refreshingly candid section of his opinion, Weinstein noted that "this, and other suits like it, probably have had only a minimal value in reducing what even defendants now concede are the enormous costs to public health of widespread cigarette smoking. More effective in alleviating smoking dangers are probably such legislative and administrative efforts as prohibiting smoking in public and commercial areas and raising prices, primarily through taxes."

Private litigation is a poor excuse for enlightened legislation. If elected representatives are unwilling to do more than they have done already to discourage smoking, federal courts shouldn't be expected to pick up the slack — especially on the basis of "elegant" theories like this one.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales Asked To Probe Prosecution Of Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher yesterday asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to investigate what he called "the exceedingly harsh prosecution" of two U.S. Border Patrol agents now facing 20 years in prison for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks.

"This proceeding has garnered national attention calling into question the administration's commitment to secure our borders," said Mr. Rohrabacher, adding that the two agents -- Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean -- "were simply doing their jobs to guard our homeland by attempting to apprehend an illegal drug smuggler."

The California Republican's letter also called for the agents' sentencing next month to be postponed "due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding" their prosecution.

Mr. Rohrabacher joins a growing list of Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill who have asked for congressional hearings and reviews by the White House and Justice Department into the prosecution.

"It appears the facts do not add up or justify the length of the sentences for these agents, let alone their conviction on multiple counts," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, said in a letter last month to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, requesting a full hearing into the matter.

"Undue prosecution of Border Patrol agents could have a chilling effect on their ability to carry out their duties," she said.

In March, a federal jury convicted Ramos, 37, and Compean, 28, of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence, and a civil rights violation. The shooting occurred Feb. 17, 2005, near Fabens, Texas, about 30 miles southeast of El Paso.

Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, was wounded as he ran from the agents along the Rio Grande. The agents said Mr. Aldrete-Davila had pointed at them what appeared to be a gun. Nearly 800 pounds of marijuana, worth $1 million, was found in the van Mr. Aldrete-Davila abandoned at the river's edge, the Border Patrol said.

Mr. Aldrete-Davila, who was given immunity by prosecutors to testify in the case, received care at William Beaumont Army Medical Center in El Paso. He is suing the government for $5 million for violating his civil rights.

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, has called for a congressional investigation and open hearings on the case. The investigation is expected to begin before the end of the year.

Rep. John Hostettler, Indiana Republican and chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee on immigration, border security and claims, has said that if the arrest, trial and conviction of the agents resulted in a chilling effect on others, "then it's definitely something we should know about."

Records show that after Mr. Aldrete-Davila was spotted in his van near the Rio Grande, Ramos gave chase while Compean circled around to head off the suspect. When Mr. Aldrete-Davila jumped out of the van and ran south to the river, he was confronted by Compean, who was thrown to the ground as the two men fought. Ramos said that when he arrived, he saw Compean on the ground and chased Mr. Aldrete-Davila to the river, where the suspect suddenly turned toward him and pointed what looked like a gun.

Ramos said he did not think the suspect was hit. He said Mr. Aldrete-Davila ran through the bush, jumped into an awaiting van in Mexico and sped off.

An investigator from the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General found Mr. Aldrete-Davila in Mexico, where he was offered immunity in exchange for testimony.

"This case represents the worst kind of distorted and upside-down values," Mr. Rohrabacher said. "The drug smugglers are treated like innocent victims and the good guys protecting our borders are given the harshest possible punishment."

She Took Badge To Nab Hub Officer (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 27, 2006

Woman says she was forced to have sex

A 19-year-old prostitute feared that no one would believe her if she said an off-duty Boston police officer kept forcing her to perform sex in his car. So one night, she fled his car with a key piece of evidence: his badge.

It was a bold move, the woman's lawyer said yesterday. And later, the lawyer said, when Officer Michael LoPriore called the woman to get his badge back, the FBI was listening, too.

LoPriore, 37, of Everett, was charged in federal court yesterday with depriving the woman of her rights by using his position as a police officer to coerce her to perform sex in September 2004.

According to a plea agreement filed with the court by the US attorney's public corruption unit, LoPriore, a 12-year Boston police veteran, will plead guilty, resign from the department, and never seek another job as a police officer in Massachusetts.

Prosecutors will recommend that he serve a year in prison, but LoPriore's lawyer may seek probation. A plea date has not yet been set.

His lawyer, Thomas Drechsler, declined to comment on the case yesterday, saying only, ``I hope the matter will be resolved shortly."

Boston lawyer John Swomley, who represents the woman, said she came to his office in the fall of 2004. She is not identified in court documents.

``She plopped down a badge in a black leather case and said, ``Oh, my God, what do I do?" Swomley said.

He said she told him that ``this guy has been making me give him [oral sex] whenever he sees me, and I just got sick of it. . . . When his pants were down around his ankles, I just took his badge."

The woman said LoPriore, who was assigned to East Boston, stopped her in Boston's Combat Zone while he was off duty. He was driving in his personal car with a child's car seat strapped in the back.

He flashed his badge, ordered her into the car, and drove her to various locations, where he forced her to perform oral sex, Swomley said.

His client was very troubled, too, that the officer refused to wear a condom, the lawyer said.

Swomley said he gave the black leather case containing LoPriore's badge, police identification photo, license to carry a firearm, and Social Security card to the FBI. Later, he said, agents secretly recorded the telephone call between his client and LoPriore.

Albert Goslin, the Police Department's acting commissioner, said that the FBI notified the department about the allegations in October 2004 and that LoPriore was placed on restricted duty, performing clerical work inside a station without a firearm.

While the FBI investigation was underway, LoPriore was charged with felony larceny in state court for allegedly forging signatures on timecards and collecting $1,102 pay for detail shifts he never worked at an East Boston construction site in 2004. That case, brought by Suffolk District Attorney Daniel F. Conley, is pending.

``Obviously it is important to us that I get someone of this ilk removed from the Police Department," said Goslin, adding that Boston police worked with federal authorities to craft language in the plea agreement that says LoPriore will waive all rights to reinstatement, appeal, or lost pay associated with his resignation.

He said the department, which worked with the FBI during the probe, was restricted by law from suspending LoPriore while the investigation into the sexual allegations was ongoing.

LoPriore, whose resignation becomes effective today, has had a history of complaints involving women.

While on duty in March 2002 , LoPriore transported an intoxicated woman in his cruiser without notifying operations or a supervisor, according to Boston Police Department records.

And in August 2002, LoPriore and another officer were outside their assigned patrol area when they saw a disturbance involving an intoxicated woman outside a club. The officers took the woman into their cruiser, drove her to Charlestown, and left her there, according to police records.

Under an agreement that settled both complaints, LoPriore served 20 days of a 60-day suspension.

In a statement announcing yesterday's charges against LoPriore, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan called the officer's conduct ``reprehensible."

``While only a minuscule percentage of law enforcement officers abuse their power," Sullivan said, ``such incidents unfairly taint the reputation of law enforcement professionals everywhere."

Disgraced Cop Quits Force (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet And Michele McPhee

Boston Herald, September 27, 2006

A Boston cop awaiting trial on charges of cashing in on details he reportedly never worked resigned yesterday after pleading guilty to using his badge to bargain for sex.

Sources said the alleged trysts between Michael Lopriore, 37, and a woman identified only as "JT" are believed to have occurred in September 2004 while he was both on duty and off.

"Getting rid of characters of his ilk can't be done quick enough," acting Boston police Commissioner Albert Goslin said. "We don't make excuses for anybody."

In exchange for no more than one year in prison, Lopriore, a 12-year veteran of the force who was assigned to East Boston, admitted to a federal charge of violating JT's civil rights. He will be formally sentenced at a later date.

"It is a misdemeanor," said Lopriore's attorney, Thomas Drechsler. "I'm hoping the matter will be resolved quickly."

Meanwhile, Lopriore still faces a 2005 state charge of larceny for allegedly pocketing $1,102 for detail jobs he never showed up for.

Because Lopriore was never indicted, Goslin said he was placed on desk duty at District A-7, where a supervisor could keep an eye on him.

Lopriore has been a habitual thorn in the department's side, personnel records indicate.

In 2003, he was suspended for 20 days after it was found he had picked up a drunk clubgoer in his cruiser and gave her a lift to Charlestown without notifying the department.

In 1995, while still a rookie, he was suspended for three days for violating multiple department rules and procedures.

AP, September 27, 2006

BOSTON— A 12-year veteran of the Boston Police Department was charged in federal court Tuesday with violating the civil rights of a woman he allegedly coerced to perform a sex act.

He has agreed to plead guilty, resign, and never seek another job as a police officer in Massachusetts, according to a plea agreement filed with U.S. attorney's office, The Boston Globe reported on its Web site.

An attorney for Lopriore did not immediately return telephone messages Monday night. A telephone listing for Lopriore could not immediately be found.

Lopriore had been placed on administrative leave, acting Boston Police Commissioner Albert Goslin said in a statement.

Forced Labor Case Expanded (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 27, 2006

Two managers of a Kansas City ice cream company were indicted Wednesday on new charges related to the alleged forced labor of Russian students who drove ice cream trucks.

David L. Carslake, 55, and David H. Mackintosh, 45, were among five men charged Monday in U.S. District Court in Kansas City with violating federal human trafficking laws.

On Wednesday, a grand jury in Springfield indicted Carslake and Mackintosh on a charge of document servitude for allegedly confiscating the passports and other identification documents of the eight young Russian men identified as victims in the human trafficking case.

Carslake was also indicted on a charge of visa fraud for allegedly making false statements in federal immigration documents concerning the status of the Russian students.

Federal prosecutors allege that the college-age students were forced to work long hours for little pay driving ice cream trucks for Kansas City-based Frosty Treats. The men were led to believe that they would suffer "serious harm" if they did not do as they were told, according to the indictment and supporting documents.

Carl Long, CEO of Frosty Treats, which operates ice cream trucks in cities throughout the country, said Wednesday that he was confident the company will be cleared of wrongdoing.

"We have a dispute over the factual pleadings brought forward by the government," Long said.

The company has provided jobs to foreign students for many years, he said, and has never had problems before.

The other defendants named in the indictment are Jeffrey S. Guinn, 45, of Kansas City, and Evgeny Filimonov, 20, and Vadim Aleksandvovich-Tokarev, 21, both citizens of Russia.

The Belleville News Democrat, September 27, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Three Kansas City men and two Russian nationals were charged in federal court with forcing eight Russian students to deliver ice cream for a local truck company, U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman said Tuesday.

David L. Carslake, 55, David H. Mackintosh, 45, and Jeffrey S. Guinn, 45, all of Kansas City, and Evgeny Sergeyevich Filimonov, 20, and Vadim Aleksandvovich-Tokarev, 21, both Russian citizens, were charged in a criminal complaint unsealed Tuesday after their arrest, Schlozman said in a news release.

Authorities said the men collaborated to force the students to work for Frosty Treats ice cream truck company of Kansas City by telling them they would be seriously harmed if they refused.

All five are charged with aiding and abetting each other from Jan. 1 to Sept. 17 to obtain forced labor. Schlozman said the case would go before a federal jury.

The eight students from Voronozh, Russia, were recruited under a summer work program run by the Russian company InterAir, according to an affidavit filed in support of the case. Frosty Treats employee Filimonov allegedly worked in Russia with Aleksandvovich-Tokarev to recruit the students, none of whom had traveled to the U.S. before and some of whom spoke no English, Schlozman said.

The students signed employment contracts to get work visas and each borrowed $2,500 to pay for their trips, Schlozman said.

Carslake and Mackintosh, the managers of Frosty Treats, are accused of threatening the students both psychologically and financially once they came to Missouri, forcing them to deliver ice cream. Guinn, the maintenance worker at the complex where the students lived, allegedly monitored their activities in the apartments.

The students were promised a "financially rewarding summer," but were forced to work 13 hours a day, seven days a week, sometimes for just 87 cents per hour, the affidavit said. The defendants forced six of them to live in a one-bedroom apartment, where they weren't allowed to use the telephone, Schlozman said.

Cambodia Gets Tough On Child Sex Trade (CSM)

By Adam Piore

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

PHNOM PENH, CAMBODIA

Cambodian police this year have arrested at least 12 foreigners on charges of sexually abusing children - more than twice the amount snagged all of last year.

In addition to three Americans, they've caught four Germans, an elderly Swiss man, a Belgium national, and at least three Vietnamese nationals who helped the foreigners procure children.

For those who have long fought pedophilia here, the spike is actually cause for celebration. Most agree the increase from just five arrests last year probably has little to do with the prevalence of the crimes. Rather it's a function of increased political will, effort, and skill - encouraged by foreign governments like the US - on the part of Cambodia's police, who have for years been accused of allowing foreign pedophiles to operate with impunity.

"They are more reactive, more willing to work on this," says Beatrice Magnier, director of Action Pour Les Enfants, (APLE), a French nongovernmental organization that works to combat the child sex trade.

Khieu Sopheak, spokesman for the Ministry of Interior, says, "The authorities have increased their knowledge and skills after cooperation with NGOs. The implementation of the law gets better from one day to the next."

It's a trend that's been in the offing since at least 2000, when Cambodia first launched a major initiative funded by foreign donors aimed at targeting the exploitation of women and children and set up a hotline to receive tips. In 2002, Cambodia established a department in the Ministry of Interior specifically devoted to combating human trafficking and protecting at-risk juveniles.

But obstacles of apathy, corruption, and poverty prove to be constant challenges, NGO workers say. After all, many of the former leaders of the genocidal Khmer Rouge regime continue to live freely in Cambodia's northwestern provinces, unrepentant for crimes that killed 2 million Cambodians between the years 1975-1979. In Phnom Penh, angry mobs routinely beat thieves to death on the streets, because few trust the police to prosecute them. And corruption can often buy freedom for even the most heinous crimes.

But in recent years, foreign governments have gotten more serious about cracking down on the problem, and made it more difficult for Cambodian authorities to ignore.

In 2003, the US Congress passed the Child Protect Act, which allows the US to prosecute American citizens in the US for crimes against children committed overseas. Penalties can reach 30 years in prison. Canada, among others, recently enacted a similar law.

Since 2003, Cambodia has arrested and deported at least six Americans to face charges there, under the new law. One was Michael John Koklich, a California native who fled Cambodian police on his motorbike in February, before crashing into a barricade, and taking down Phnom Penh's deputy municipal antitrafficking police chief in the process.

"Cambodia has become a valuable ally in arresting the worst of all sexual predators, pedophiles," US Ambassador Joseph Mussomeli says. "We are very pleased with the excellent cooperation we have received."

And there are other encouraging signs. For years, pedophiles flocked to Svay Pak, the brothel village on the outskirts of Phnom Penh, bragging about exploits at coffeehouses and bars. NGOs and foreign governments tried in vain to convince Cambodia to do something about the child prostitution, which operated with impunity there. The government shut it down in 2004.

Nowadays in the countryside, even in remote areas, signs abound bearing the hotline number and the slogan: "Turn a sex tourist into an ex-tourist." The signs show a white hand holding the hand of a child in one picture, and the white hand in hand cuffs next.

Still, most agree there is a lot of work to be done. Even as Cambodia has taken steps forward, some point to recent missteps. Police arrested Terry Darrell Smith on July 31 and, according to the International Justice Mission (IJM), found evidence he was involved with two Vietnamese girls in their early teens.

But earlier this month, a Cambodian court released him and, says IJM, a US group working to end the underage sex trade, he disappeared for weeks. Police rearrested him last Wednesday following public outcry and diplomatic pressure, according to local newspaper reports. Authorities now plan to deport him to his home state of Oregon where he will face criminal charges. "The policies are improving, but the court is still very weak," says APLE's Mr. Magnier.

Recently, Cambodia apparently granted citizenship to Thomas Frank White, a millionaire from San Francisco currently in a Mexican jail on child sex charges. He's also wanted in the US for violating the Protect Act and has been accused by Thai officials of abusing children there.

Suspected pedophiles often come to Cambodia hoping to find anonymity. Fifteen years ago in Oregon, Mr. Smith had been "convicted of multiple charges that he used children in displays of sexual acts," The Oregonian reported last week. Belgian national Bessape Philippe, also arrested recently, had spent three years in a Belgian prison for abusing three Belgian boys aged 14 to 16.

APLE's Magnier says it's difficult to stop pedophiles operating in remote provinces. Perpetrators are often residents or long-term tourists who insinuate themselves into the lives of families, and develop the role of financial benefactors. They will prey on the child and use their financial leverage to prevent the family from taking action, he says.

Many of the recent cases came to light only because the perpetrators were careless and reported by groups like APLE, or cruel enough to make a scene. In the others, NGO workers used detective work: following tips, tracking suspects, interviewing victims, and turning cases over to the police.

Hate Crimes Wake Charles's Sleeping Giant (WP)

By Philip Rucker And William Wan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Rash of Race-Based Incidents Stems From Anger Over Shift in Demographics, Some Residents Say

A wave of offensive graffiti and vandalism in the past seven weeks has opened a public dialogue about the impact of a dramatic demographic shift in Charles County and has led officials to begin combating what some residents say has existed for years: a race relations problem.

As Charles transforms from a land of sprawling tobacco farms to a far-flung exurb of Washington, few have spoken openly about what one black resident calls "the browning of Charles County" -- the movement of large numbers of middle-class black families to an area that not long ago was predominantly white.

"There have been underlying feelings about racism in this county for many years," said Sandra Washington, a black woman who has lived in the Southern Maryland county for 25 years and helps run an alliance of African American ministers.

"So much of that has been bottled up in people," Washington said. "These are things that are exploding now."

At least 10 incidences of racist graffiti or vandalism, all classified as hate crimes, have occurred in Charles since mid-August. This month, police found "KKK" and disturbing symbols spray-painted on the doors and sign of a predominantly black Baptist church.

"When they're spraying 'white pride' and 'KKK,' that's not a perception problem. That's a real problem, and it's something that needs to be stopped," said Sheriff Frederick E. Davis, a Republican who is running for reelection.

FBI agents are planning to join authorities in their search for the vandals at the request of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the House Democratic whip, whose district includes Southern Maryland.

Wayne Cooper (D), president of the county Board of Commissioners, asked Hoyer last week to help get the federal government involved. "This is too much, and it's happening too fast," Cooper said.

State legislators representing Charles have pledged to review Maryland's hate crime laws, and county leaders plan town hall forums to promote racial tolerance and encourage discussion.

Charles is the fastest-growing Maryland county in the Washington region, and its growth has been fueled almost exclusively by blacks and other minorities.

Although the white population remained relatively stagnant between 2000 and 2005 -- decreasing by about 1,300 people -- the black population increased by more than 50 percent, jumping from about 31,000 to 47,500, according to census estimates. African Americans make up about 34 percent of Charles's approximately 139,000 residents.

Many of the new black residents are prosperous professionals who have left Prince George's County, Charles's neighbor to the north. Drawn by the county's relatively affordable homes, schools and rural character, many of these new residents have bought half-million-dollar homes in subdivisions that have sprouted on land where tobacco used to grow and slavery once thrived.

"There's the browning of Charles County. It's happening, and everybody's not on board with it happening," said Washington, executive director of Lifestyles Inc., a nonprofit community services organization based in La Plata.

Some leaders think the recent vandalism -- coupled with memories of the 2004 arson that destroyed or damaged 27 new houses in the Hunters Brooke subdivision, many of them bought by black families -- threatens to thwart the county's aggressive efforts to woo businesses and higher-paying jobs.

"It's a very urgent problem," Commissioner Candice Quinn Kelly (R-La Plata) said of the lingering notion of Charles as racist. "We're working hard to shed that image."

"Who would want to bring their company or business to a place where their employees may feel unrest?" Commissioner Edith J. Patterson (D-Pomfret) asked. "Who would want to move here if they're afraid they'll open their doors at night and be attacked either by graffiti or other means? . . .

"We need to send a resounding message that this is not Charles County, this is not who we are and this is not what we want to represent."

The recent crimes have frustrated law enforcement officials. It takes only seconds to spray-paint the letters "KKK" on a building, authorities say, and, in a county where homes and churches are sometimes separated by miles, officers can cover only so much territory.

The county commissioners are offering $5,000 to find the vandals, and the sheriff's office is offering $1,000, but police have named suspects in only one incident.

The county sheriff's department announced yesterday the arrests of two 15-year-old Waldorf boys in a Sept. 9 incident. Authorities charged the juveniles, both of whom are white, with multiple counts of hate crime and malicious destruction of property in the spray-painting of two residences and a vehicle with racist graffiti in Waldorf.

Authorities said they do not believe that incident is related to the others.

When Zion Baptist Church was vandalized in rural Welcome on Sept. 10, officers said, they responded within 12 minutes of a triggered burglar alarm. They canvassed the neighborhood but found no suspects or significant clues.

"It's a frustrating kind of investigation," Davis said. "In some cases where they're spray-painting 'white pride' on the road, these people could just pull over . . . jump back in and get going in less than a minute."

Motives for the crimes are just as elusive. No known members of the Ku Klux Klan are in the county, said Capt. Joseph C. Montminy of the sheriff's office. The vandals could be members of radical organizations, he said, or they could be neighborhood teenagers.

"Some may be copycats, seeing someone who did this a few weeks ago and deciding to do it, too," Montminy said. "But until we're able to make any arrests, we just don't know."

The crimes have alarmed many residents. Patterson, who became the county's first black commissioner last year and is one of two African American candidates for the five-member board this fall, said unrest over hate crimes "is in its own way a form of terrorism."

William Braxton, the local NAACP president, moved to Charles from Prince George's in 1973. When he arrived, he said, "the 'N-word' was common to use."

White residents didn't know how to react to their new black neighbors and hoped that any awkwardness would go away if they stayed quiet, he said.

He said racial tensions have remained in the county and likened them to a "sleeping giant."

For white residents, some say, it took awhile for the migration of black families to the county in the late 1990s and early 2000s to sink in -- and even longer before people discussed it.

"They started looking around the restaurants, and a majority of the people eating there were black," Braxton said. "When they went to the mall and looked around and there were African Americans everywhere. It's like one day they just woke up, and there it was."

Change in a community is always difficult to handle, Kelly said.

"You have the newcomer thing going on, plus the fact that the newcomers are of a different race," Kelly said. "I'm sure there is a certain interpersonal struggle that takes place when you see the place you were born and raised changing. That's just the reality."

Staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

Judge Says St. Landry School Case On Target (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess, Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 27, 2006

LAFAYETTE — The St. Landry Parish school system is on track to be released from federal oversight by the end of next year, the federal judge handling the parish's desegregation case said Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge Tucker Melancon made the comments during a quarterly meeting in Lafayette with St. Landry Parish school system officials and School Board members.

"My intention in this case is to get it over as soon as possible," Melancon said. "… Barring some unforeseen circumstance, it's going to happen next December (2007)."

Melancon said he hopes to convene court in Opelousas — the St. Landry Parish seat — for the formal hearing to declare the school system "unitary," or free from discrimination.

Several legal hurdles remain.

To be freed from federal oversight, school officials must show discrimination has been eliminated in six areas.

Melancon ruled last year that three areas were unitary: transportation, faculty assignment and extracurricular activities.

The school system still must show discrimination does not affect decisions on the quality of education offered to students, the quality of facilities and student assignment.

A hearing was set for Tuesday on a motion by the School Board for unitary status in the area of quality of education.

That hearing was delayed to allow Justice Department attorneys time to review a forthcoming report from the state with information about racial balance in special-education programs, an issue raised in St. Landry Parish.

The hearing is expected to be taken up later this year.

In other business, school system officials reported $8 million has been spent on new construction and renovation to meet goals in a school facilities plan outlined in the desegregation case.

House Passes Abortion Bill On Minors (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 (AP) — Accompanying a minor across a state line to obtain an abortion and avoid parental notification in the girl's home state would become a federal crime under a bill the House passed Tuesday on a vote of 264 to 153.

Supporters of the legislation argued that it made no sense that minors who need parental permission to get an aspirin at school or to go on field trips can get an abortion without telling their parents.

The bill's sponsor, Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Republican of Florida, said, "It protects minors from exploitation from the abortion industry, it promotes strong family ties and it helps foster respect for state laws."

Opponents argued that it would result in the arrests of grandparents and others who were trying to shield girls from abusive parents.

Chances are slim that the House and the Senate, which approved a more limited version of the bill in July, will devise a compromise they can send to the president before the end of this session of Congress. But the House vote gives conservatives something to showcase when they return home next week to campaign for the midterm elections.

The interstate abortion bill, long a priority of anti-abortion groups, was one of the top items on conservative agendas this year, along with stem cell research.

The House on Tuesday passed another bill on that agenda, a measure that would cut off financial awards to plaintiffs who bring successful lawsuits against expressions of religion like Christmas displays on government grounds. The aim of the measure, approved 244 to 173, is to discourage lawsuits against local, state and federal governments over issues of separation of church and state.

There is no companion Senate bill and little chance the Senate will consider the House bill this session. The House vote was a reminder to the Republican Party's conservative base, however, that their issues were not being ignored.

Despite intense partisan divisions over the course of the Iraq war, the House on Tuesday easily approved $70 billion more for military operations there and in Afghanistan. Lawmakers also adopted a record $448 billion budget for the Pentagon.

With Iraq alone costing about $8 billion a month, another infusion of money will be needed next spring.

The House passed the Pentagon appropriations bill by a 394-to-22 vote Tuesday night, and the Senate is expected to act before adjourning this weekend.

Abortion Vote In House May Be Too Late To Boost GOP (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Scrambling to pass anti-abortion legislation before they recess for fall congressional elections, House Republicans on Tuesday won passage of a bill that would make it a federal crime to evade one state's parental consent laws by taking a minor to another state for an abortion.

But in a mark of the majority party's struggles with its "values" agenda, Senate Republicans may run out of time to vote on the measure before lawmakers leave town at the end of the week.

That would leave Republicans with few trophies to show their socially conservative base as they try to motivate voters in the final six weeks of the fiercely contested 2006 campaign.

Some strategists fear that failure to win final passage of the bill could hamper efforts to spur turnout of a reliably Republican voting bloc — which might mean the difference in key races around the country.

"This could be a problem," said Marjorie Dannenfelser, president of the Susan B. Anthony List, an anti-abortion group that is working to mobilize female voters opposed to abortion in six states seen as central to the fight for control of Congress.

Dannenfelser's warning came just days after national evangelical leaders met in Washington to intensify their push to persuade conservative voters to look past Republican legislative failures and go to the polls in November to support the party's candidates.

The bill that the House passed Tuesday by a vote of 264 to 153 was the latest initiative in a more than decade-long campaign to chip away at abortion rights.

But aides to senior Senate Republicans said Tuesday that they could not be sure the measure would make it to the floor for a vote.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who is fending off attacks by Democrats that he has presided over a "do-nothing" Congress, is under pressure in the session's waning days to pass crucial legislation funding the military, setting up tribunals for suspected terrorists and strengthening border security.

Faced with these priorities, consideration of the parental consent bill may have to wait until a lame-duck session after November's election.

Republican congressional leaders had not planned to be in this position six weeks before election day. In the aftermath of the party's 2004 electoral triumphs, in which socially conservative voters played a large role, the GOP agenda included initiatives to ban gay marriage and flag burning and to further limit abortions.

But the Bush administration focused on other issues in 2005. This year, a bid to ban gay marriage through a constitutional amendment foundered in June, as moderate Republicans in the Senate joined Democrats to block a vote on the issue.

Later that month, the Senate by one vote rejected a constitutional amendment that would have given Congress the power to ban flag burning.

The campaign to restrict access to abortions, meanwhile, has produced fewer successes than many conservatives had hoped.

"Have we had victories? Not enough," said Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio), a leading abortion foe who championed congressional passage of the controversial ban on what opponents term "partial birth" abortion three years ago.

Chabot said he could point to only two major legislative accomplishments since 1994, when Republicans took control of Congress: the abortion ban, which has been tied up in the courts, and a 2002 measure that requires a doctor who performs an abortion in which the fetus survives to turn the case over to another doctor or call 911 to have the baby transferred to a hospital.

Backers of the parental consent measure remain optimistic that it will become law, if not quite as quickly as they had hoped.

For years, state legislatures have been passing laws that require pregnant minors to notify or seek permission from a parent before they get an abortion.

About 35 states have a version of the measure on the books, which supporters say appropriately involves parents in the significant reproductive decisions of their children. Californians last year narrowly rejected such a law; Proposition 85 will put the issue before voters again in November.

Despite the proliferation of the notification measures, abortion opponents complain that some adults are helping an unknown number of minors skirt the laws by taking them to states that do not have the requirements.

In July, the Senate passed legislation that would criminalize that practice. President Bush said that he would sign the measure.

Instead of accepting the Senate bill, however, the House passed a modified version. Its author, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), said that she wanted a stronger version of the measure.

Along with making it a crime for anyone to take a minor across state lines for an abortion without parental consent, the House bill added a provision requiring the abortion provider to give one of the girl's parents or a legal guardian 24 hours' notice before the operation is performed.

The change means the bill cannot become law without going back to the Senate for another vote.

"We've never been this close. I see victory," said Ros-Lehtinen, who sent Frist and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) a strongly worded plea to agree to have a Senate vote before Congress recesses.

The plea was echoed by the president of the Family Research Council, Tony Perkins, who said in a statement: "This is the only pro-life legislation considered by Congress this session, and the Senate must get it done."

Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, charged that House Republicans were pushing the bill as a political ploy.

"It's clear that anti-choice congressional leaders are using this controversial legislation to rally their far-right base only a few weeks before the midterm election," Keenan said.

Critics of the bill said family problems make it difficult for some minors who want an abortion to communicate with their parents.

Joining 215 Republicans in voting for the bill were 49 Democrats; opposing it were 143 Democrats, nine Republicans and one independent.

All 20 Republican members of California's House delegation supported the measure. All of the state's 33 Democrats opposed the bill except Reps. Dennis Cardoza of Atwater and Jim Costa of Fresno, who supported it, and Juanita Millender-McDonald of Carson, who did not vote.

GOP Pushes 'Values' Legislation (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

House Republican leaders yesterday sought to invigorate their conservative base with election-year legislation aimed at protecting both the religious freedom of municipalities and a parent's role in a minor's abortion decision.

The House passed a revised parental-notification bill and legislation limiting legal damages against cities and towns that lose lawsuits for violating the Constitution's ban on the establishment of religion.

"They help our members back home," a House Republican leadership aide said of the two bills. "Some of our members have constituents in their districts who really want this legislation."

The parental-notification bill, approved 264-153, would establish fines or up to a year in prison for anyone who knowingly skirts a state's parental-notification or parental-consent law by taking a pregnant minor to another state to have an abortion.

Both chambers approved different versions of the bill earlier this year, but Senate Democrats have blocked the final negotiations, seeking, among other things, changes to limit the notification rights of fathers who rape their daughters.

It was not clear yesterday whether the Senate would act on the bill this week, but if it does, the bill would likely pass and could then go on to President Bush, supporters said.

The House also approved, on a 244-173 vote, another element of the Republican "American Values Agenda" -- the Public Expression of Religion Act, which would deny legal fees to groups who win lawsuits against cities or towns found to have violated separation of church and state.

Supporters said municipalities currently feel pressured to remove public displays of religion such as monuments of the Ten Commandments from city halls because they would need to spend "millions" in taxpayer dollars to defend themselves.

If the Public Expression of Religion Act were to become law, groups like the American Civil Liberties Union would be barred from receiving legal fees if they prevail in a court battle.

"It would be a win for those that understand our Constitution guarantees freedom of religion, not freedom from religion," said Rep. Joe Pitts, Pennsylvania Republican.

The ACLU said it would discourage enforcement of the religious element of the Bill of Rights.

"This legislation would in fact weaken the very freedom they claim to be protecting," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office.

Meanwhile, Tom McClusky, vice president for government affairs at the Family Research Council, said the Election Day motivation of the Republican base is "mixed" right now, and it would help if Congress were to approve these two bills.

He said it would also help if language being negotiated in the defense authorization bill would allow military chaplains to publicly pray as they see fit, including using Jesus' name.

"They help with the base," he said of the bills. "It helps them to know Congress is caring about the issues they care about."

Democrats said Republicans are rightfully scared that they'll lose their majority in November, but added their efforts are too little too late.

"It's not going to work. They're looking for a lifesaver," said Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat.

He said that, unlike a few years ago, Republicans now face a public that's unhappy about the Iraq war, the handling of Hurricane Katrina and a large budget deficit. "If saying that you appreciate religion is going to turn that around, I'd like to see it," he said.

The parental-notification bill approved by the House yesterday differs from the Senate version because it would require the doctor performing the abortion to contact at least one of the girl's parents if the minor is from out of state.

To accommodate the Senate, House leaders also added a Senate provision, backed by Democrat Sen. Barbara Boxer of California, clarifying that a father who rapes his underage daughter couldn't sue someone who transports her out of state for an abortion. And if that father transports her, he would be subject to the bill's penalties.

By Jim Abrams

House Republicans, carrying out their election-year values agenda, on Tuesday pushed through legislation cutting off financial awards for lawsuits successfully filed against expressions of religion such as Christmas displays on government grounds.

The bill, passed 244-173, denies the awarding of attorney's fees or monetary damages to a party that wins a court case based on the establishment clause in the Constitution that is used to argue a separation of church and state.

There is no companion Senate bill and little chance the Senate would consider it in the waning days of this session, but the House vote was a reminder to the GOP's conservative base that their issues are not being ignored.

"We cannot continue to allow frivolous and, frankly, unwarranted lawsuits to stifle the beliefs and self-determination of our great communities," said Rep. Phil Gingrey, R-Ga.

"This bill would make it more difficult for ordinary Americans to defend their religious freedom against intrusion by government," said Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Texas. "There's nothing benign about this bill."

"Singling out one class of cases for the denial of attorney's fees when every other one gets them does seem to me an odd way to run a constitution," said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass.

Backers of the legislation cited cases contesting the use of religious symbols, such as crosses in veterans' cemeteries, the display of the Ten Commandments in public buildings or using public land to host the Boy Scouts, who require participants to declare belief in God.

They said local and state governments, unable to match the financial resources of civil liberties groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union and unwilling to pay costly attorney's fees in losing cases, often accede to demands to remove religious symbols.

"This is an issue of allowing the cases to go to court and not to have the threat or intimidation by the ACLU and their minions to hang over all of these heads," said Rep. John Hostettler, R-Ind., sponsor of the bill.

"With this bill we will close a loophole that has allowed liberal groups like the ACLU to prey on taxpayers for far too long," said Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, R-Fla.

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU Washington legislative office, said passage of the bill "would isolate and discourage enforcement of a specific piece of our Bill of Rights." The legislation, she said, "would, in fact, weaken the very freedom they claim to be protecting."

House Passes Measure On Religion Suits (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The House passed a bill yesterday that would bar judges from awarding legal fees to the American Civil Liberties Union and similar groups that sue municipalities for violating the Constitution's ban on government establishment of religion.

Though the bill would prevent plaintiffs from recovering legal costs in any lawsuit based on the Establishment Clause, House Republicans said during a floor debate that it was particularly aimed at organizations that force the removal of Nativity scenes and Ten Commandments monuments from public property.

"Liberal groups . . . scour the country looking to sue cities and states with any kind of religious display, regardless of how popular these displays are," said Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite (R-Fla.). Because judges often require municipalities that lose such lawsuits to reimburse their opponents' legal fees, "citizens' precious monuments are being eroded with their own tax dollars," she added.

The bill, called the Public Expressions of Religion Protection Act, passed 244 to 173 on a mostly party-line vote.

Fredrickson added that it appears unlikely the Senate will pass the bill.

"But we're watching it, because it is designed to do real damage to First Amendment protections," she said. "What the backers of this legislation are leaving out of the discussion is that fees are only awarded when we've been successful in showing that someone's constitutional rights have been violated."

The American Legion, the Southern Baptist Convention and other conservative groups began pushing for the legislation after a Pennsylvania judge awarded $2 million to the ACLU of Pennsylvania and Americans United for Separation of Church and State. The two groups had successfully sued the school board in Dover, Pa., for requiring science teachers to teach "intelligent design" alongside evolution. The award was later reduced to $1 million.

Conservative groups were also irked when a judge awarded $550,000 to three groups -- Americans United, the Southern Poverty Law Center and the ACLU of Alabama -- after they prevailed in a lawsuit against former Alabama chief justice Roy S. Moore's display of the Ten Commandments.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.), said the ACLU and similar groups are "profiteering" as well as seeking "to remove every vestige of our religious heritage from public places."

Texas Case Involving Marital Counseling Is Latest To Test Line Between Church And State (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

HOUSTON, Sept. 26 — Peggy Lee Penley's marriage was going sour when she turned to her pastor. They had been friends for years and had started a Bible church together in Fort Worth. He was more than Ms. Penley's spiritual shepherd, also serving as a licensed professional counselor, and had helped her before.

But Ms. Penley says that after she confided her sexual relationship with another man and her plans for divorce, the pastor, C. L. Westbrook Jr., disclosed her "biblically inappropriate relationship" to church elders. Mr. Westbrook eventually informed the full congregation of the church, CrossLand Community Bible, she says, shaming her publicly and urging members to discipline her by shunning her.

In 2001, Ms. Penley sued her pastor for defamation and negligence, saying he had violated his responsibilities as a professional counselor. Her lawsuit has attracted considerable attention from church groups trying to prevent court intervention in religious matters. The case went before the Texas Supreme Court on Tuesday, and the outcome will once again help define the evolving line between church and state.

While courts have long held that religious practices and discipline are immune from court review under a legal doctrine known as "ecclesiastical abstention," secular misconduct by religious figures is not automatically protected.

Ms. Penley's lawyer, Darrell L. Keith of Dallas, told the court that the issue was simply a matter of professional negligence by a counselor.

"She believed that she was talking to him in a confidential setting as her secular marital counselor, not as her pastor," Mr. Keith said. "And she didn't believe she was at risk."

Mr. Westbrook's lawyer, Kelly J. Shackelford, told the judges that Ms. Penley "obviously knew what she signed on for" and that the court was being asked to enter "the internal processes of the church," where it did not belong.

"Since 1871, the U.S. Supreme Court has said courts can't enter these cases," said Mr. Shackelford, chief counsel for the Liberty Legal Institute in Plano, a conservative group that often represents churches in religious freedom cases. Church discipline and doctrine, he said, are inherently ecclesiastical.

"The very entry of the court into these areas is a violation and causes entanglement," he said.

A lower court had dismissed Ms. Penley's suit, but an appeals court revived it, leaving Mr. Westbrook to appeal to the state's highest civil court to bar the way to a trial.

Ms. Penley, who has married the man she became involved with and now lives on the East Coast, was not in court on Tuesday, and Mr. Keith said she would have no comment.

Mr. Westbrook was present but stayed silent. "He's trying not to say anything and get in the middle of everything," Mr. Shackelford said after the hearing. "The fact that they took this appeal and heard this case means there's a chance that we'll have protection, not only for Pastor Westbrook, but for all churches and all pastors, not to have to go through that kind of thing."

Church groups have leapt into the case, submitting briefs that warn of growing attacks on religious autonomy.

"For a church to be compelled to submit to extensive discovery and an invasive public trial before a jury, that alone can chill religious freedom — even if the church is eventually vindicated by the court," said a brief filed by the National Association of Evangelicals in support of Mr. Westbrook.

According to their briefs, Ms. Penley and Mr. Westbrook say that in 1998, Ms. Penley and her husband at the time, Benny Stone, consulted Mr. Westbrook in his office about their marital troubles. They paid him a fee for his services.

The following year, Mr. Westbrook and his wife, the Stones and several other couples founded the CrossLand Community Bible Church, with Mr. Westbrook as pastor. Ms. Penley said she and other couples attended group counseling sessions at the pastor's home in 2000. Then, realizing her marriage was over, she says, she "engaged in a sexual relationship" with her current husband, Bobby Penley, while she was in Tennessee.

She says that she told the pastor of the relationship upon her return and said to him that she was planning to divorce her husband, and that Mr. Westbrook recommended a lawyer.

But when the pastor discussed disciplining her, Ms. Penley's brief says, she told him she was leaving the church and wrote a letter of resignation. It was after that, the brief says, that the pastor told the elders and issued a letter to the congregation to "shun and ostracize" her.

Mr. Westbrook says that he learned of her infidelity from others and that his counseling as pastor was not part of her earlier professional visits. He also says she agreed in writing to submit to church discipline, including an injunction from Matthew 18:17: "If he refuses to listen to them, tell it to the church."

In the hearing on Tuesday, the nine justices struggled with the nuances, and there were indications that they found the case difficult.

"If the damages arise from the ecclesiastical act," Justice Harriet O'Neill said, "then really, we're dancing on the head of a pin in terms of trying to parse the secular versus pastoral counseling." A ruling could take a year or more.

Recent legal records are thick with thorny ecclesiastical cases.

In Mississippi, the former wife of the governor sued her Episcopal priest and her church after learning that the priest had taped her admission of adultery for use against her in a custody case by her ex-husband. The case was dismissed. In Royal Oak, Mich., outside Detroit, a man who had left his church sued his pastor for revealing the confidence that he had been with prostitutes. That case was also dismissed.

Courts have had no trouble convicting religious figures of sexual misconduct, since the charges involve clearly secular actions that by their nature fall outside accepted religious practices.

ANTITRUST:

Wright Backers Hopeful (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 27, 2006

There's still time for a deal, North Texas lawmakers say

WASHINGTON – Legislation to lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field could come down to the wire to clear both the House and Senate before a pre-election recess.

FILE 2005/AP Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has objected to language in the Wright bill that could help protect the legislation from a court fight under antitrust law.

Finding a procedural path for the Wright legislation has proven elusive on both sides of the Capitol as congressional leaders try to rush through major legislation before returning home Saturday to campaign for the November elections.

Still, lawmakers from North Texas weren't conceding Tuesday that the issue would have to fall into the lame-duck session.

Getting the bill cleared Friday or early Saturday remained a possibility.

"It's not dead for this week, but it's still in flux," said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth.

The bill needs to be enacted by the end of the year, or the agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport will expire.

The House is awaiting action on an original version of the legislation and one amended by the House Judiciary Committee that removes an exemption from antitrust laws.

The exemption was intended to protect the deal in court.

House members from North Texas have been hoping to pass their original Wright bill under suspension of normal rules, a procedure usually used for legislation that's considered uncontroversial.

The bill could conceivably clear without a recorded vote under that path, though objections from any members would force the North Texas lawmakers to corral two-thirds of the chamber to get it passed.

But the Wright bill still hasn't won a place on the House calendar for this week.

"We've got the votes for that version," Ms. Granger said. As for the tight timeline, she said, "it's narrowing, but there's time."

Several paths ahead

The legislation faces several potential paths, which lawmakers were contemplating as competing priorities limited their options.

"We do not have a date, a time or the exact vehicle yet," said Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Dallas.

"We are going to be here for long days and long nights, and it is my belief that we're going to come up with an answer that doesn't exist at this time."

The Wright legislation would repeal the Wright law in 2014, while immediately allowing flights anywhere in the U.S. as long as they first stop in one of nine states that make up the existing Wright perimeter.

The plan would also demolish 12 of the 32 gates at Love to prevent growth in air traffic, noise and pollution.

Members of Stop-and-Think, a community group from North Texas formed by residents living near Love Field, visited Capitol Hill Tuesday to meet with North Texas lawmakers about the Wright deal.

Founders of the group, which received its initial funding from American Airlines, said they wanted to convey their concerns about neighborhood issues and voice support for the local compromise plan with its gate limitations and other aspects.

The gate reduction drew attention on Capitol Hill this summer from key lawmakers who oversee antitrust laws.

The language

A Senate version of the bill to lift flight restrictions at Love Field continues to be held up by Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the top Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee who has objected to language that could help protect the legislation from a court fight under antitrust law.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, removed an outright antitrust exemption from the bill last week, replacing it with other protective language, to win over the chair of the judiciary committee, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Mr. Leahy told The Dallas Morning News Tuesday that the number of gates at the Dallas airport is "entirely up to them" but said he has concerns about the antitrust implications.

"I just don't want to rewrite on the back of the envelope our antitrust laws," he said.

Mr. Leahy, who has offered his own suggested wording for the bill, said he hasn't seen the changes that Mr. Specter signed off on last week.

A spokesman for Ms. Hutchison said the language has been shared with Mr. Leahy's staff and others on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Consumer groups write

Consumers Union and Consumer Federation of America, two consumer groups opposing the deal, wrote to Mr. Leahy Tuesday thanking him for his stance against what they called an anti-consumer deal that would "divide up the airline market for Dallas at the expense of the flying public."

Even if lawmakers find a way to get their bills to the House and Senate floors this week, they'll need to reconcile the two versions and get a final bill cleared again in both chambers.

Lawmakers were considering whether to pass the original House bill and let the Senate make an amendment substituting Ms. Hutchison's new language.

The House would then have to sign off on the revisions before the bill could be sent to President Bush.

If both chambers independently pass different versions, the bill could be forced into a time-consuming conference committee.

And if the legislation doesn't get through this week, lawmakers would be forced to try again in a lame-duck session.

What Congress can accomplish during that post-election period in November and December remains uncertain, especially given the chance that Democrats could win enough races to retake control of the House.

But lawmakers said they remained hopeful even if they couldn't get the legislation cleared this week.

"I'm still pretty optimistic that there's time," said Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell.

"If we have to go to the lame-duck session with this bill, I don't think it dooms it in the least."

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller said, "I still think we have a good chance whether it's now or in November or December."

Dallas Business Journal, September 27, 2006

Opposition to the Wright Amendment compromise bill continues to mount locally, as a new study says the bill will cost consumers billions, and two consumer groups have written House Democratic leaders to protest the bill.

The study was conducted by Steven A. Morrison, a member of the Department of Economics at Northeastern University and editor in chief of the Journal of Transport Economics and Policy. The study was solicited by the law firm of Bickel & Brewer, which represents Love Terminal Partners, which has filed a lawsuit over the local agreement that the Wright compromise bill is based on.

In the report, Morrison looked at U.S. Department of Transportation data on airline fares and passenger volume to estimate the effects on consumers of full repeal versus the proposed agreement.

He said by fully repealing the bill consumers would recognize $726 million annually, compared to between $117 million and $383 million annually from through ticketing.

The Wright compromise bill calls for a repeal of the Wright restrictions after eight years. In the meantime, the bill allows for immediate through ticketing. Through-ticketing involves making a layover stop when traveling to long-distance destinations. The compromise bill also calls for the gates at Dallas Love Field Airport to be reduced from 32 gates to 20.

"A conservative estimate is that consumers will be worse off by $2.7 billion over the next eight years because the agreement will keep airfares higher compared with full repeal," Morrison said.

Two consumers groups, the Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America also sent letters Monday to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, urging House Democratic leaders to oppose the plan to circumvent the House Judiciary Committee version of the bill, which removed antitrust immunity for American and Southwest Airlines.

"Erasing the important work of the committee charged with protecting consumers from anticompetitive behavior would constitute a breakdown of rational governance in the House of Representatives," the groups said in the letters.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, the sponsor of the bill, has hotlined the bill, which is a formal way of getting unanimous consent that doesn't require a formal vote to pass the bill.

Hutchison, late last week won over a major detractor of the Wright compromise bill, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., by agreeing to take out wording that exempted the bill from antitrust laws. The wording was replaced with other protective language, Hutchison's reps said at the time.

A spokeswoman for Hutchison said Tuesday that there was a hold on the bill in Senate, signaling that someone had objections to the bill. Hutchison is working through the legislative process and working with staff to work through concerns and the reasons why someone might have a hold on the bill.

If Congress doesn't pass the agreement by Dec. 31 it will be voided.

J&J Alleges Breach of Guidant Deal, Sues Boston Sci, Abbott Seeking $5.5 Billion

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- Months after Johnson & Johnson lost a bidding war for medical-device maker Guidant, J&J is suing the winner, Boston Scientific, and Abbott Laboratories, alleging the two companies induced Guidant to breach its agreement with J&J.

New Brunswick.-based Johnson & Johnson is seeking $5.5 billion in damages, according to the lawsuit, filed Monday in U.S. District Court in New York. The lawsuit also seeks reimbursement for court costs, attorney fees and interest.

The suit asks the court to rule that Indianapolis-based Guidant Corp. breached the companies' merger agreement and that Boston Scientific Corp. and Abbott Laboratories Inc. intentionally interfered with the deal and induced Guidant to breach it.

Natick, Mass.-based Boston Scientific trumped Johnson & Johnson's final $24.2 billion offer with a $27.2 billion bid to acquire Guidant and its portfolio of stents, defibrillators, pacemakers and other medical devices.

Guidant paid Johnson & Johnson a $705 million breakup fee after it opted to accept Boston Scientific's offer in late January. To eliminate possible antitrust snags, Boston Scientific agreed to sell Guidant's stent and vascular business to Abbott for $4.1 billion and a $900 million loan.

Randy Katz, a merger and acquisitions specialist at law firm Bryan Cave LLP, said J&J won't receive anywhere near the $5.5 billion, and that the case likely will be settled out of court.

"J&J feels that it needs to put a dent in Boston Scientific and Abbott," financially and by distracting management of its two competitors, Katz said.

J&J said it would have no comment beyond the court filing.

The lawsuit alleges Boston Scientific only won the takeover battle because "Guidant leaked confidential information to a third party, Abbott, for the purpose of arranging a prepackaged divestiture of significant Guidant businesses to Abbott."

"Based on these disclosures," the lawsuit states, "Abbott agreed to enter into a divestiture and financing agreement with Boston Scientific, which allowed Boston Scientific to make an offer for Guidant that would not require a lengthy and uncertain antitrust review."

J&J had offered in December 2004 to pay $25.4 billion for Guidant, whose shareholders approved that deal. J&J reduced its offer to $21.5 billion after a series of recalls and warnings involving thousands of Guidant pacemakers and defibrillators. The two companies amended their merger deal in November 2005. Guidant was barred from soliciting other offers and, if it received an unsolicited bid, from giving confidential information to any third parties.

Paul Donovan, spokesman for Boston Scientific, said his company "complied with all the terms of the J&J/Guidant merger agreement. We believe the suit is meritless."

"We find it curious that J&J has chosen to sue eight months after Boston Scientific entered into a definitive agreement with Guidant, and five months after the transaction closed," Donovan said.

Katz said it likely "took J&J a fair amount of time to put together all the puzzle pieces about what they allege."

Melissa Brotz, a spokeswoman for Abbott Laboratories Inc. of North Chicago, Ill., also said the "lawsuit is without merit." She declined further comment.

Guidant's former chief executive officer, James Cornelius, now is interim CEO at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., which said he was not available for comment.

Also Tuesday, Standard & Poor's Ratings Services changed its outlook for Boston Scientific's credit rating from stable to negative, but affirmed its current ratings. S&P cited numerous factors, including Boston Scientific increasing its debt from $2 billion to $9 billion to acquire Guidant.

S&P also said Boston Scientific had lower-than-expected preliminary third-quarter sales because of continued weak demand for its cardiac devices and an unexpected weakening in sales of drug-coated stents, tiny metal scaffolds that keep heart arteries open after blockages have been cleared.

Boston Scientific leads J&J in the U.S. market for those stents, with about 55 percent of sales to J&J's 45 percent. When J&J proposed buying Guidant, Guidant, Abbott and a third company all were preparing to get their own drug-coated stents on the market. That was one reason J&J wanted Guidant, which also would have given it entry into the lucrative market for implantable pacemakers and defibrillators.

In trading on the New York Stock Exchange, shares of J&J rose 48 cents to close at $64.67, while shares of Boston Scientific fell 15 cents or 1 percent to close at $14.80 and Abbott Labs rose 12 cents to close at $48.07.

AP Business writers Mark Jewell in Boston and Ashley Heher in Chicago contributed to this report.

UPI, September 27, 2006

New Jersey's Johnson & Johnson is suing Boston Scientific Corp. for $5.5 billion, alleging improprieties in its purchase of Guidant Corp.

Both Boston Scientific and J&J had sought to acquire Guidant, but the Massachusetts firm's $27.5 billion offer won.

Johnson & Johnson alleges in its New York federal lawsuit, which also names Abbott Laboratories, that Boston Scientific prevailed "only because Guidant leaked confidential information to a third party, Abbott, for the purpose of arranging a prepackaged divestiture of significant Guidant businesses to Abbott," Boston Business Journal said.

Once Guidant had done so, Abbott agreed to enter into a divestiture and financing agreement with Boston Scientific, "which allowed Boston Scientific to make an offer for Guidant that would not require a lengthy and uncertain antitrust review," the suit says.

J&J Sues Boston Scientific Over Guidant Acquisition (Update7) (BLOOM)

By David Glovin And Avram Goldstein

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

Sept. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Johnson & Johnson, which lost a battle to buy heart-device maker Guidant Corp., sued winning bidder Boston Scientific Corp. for $5.5 billion, saying the deal was tainted by a leak of confidential information.

Boston Scientific was able to buy Guidant for $27.5 billion because Guidant secretly allowed Abbott Laboratories to review Guidant's finances, according to a complaint filed yesterday in New York federal court. Abbott agreed to buy part of Guidant's business to help Boston Scientific avoid antitrust problems, the suit said. Guidant and Abbott were named defendants.

The lawsuit shows that the fierce rivalry between Natick, Massachusetts-based Boston Scientific, the second largest maker of heart stents, and New Brunswick, New Jersey-based J&J, the world's biggest medical device maker, isn't cooling down.

``I don't think it ever ends," said Jan David Wald, an analyst with A.G. Edwards & Sons in Boston in a telephone interview today. ``I think there is acrimony between the founders of Boston Scientific and the management of J&J. It's so longstanding that it's hard to see it going away."

Since defeating J&J, Boston Scientific has been buffeted by product recalls, falling sales, profit warnings, analyst downgrades and growing legal risks, driving the company's market value down to $21.8 billion from $31.2 billion in less than five months.

``Isn't that amazing?" said Wald. ``I think the valuation is way too low. There's risk there, and investors are still thinking about it instead of jumping in. Overall I think it is an undervalued company."

`Meritless'

J&J lost the deal in January, when Abbott made financing agreement that enabled Boston Scientific to snatch Guidant, the lawsuit said. Guidant accepted the bid as superior to J&J's offer, and J&J promptly received a $705 million termination fee from Guidant.

``Throughout this process, we complied with all the terms of the J&J-Guidant merger agreement," said Boston Scientific spokesman Paul Donovan in an e-mailed statement today. ``We believe the suit is meritless."

Boston Scientific found it ``curious" that the suit was filed five months after the transaction was completed, Donovan said. Melissa Brotz, a spokeswoman for Abbott Park, Illinois- based Abbott, said the lawsuit ``is without merit."

Shares

J&J shares rose 48 cents to $64.67 in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange as of 4:01 p.m. Boston Scientific shares fell 15 cents to $14.80 hares of Abbott Park, Illinois- based Abbott Labs fell 12 cents to $48.07.

In December 2004, Johnson & Johnson agreed to acquire Guidant for $25.4 billion. In June 2005, Guidant recalled 109,000 implantable electronic heart defibrillators with faulty batteries linked to seven deaths. The $30,000 devices are implanted to automatically restart stopped hearts.

In October 2005, J&J said the recall contributed to a material change in the value of Guidant and it reduced its offer to $21.5 billion. The agreement barred Guidant from soliciting other offers or providing confidential information to another company, the suit said.

In December as the merger awaited regulatory review, Boston Scientific made a $25 billion bid for Guidant that was ``fraught with uncertainty," the suit said. Guidant then improperly allowed Abbott to review its finances to see whether Abbott would agree to buy some of its businesses in the event Boston Scientific prevailed, the suit said.

Stents

Abbott's agreement to buy Guidant's heart stent business enabled Boston Scientific, the world's second largest stent maker, to sidestep antitrust hurdles, according to the complaint. Stents are tiny tube-like devices doctors use to keep open arteries cleared of blockage.

``Without a pre-packaged divestiture agreement, Boston Scientific could not have made a proposal that would have been acceptable to Guidant's board," the suit claimed.

Since the acquisition was completed in April, Boston Scientific has recalled another 27,600 defibrillators and the worldwide defibrillator market dropped for the first time.

While J&J may be happy it didn't acquire Guidant's electronic heart devices, it is extremely unhappy about losing the stent franchise to Abbott, said Bruce Nudell, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. in New York.

``It's going to be painful for J&J to have Abbott be probably the foremost stent vendor in the world and Boston also have access to an Abbott stent that is potent" while continuing to sell its own U.S.-market leading stents, he said.

Judge Dismisses Parts Of AMD's Case Against Intel (WSJ)

By Don Clark

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal judge dismissed major portions of Advanced Micro Devices Inc.'s high-profile antitrust suit against Intel Corp., accepting Intel's argument that many of AMD's claims are beyond the reach of U.S. law.

AMD, based in Sunnyvale, Calif., accuses Intel of illegally maintaining a monopoly in the market for microprocessor chips that act as the brains in most personal computers. Its suit, filed in June 2005 in federal court in Delaware, questions Intel's business tactics in several countries, including Britain, Germany and Japan.

Intel, of Santa Clara, Calif., asked the judge to dismiss AMD claims that are based on the foreign effect of Intel's alleged tactics. Intel pointed out, among other things, that AMD's chips are manufactured in Germany and assembled into final products in Malaysia, Singapore and China.

Intel argued that AMD is seeking damages for lost sales of those foreign-made microprocessors in foreign markets, and was separately seeking redress in European, Asian and South Korean courts. As a result, Intel contended that the U.S. federal court lacks jurisdiction over AMD's "foreign commerce" claims.

AMD, in response, argued that that the microprocessor market is global, and that it was not making any "foreign commerce" claims.

U.S. District Judge Joseph Farnan sided with Intel. He ruled that AMD "has not demonstrated that the alleged foreign conduct of Intel has direct, substantial and foreseeable effects in the United States which gives rise to its claim."

Chuck Mulloy, an Intel spokesman, said, "We are pleased that Judge Farnan appears to have agreed with our legal analysis and argument." He said the company would refrain from further comment until a hearing with the judge Wednesday.

An AMD spokesman, Michael Silverman, said the company is studying the ruling, but noted that much of the case still remains.

"Notwithstanding the judge's ruling today, Intel cannot escape antitrust scrutiny for its conduct--wherever in the world it occurs," Mr. Silverman said. "As this U.S. litigation is joined by global antitrust investigations, it is clear that Intel cannot escape the consequences of its illegal monopoly abuses."

DeCode Genetics Sues Ex-Workers, Claiming Trade-Secret Violations (WSJ)

By Antonio Regalado

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

In a case that may threaten a major U.S. project to study the DNA of children, an Icelandic gene-hunting company said it was suing five ex-employees for stealing trade secrets and breach of contract.

Four of the five former employees of DeCode Genetics Inc., based in Reykjavik, now work for Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, which in June announced a high-profile plan to collect and study DNA from some 100,000 children.

The hospital, known as CHOP, intends to use the database of DNA profiles to find links between genes and common conditions like obesity. Publicly traded DeCode operates a similar database in Iceland.

In its suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, DeCode asked the court to prevent CHOP or its former employees from using any of its trade secrets.

In a statement, CHOP officials said the "hospital believes that the claims against its researchers are without merit and that they will prevail in the lawsuit." The hospital said it would "vigorously" defend its employees and its own research program.

DeCode alleges in the suit that its former vice president of business development, Hakon Hakonarson, and four other former employees provided CHOP with proprietary information, including business plans and research results. Dr. Hakonarson, who left DeCode in May after more than seven years of employment, now leads a new genomics center at CHOP.

Dr. Hakonarson didn't return a phone message yesterday. In an interview this summer, he said the facility was "going to perform genotyping on the industrial scale within academia."

The conflict arises as scores of research teams compete to use new DNA maps and DNA-reading devices to discover the causes of common diseases. Although the Iceland database has generated a string of high-profile scientific results for DeCode, it remains unprofitable.

Microsoft's Precrimes (WSJ)

By Alberto Mingardi

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

Quarrels between the European Commission and Microsoft seem to be the daily bread in Brussels. In the beginning there was Mario Monti, who as EU antitrust chief in 2004 fined Microsoft a record €497 million for a series of violations, including its "bundling" of Media Player with its Windows operating system. Mr. Monti's successor, Neelie Kroes, didn't trade the iron fist for a velvet glove: Earlier this year she fined the software giant another €280.5 million for not having complied with the Commission's orders. It is worth noting that the latter fine came even though the original case is still under judicial review.

Above and beyond this fumus persecutionis, another dispute that's coming out into the open between Ms. Kroes and Microsoft entails possibly significant consequences for the very essence of competition regulation, which is at risk of becoming antitrust policing.

Since March, the Commission has expressed concerns about Vista, the new version of Windows, ready to be released in a few months but waiting for an informal greenlight from Brussels. Ms. Kroes has said that she expects Microsoft to apply "the general principle" of the Commission's 2004 ruling to future Windows versions.

This claim is based on the assumption that the original ruling can be a source of legal restraint far above its original scope. Leaving aside its merits or shortcomings, the Monti decision on Media Player orders Microsoft only to "refrain from using any technological, commercial, contractual or any other means which would have the equivalent effect of tying [Media Player] to Windows."

Ms. Kroes's objections do not seem to take into account the general trend in information technology to marry previously independent functions. Among others, Google is showing this to be the way forward by integrating plenty of formerly independent functions -- from daily planners to spreadsheets -- into its email service, and by piling up ever more functions into its search engine. Dictating business strategies should not be a regulator's job.

Furthermore, from a mere procedural point of view, the situation today is not comparable to the one that led to Mr. Monti's original ruling. Though first developed in 1998, Microsoft's Media Player was integrated in Windows XP in 2001. This led to complaints by the then major supplier of analogous software, RealNetworks, on both the sides of the Atlantic. RealNetworks won the game in Europe, and Mr. Monti forced Microsoft to release a version of XP without Media Player.

Real's complaints in Europe and the U.S. also led to a business agreement that the two companies signed in October 2005. One of the peace treaty's key points concerns Vista: The new program will redirect users to a Web site to download the Real software needed to play Real media files. The Media Player dispute really seems to be over for the litigants -- if not for the regulator. * * *

The case of Vista is unprecedented in another way as well. The Commission is threatening Microsoft not to violate the "spirit" of an older decision -- i.e., not to bundle too many new features with its new operating system. In a subtle way, this time it is the regulator that is casting the first stone.

As Brussels ponders a revamping of its monopoly policies, there is a demand among experts for the Commission to focus more on consumer welfare per se than on the form that a particular business practice takes (e.g., exclusive deals or bundling). However, forms cannot be bypassed.

Vista is not the same program that the EU has already ruled about -- and this is not merely a matter of "forms." The new operating system's alleged future dominance is merely a prediction, albeit a reasonable one based on the history of previous iterations of Windows. Still, there can be no evidence of the size of Vista's market share until it is released and sold.

What's more, the Commission already has shown little success in predicting the future when it comes to Microsoft. Two years on, it seems clear that Mr. Monti's concerns about Media Player's becoming dominant in its market segment were greatly exaggerated. In spite of its integration within Windows, Media Player had to face aggressive competition, and there is no sign that RealAudio or Apple's iTunes could not grow their market shares because they were not bundled with Windows (iTunes is of course bundled in Apple's Mac OS). In fact, the opposite has proven true: A recent Nielsen/NetRatings survey found that Apple's iTunes Web site and software reach 14% of Internet users world-wide -- up 241% in just one year. What's more, the market demand for the Media Player-less version of Windows XL was so minimal as to be an embarrassment for Mr. Monti, who had cited consumer choices as one reason for ruling against Microsoft in 2004.

Ms. Kroes's apparent desire to apply the old Monti ruling to an as-yet-unreleased Vista raises an obvious question. As far as antitrust cases, the Commission is already prosecutor, judge and jury. Shall its powers expand over the boundaries of time, too? * * *

In "Minority Report," a 1956 Philip K. Dick short story made famous by a Steven Spielberg film a few years ago, murders are prevented before they happen thanks to three mutants who foresee the future. The system initially works, but quickly collapses as a former policeman proved it incompatible with justice and the rule of law.

Neelie Kroes has said it would be desirable for the newer Windows "to avoid the problems we are facing now." In a nutshell, this is the cornerstone of a new approach to competition policy: a doctrine of harm pre-emption, so to speak. Whether such a doctrine is to be applied to cases other than Microsoft's remains to be seen.

But "Minority Report" reminds us of a simple, stubborn fact: You cannot be "guilty" of any crime before you have commited it and been accused, much less proven, of having committed it. This is a basic tenant of legal certainty as we know it. Why should it not continue to apply to competition policy?

AP, September 27, 2006

NEW YORK --Radio broadcasting company Regent Communications Inc. received antitrust approval from the Federal Trade Commission to buy five radio stations serving the Buffalo, N.Y., market from CBS Corp. for $125 million in cash.

The FTC on Monday granted early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law, according to the agency's Web site.

Cincinnati-based Regent announced on Sept. 5 that it planned to operate the Buffalo stations -- WBLK-FM, WBUF-FM, WJYE-FM, WYRK-FM and WECK-AM -- through a local marketing agreement starting in October.

After the deal closes, Regent will own and operate 19 radio stations in the Upstate New York region including stations in the Buffalo, Albany, Utica/Rome and Watertown markets.

The transaction is being funded through $240 million of senior credit facilities being arranged by Banc of America Securities.

Shares of Regent fell 5 cents to $3.85 on the Nasdaq, while those of New York-based CBS fell 35 cents to $28.30 on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. 'lobbied' The EC Over Microsoft Fine (CNET)

By Richard Thurston, Special to CNET News.com

CNET News, September 27, 2006

The U.S. government sought to influence the European Commission over Microsoft's antitrust case, according to Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes.

Kroes said the U.S. Embassy in Brussels, Belgium, had asked her to be "nicer" to Microsoft ahead of her decision to fine the software giant 280 million euros ($357 million) in July.

The commissioner criticized the approach. "This is of course an intervention which is not possible," Kroes told Dutch newspaper Financieele Dagblad this week.

When asked if she was annoyed by the embassy's approach, she said: "In my work, I cannot have a preference. I have, however, a personal opinion, but that is for Saturday night."

Kroes' representative added in an e-mail to CNET News.com's sister site ZDNet UK on Tuesday: "We can confirm that she was lobbied and that she did not appreciate it."

Microsoft declined to comment on Kroes' claims, but an insider insisted that the company had not tried to influence discussions between the U.S. government and the EC.

The U.S. Embassy had not responded to requests for comment at the time of writing.

Microsoft was hit with the fine for failing to comply with the Commission's landmark antitrust ruling of 2004.

The Commission had ordered the software giant to open up its code to help rivals develop server software that is fully compatible with Windows.

Microsoft has previously denied failing to comply with the terms of the antitrust ruling. Two months ago, it submitted a lengthy document which it said proved it had opened up its server interoperability protocols, as demanded by the EC.

New Jersey MLS Tosses Restrictions For Display Of Listings (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr.

Inman News, September 27, 2006

Several MLSs reverse policies amid FTC investigations

The New Jersey Multiple Listing Service, a regional MLS in Northern New Jersey that is owned and operated by two local Realtor organizations, has withdrawn a policy that prevented some property listings from reaching Realtor.com and several other home-search Web sites.

While New Jersey MLS officials were reportedly contacted by representatives for the U.S. Federal Trade Commission -- an agency that has been investigating similar policies at more than a dozen other MLSs across the country -- MLS officials stated in a communication to members this month that the decision to rescind the rule was in response to the practices of neighboring MLSs.

National Association of Realtors general counsel Laurie Janik announced earlier this year that 14 separate government investigations had been launched over MLS policies that prevent some property listings information from being publicly displayed on some public Web sites. The Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin MLS changed its restrictions relating to the public display of some property listings in late August after an FTC investigation.

The Northern New England Real Estate Network and Austin Board of Realtors in Texas also lifted similar restrictions, and both of these groups announced agreements with the FTC in response to investigations.

In March 2005, the New Jersey MLS announced in a newsletter that "exclusive agency" property listings would no longer be sent to public home-search Web sites, including NJMLS.com and Realtor.com, as of April 1, 2005.

In exclusive agency listing agreements, home sellers are not obligated to pay their agent if they locate a buyer on their own, and sellers can actively market their own properties. The MLS did not place similar restrictions on the more common "exclusive right to sell" property-listing agreement, which provides that a seller must pay the agent or broker who listed the property even if the seller personally located the buyer for the property.

Subscribers of the New Jersey MLS reported that they received a notice from the MLS this month stating that the exclusive agency restrictions had been lifted. According to the notice from the New Jersey MLS, "The board of directors determined at their monthly meeting that surrounding MLSs are sending exclusive agency listings to public Web sites. In the spirit of keeping our members competitive and informed, effective immediately all exclusive agency listings will be sent to the following public Web sites: Realtor.com, NJMLS.com, IDX sites."

IDX refers to Internet Data Exchange, a format for sharing online listings among brokers who are members of an MLS.

Tina Griffin, executive director for the New Jersey MLS, did not respond to Inman News' requests for comment. Tom Beritelli, president for the New Jersey MLS board of directors, and board vice president Nelson Chen also refused to comment for the article.

New Jersey MLS, which has about 8,600 members, is owned and operated by the Eastern Bergen County Board of Realtors and the RealSource Association of Realtors. Bob White, association executive for the Eastern Bergen Realtor board, said he had no comment about the MLS board's decision to change the exclusive agency restrictions.

Meanwhile, the New Jersey MLS Web site, NewJerseyMLS.com, still stated (as of Tuesday, Sept. 26) that exclusive agency listings "will not be sent to the public Internet (i.e. njmls.com public Web site, Realtor.com, member Web sites with IDX agreements)."

In 2004, Derek Eisenberg, president of Continental Real Estate Group in Hackensack, N.J., and the creator of a flat-fee real estate network, told Inman News that a similar policy change on exclusive agency listings by the Monmouth-Ocean MLS in New Jersey led him to restructure his operations. That MLS and others have maintained that the policy changes for exclusive agency listings were intended to prevent confusion when an agent and a seller were separately marketing the same property, as prospective buyers may see a property simultaneously advertised as a for-sale-by-owner property and as an agent-represented property.

Eisenberg said that he believes there is another motive for such policies -- to make exclusive agency listings less appealing to sellers. "It's a bad-spirited rule," he said of the New Jersey MLS policy, adding that it may have led some brokers to place exclusive agency property listings in other MLSs to avoid the New Jersey MLS restrictions and get the listings onto the Realtor.com site.

As a result of restrictions on exclusive agency listings, he said he faced increasing liability in some transactions that led to higher insurance costs for those transactions.

Gary Ragusa, owner of Realmart Realty, a flat-fee real estate company in South Amboy, N.J., said that he has been in contact with the FTC about MLS policies, and he believes that the FTC may have influenced the MLS's decision to reverse its policy on exclusive agency listings. "The FTC has been pretty aggressive and has been pursuing (this issue)," he said. Ragusa said the exclusive agency listings policy didn't impact his business, as he works with all of his seller clients through exclusive right to sell agreements.

He said that other MLSs in the area, too, have also changed their policies relating to exclusive agency listings.

The FTC and U.S. Department of Justice, working separately or in cooperation, have also taken action on a range of other industry policies and practices over the past couple of years -- forcing some states to withdraw bans on real estate rebates to consumers, for example, and opposing legislation in a number of states that requires all real estate licensees to perform a specific range of services for their clients, even if their clients do not want or need those services.

Last year, the Justice Department filed an antitrust lawsuit against the U.S. Department of Justice, charging that the trade group's policies for the sharing and display of online property listings information are too restrictive. The Realtor association has held that its policies are legal and provide for the sharing of a huge volume of property listings information. The Justice Department has issued subpoenas to several MLSs related to the lawsuit, the Realtor association has announced.

FTC officials have not disclosed a full list of MLSs that it has targeted in its investigations of exclusive agency listings policies, and the National Association of Realtors has also not revealed the full list of MLSs under investigation.

Steve Cook, a spokesman for the National Association of Realtors, said in a statement, "We don't speak for the boards and MLSs involved in these cases." The association is not providing any legal advice to its local boards and MLSs relating to the FTC investigations, Cook also stated.

U.S. Judge Says Lawsuit Over California Auto Emissions Can Go Forward (FINDLAW/AP)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii sided preliminarily with a coalition of automakers on their three major arguments against the state law, which was passed in 2002 and adopted two years later by the state air board. In a ruling Monday,Ishii threw out two lesser arguments, but ruled the suit should go to trial Jan. 30.

The tailpipe standards adopted by the California Air Resources Board were designed to cut greenhouse gas emissions from cars and light trucks by 25 percent and from sport utility vehicles by 18 percent starting in 2009. Ten other U.S. states have since adopted the California standard.

The automobile industry sued in U.S. District Court in Fresno, California, arguing that the state law amounts to an attempt to set new fuel-economy standards, something it says can be done only by the federal government.

The judge ruled that automakers can continue with their argument that allowing states to set their own emission standards would violate two federal laws that reserve that power to the federal government. Ishii also allowed an argument by the automakers that California's regulations would undermine the federal government's ability to conduct a uniform foreign policy.

The judge prohibited automakers from arguing that the California law would impede interstate commerce or business competition.

"We're disappointed because it's going to cost taxpayers a lot of money to defend California laws. But we're prepared to do that because it's a really important law, worth fighting for," said Teresa Schilling, a spokeswoman for state Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

An attorney representing the lawsuit's main plaintiff, Central Valley Chrysler-Jeep Inc., declined comment, citing the continuing litigation.

The automakers told Ishii during a hearing this month that the higher fuel-economy standards required by the California regulations cannot be reasonably adopted in the United States and would sharply boost vehicle costs.

State lawyers argued that automakers can meet the standards by using new technology or alternate fuels.

Limiting vehicle exhaust is part of California's larger effort to reduce its emissions of gases that contribute to global warming.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has set a goal of cutting the amount of such gases to 1990 levels by 2020. On Wednesday, he is expected to sign a bill forcing factories, power plants and refineries to cut their emissions of greenhouse gases.

White House Said To Bar Hurricane Report (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Bush administration has blocked release of a report that suggests global warming is contributing to the frequency and strength of hurricanes, the journal Nature reported Tuesday.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration disputed the Nature article, saying there was not a report but a two-page fact sheet about the topic. The information was to be included in a press kit to be distributed in May as the annual hurricane season approached but wasn't ready.

"The document wasn't done in time for the rollout," NOAA spokesman Jordan St. John said in responding to the Nature article. "The White House never saw it, so they didn't block it."

The possibility that warming conditions may cause storms to become stronger has generated debate among climate and weather experts, particularly in the wake of the Hurricane Katrina disaster.

In the new case, Nature said weather experts at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration — part of the Commerce Department — in February set up a seven-member panel to prepare a consensus report on the views of agency scientists about global warming and hurricanes.

According to Nature, a draft of the statement said that warming may be having an effect.

In May, when the report was expected to be released, panel chair Ants Leetmaa received an e-mail from a Commerce official saying the report needed to be made less technical and was not to be released, Nature reported.

Leetmaa, head of NOAA's Geophysical Fluid Dynamics Laboratory in New Jersey, did not immediately respond to calls seeking comment.

NOAA Administrator Conrad Lautenbacher is currently out of the country, but Nature quoted him as saying the report was merely an internal document and could not be released because the agency could not take an official position on the issue.

However, the journal said in its online report that the study was merely a discussion of the current state of hurricane science and did not contain any policy or position statements.

The report drew a prompt response from Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg, D-N.J., who charged that "the administration has effectively declared war on science and truth to advance its anti-environment agenda ... the Bush administration continues to censor scientists who have documented the current impacts of global warming."

A series of studies over the past year or so have shown an increase in the power of hurricanes in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, a strengthening that many storm experts say is tied to rising sea-surface temperatures.

Just two weeks ago, researchers said that most of the increase in ocean temperature that feeds more intense hurricanes is a result of human-induced global warming, a study one researcher said "closes the loop" between climate change and powerful storms like Katrina.

Not all agree, however, with opponents arguing that many other factors affect storms, which can increase and decrease in cycles.

The possibility of global warming affecting hurricanes is politically sensitive because the administration has resisted proposals to restrict release of gases that can cause warming conditions.

In February, a NASA political appointee who worked in the space agency's public relations department resigned after reportedly trying to restrict access to Jim Hansen, a NASA climate scientist who has been active in global warming research.

How A Tiny Law Firm Made Hay Out Of Tainted Spinach (WSJ)

By Heather Won Tesoriero And Peter Lattman

Then, as word of the bacteria outbreak began to spread this month, lawyers at the firm posted messages on the firm's E. coli blog, www.ecoliblog.com1. They reached out to reporters and waited for the calls and emails to stream in. Now Marler Clark is representing 76 clients. Bill Marler, a 49-year-old partner in the firm, tracks them with Post-it Notes on a U.S. map hanging in his office.

This latest outbreak of E. coli isn't the biggest food catastrophe in recent years, in terms of the number of cases, but it is significant for its geographic reach. Extending far beyond just one restaurant or company, it has reared its head in 26 states and Canada and prompted a massive recall of fresh spinach. As of last night, it had affected 183 people and resulted in 95 hospitalizations, one death -- and five lawsuits filed by Marler Clark clients.

The Food and Drug Administration has traced the outbreak to spinach grown in three counties in California; it is advising people against eating any fresh spinach grown there, which may have been packaged elsewhere, or any spinach whose origin can't be verified. The agency says frozen and canned spinach can be safely eaten.

A tiny firm with six attorneys, a staff epidemiologist and a nurse, Marler Clark has in the past eight years established itself as the go-to place for victims of food-borne illnesses. The firm's niche practice requires it to connect quickly with new, often widely dispersed clients as an outbreak unfolds, making effective marketing paramount. The firm has pursued an aggressive brand-building campaign, including speaking engagements, media interviews and an extensive Internet presence.

A crucial part of the strategy -- and one that appears to have worked with the spinach outbreak -- is being among the first to the courthouse. People familiar with such cases say filing first is crucial to getting visibility and attracting more clients. The more people a lawyer represents, says Mr. Marler, the more leverage the lawyer has at the negotiating table with the defense.

"Bill is a good guy and a good lawyer. He's done a fantastic job of promoting himself and his firm and has done a good job for his clients," says Fred Pritzker, at rival plaintiff shop Pritzker Ruohonen & Associates, in Minneapolis. "Bill is great at putting press releases out, writing editorials and filing lawsuits early on."

Less-severe E. coli cases, with symptoms such as diarrhea, vomiting and dehydration, are usually worth between $25,000 and $500,000 when they are settled, Mr. Marler says. Those involving hemolytic uremic syndrome, or HUS, a potentially life-threatening disease that affects the kidneys and occurs in about 5% to 15% of E. coli patients, can run from $1 million to his highest HUS settlement of $15.6 million.

Marler Clark typically takes a 25% contingency fee in cases involving children, and 35% in cases involving adults. In cases he gets from other attorneys' referrals, he shares the fee.

With the spinach outbreak, all five of the firm's suits name as a defendant Natural Selection Foods LLC; four also name Dole Food Co. The vast majority of Marler Clark's clients identified a Dole product, and a couple of clients identified Earthbound Farm, the private label for Natural Selection.

In a Sept. 15 statement, Dole encouraged consumers to dispose of certain packaged fresh spinach products as a precaution; it also said it is working with public-health agencies and expressed sympathies to those affected. Dole declined to comment further.

Natural Selection, a processor and packager of Dole spinach, initiated a recall as a precaution and said it would work with the government. It didn't return a call seeking comment.

Marler Clark's first spinach cases came to it via the Internet. Gwyn Wellborn, a 27-year-old escrow officer, was hospitalized in late August with a potentially life-threatening complication from the E. coli bacteria. Her husband, David Wellborn, went online looking for more information on the condition. Clicking around the Internet, he came across a Marler Clark Web site. "It was a really good Web site," he says. He canceled an appointment he had made with a local lawyer and phoned the firm.

Drew Falkenstein, a firm associate, took the call. Mr. Wellborn mentioned that his wife had eaten Dole spinach. Six days later, Mr. Falkenstein says, a Wisconsin attorney referred a local case involving a family whose two children had E. coli; the mother suspected it was from Dole spinach.

Two mentions of Dole spinach struck Mr. Falkenstein and Patti Waller, the firm's epidemiologist. They walked into Mr. Marler's office, and he immediately suspected an outbreak. On Sept. 13 and 14, the families called the firm with results of DNA tests, which confirmed that their E. coli bacteria were from the same strain. On Sept. 14, just before government officials announced the news of the sullied spinach, Marler Clark had filed its first case on the Wellborns' behalf.

Mr. Marler made his name in food-poisoning litigation in the early 1990s representing hundreds of plaintiffs against the Jack in the Box hamburger chain. His largest settlement was $15.6 million for a nine-year-old girl who developed acute HUS.

The firm has tried exactly one case -- against a school district in eastern Washington state, where 11 children got E. coli from cafeteria food. Marler won a $4.6 million verdict. Marler says that in 13 years, he has settled cases worth more than $250 million.

Mr. Marler says he and his partner, Bruce Clark, age 50, "know more about [food-borne illness cases] than any two lawyers on the planet." He points to a bound document running some 600 pages; it is a case workup laying out the science of the disease, a child's injuries and the estimated damages, which he will soon be sending to a manufacturer and retailer of contaminated products in a recent E. coli case. He also included a DVD of a day in the life of the child, meant to give the potential defense a picture of the injuries.

To those who call him an ambulance chaser, Mr. Marler points to industry reforms he says came about after he locked horns with companies. Jack in the Box Inc. raised its minimum burger-cooking temperatures to 155° from 140°; the company says the change was unrelated to the legal action. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention requires hospitals to report HUS cases. Odwalla, another defendant in a Marler Clark suit, began pasteurizing its juices following a 1996 E. coli outbreak.

Some lawyers question how great Marler Clark's impact has been. "Food safety was a priority long before Marler began bringing lawsuits," says David Ernst, a defense attorney at Bullivant Houser Bailey, in Portland, Ore., who has litigated against Mr. Marler in food-poisoning cases for more than 10 years. "These are not lawyer-driven reforms."

Still, Mr. Ernst and other defense lawyers say they respect Mr. Marler's expertise. Mr. Ernst says Mr. Marler takes a reasonable approach to valuing cases and tries to avoid protracted litigation. They also call him a master marketer.

Oddly enough, the first headline on Mr. Marler's blog two years ago was "E. coli food poisoning cases drop." Now, the firm has 33 blogs and Web sites covering 14 food-borne illnesses. Mr. Marler says his firm's Web sites started out as sources of information for potential clients; now other firms involved in the spinach matter are following his firm's approach, he says. "This might be the first time when other lawyers say, 'We've got to get Marler off the front page of Google.'"

In 1998, the law firm started a nonprofit called OutBreak, which consults directly with companies on ways to keep food safe. While Mr. Marler says the consulting is part of the firm's mission, critics say it is simply a way to win future plaintiffs. "You generate business by raising your profile," says Ted Frank, a tort-reform advocate with the American Enterprise Institute. "If you have a niche in the law, you're going to want to push your expertise out there."

Some marketing still gets done the old-fashioned way. Mr. Marler's wife, Julie, says she was recently approached in a parking lot by a man asking whether her husband was an attorney. How did he guess? Her lime-green Volkswagen Bug bears the license plate ECOLI.

As A Test Lab On Dirty Air, An Ohio Town Has Changed (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

STEUBENVILLE, Ohio, Sept. 23 — For three generations, people here commuted beneath the scraggly bluffs along the Ohio River to jobs where they made the steel from which 20th-century America — the cars, the skyscrapers, the cans — was built.

Then, starting in the 1970's, Steubenville residents began contributing more personal raw material to a different sort of endeavor. They provided details about their lung function and cardiac rhythms, about the manner of their lives and the cause of their deaths, to the science on which 21st-century air pollution policies are built.

Data from Steubenville have played a central role in many decisions by the Environmental Protection Agency on air pollution regulations, including two of the more controversial — one in 2005 setting the first limits on mercury emissions, and another last week to tighten one but not both of the standards for lethal fine soot particles.

Three decades ago, Steubenville's reputation for having the country's foulest air made it a magnet for researchers in the young field of environmental epidemiology.

"Steubenville is a perfect environmental laboratory," said James Slater, a chemistry professor at Franciscan University of Steubenville. Two large steel mills and two plants that turned coal into furnace-ready coke for those plants operated nearby, he said, and the Ohio River Valley is prone to temperature inversions that trap polluted air. "We have it all," Dr. Slater said.

They had it worse, a half-century ago. Much of that pollution, along with a noxious odor that seemed part burnt toast and part burnt metal, has disappeared along with the jobs at the larger steel plant, across the river in Weirton, W.Va. As the pollution receded, mortality rates declined.

This trend factored into seminal studies on the health consequences of air pollution, including an oft-cited 14-year research project on the health impact of soot concentrations in six industrial cities. Douglas Dockery, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health, led the research. Between the first period of the study, from 1974 to 1989, and an eight-year follow-up period, from 1990 to 1998, soot concentrations declined 24 percent and mortality rates dropped 19 percent.

Steubenville "provided the benchmark that we compared everything else to," Dr. Dockery said, and the study was a crucial underpinning of the first federal regulations on soot, which went into effect in 1987.

In Steubenville and the other cities, Dr. Dockery recruited older adults and first graders.

"I loved it when we got pulled out of class," said Dr. Slater's daughter Beth Atkinson, now 38 and a homemaker in Skaneateles, N.Y. She remembered her classmates filing up to the stage of the Steubenville elementary school.

"There were three different machines, three different lines," Ms. Atkinson said. "You had your own tube. They hooked it up to each machine." Then, "when you blew on it, the plastic part would go up."

As the daughter of a chemist, she said she had an idea that the people with stronger lungs could make the plastic rise higher in the tube, and she wondered about the harm caused by the pollution.

"I'd picture some 'Little House on the Prairie' place," with clear air and blue skies, she said. "I'd imagine those children blowing into the machine. I'd wonder how much they could blow. I'd wonder if our lungs would be as good as theirs."

The studies — at least three are under way right now — have been going on so long they have involved two generations. In the late 1990's, Ms. Atkinson's nephew, Wesley Myers, then about 9, lugged a small air-sniffing backpack everywhere he went for two weeks. "Every half-hour I had to write where I was, what I was doing," said Wesley, now a senior at Catholic Central High School in Steubenville. "I did it for the money" — $100 — he said.

Dr. Slater, Wesley's grandfather, is the scientist on the scene for researchers from Harvard and the University of Michigan. He tends a cluster of monitors on the Franciscan campus, harvesting the data.

He takes visiting scientists to the Hunan restaurant in the old downtown, where Alice Wong, the proprietor, remembers the visitors' tastes, if not their names. "The Harvard people, they liked vegetable fried rice," she said.

Other residents, who remember when the air was dirtier and the streets and their bank accounts were fuller, speak of the scientists and their science less fondly, linking them to the town's decline. From 1980 to 2000, census figures show, the Steubenville-Weirton population dropped faster than that of any urban area in the nation.

Franciscan University's executive vice president, Bob Philby, recalled that when the subject of pollution came up among steel mill workers in the 1970's, "They would say: Don't go there. That's pay dirt." Since then, 9 of 10 steel jobs have vanished.

Jim DiGregory, whose family owns a garden center, was born in Steubenville in 1926, nine years after the entertainer Dean Martin. Mr. DiGregory and his wife, Loretta, were part of the original Harvard study.

Decades ago, the air "didn't smell too good," Mr. DiGregory said. "Maybe people died from it. But who knew what they died from then? They'd say, 'He died of old age.' They'd say it if he was 60 years old."

His wife died in 1988 from a rare heart ailment, becoming part of the studies' mortality statistics. He still fills out postcards the researchers send to see if he is still alive. Is the air cleaner? "Yes." Is it worth the trade-offs? "I don't think so."

The town of 19,000 has half the population it did 60 years ago, and the outlook of many residents has changed. "Certainly 30 years ago, that was a prevailing sense here in the valley that if there's dirt on the air there's food on the table,'' said Adam Scurti, 61, a lawyer. "Now, that would not be tolerated."

Cali Drug Chiefs Given 30-year Prison Terms (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The surviving leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which federal law enforcement agencies say once supplied up to 80% of the cocaine in the USA, pleaded guilty Tuesday to trafficking charges as the government took steps to seize an estimated $2.1 billion in cartel assets.

As part of the plea agreement, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, brothers Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela were sentenced to 30 years in prison, effectively ending a 20-year period in which they were key players in Colombia's violent drug trade.

While Miguel, 62, and Gilberto, 67, were sentenced in Miami, 28 other family members reached a separate pact with the government to surrender their worldwide assets, which court papers say include luxury homes, boats, investment accounts and businesses obtained with drug money.

Although the assets represent the largest drug-related forfeiture in U.S. history, there are no firm estimates of how much the brothers accumulated during their reign of the cartel. None of the relatives was named in the criminal charges.

"It doesn't get any bigger than today," said Drug Enforcement Administrator Karen Tandy. She said the guilty pleas represented the "last nail in the coffin of the Cali cartel."

Tandy said the brothers "defined the word 'kingpins' " with their ruthless oversight of a drug empire. Carolina Barco, Colombia's ambassador to the United States, said the cartel wars claimed hundreds of lives — including those of prosecutors, police and judges — in the South American nation.

Barco, reading a statement from Colombia's attorney general, described the cartel's reign as "one of the most painful chapters in our history."

Since the demise of the Cali group in recent years, there have been signs that the cocaine supply on U.S. streets has declined, said John Walters, director of the White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy. However, he said, smaller groups have taken over many drug-running operations.

Gonzales said the brothers imported more than 200 tons of cocaine into the USA over 20 years. He said the family's assets would go to the countries where they are seized, primarily Colombia.

With Guilty Pleas, Cali Cartel Finished, U.S. Says (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Two brothers who headed Colombia's powerful Cali cocaine cartel pleaded guilty yesterday to drug trafficking charges in Miami and agreed to turn over billions in assets.

As part of a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, Gilberto RodrÃ-guez Orejuela, 67, and Miguel RodrÃ-guez Orejuela, 62, were each sentenced to 30 years in prison and agreed to forfeit $2.1 billion worth of assets linked to the drug trade, officials said. The pair also agreed to plead guilty later to separate money-laundering charges filed against them in New York.

In exchange, half a dozen of the brothers' relatives will not face prosecution. In addition, U.S. officials said, 28 people with ties to the pair will have a chance to be removed from a Treasury Department list that freezes the assets of "specially designated narcotics traffickers" if they relinquish property tainted by drug money, officials said.

Government officials said the agreements bring an end to the Cali cartel, which by the early 1990s had eclipsed its archrival, the MedellÃ-n cartel, as the world's leading cocaine-distribution ring. The family was once estimated to be responsible for up to 80 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States, and it invested its proceeds in scores of legitimate businesses in Colombia and worldwide.

"The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signal the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said at a Washington news conference. "There are always other traffickers and thus continuing challenges for law enforcement, but this is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement."

But drug trafficking experts and U.S. law enforcement officials say the cartel's defeat began at least a decade ago -- after the RodrÃ-guez brothers were imprisoned in Colombia -- and the group has been little more than a shadow of its former self in recent years. The Colombian cocaine trade is now controlled by a more fractured constellation of criminal organizations that work with, and sometimes for, the Mexican cartels that control smuggling operations into the United States, experts say.

"We're moving into a whole new phase of the drug war, because they are decentralizing, smaller and harder to catch than their predecessors," said Ron Chepesiuk, who wrote "Drug Lords: The Rise and Fall of the Cali Cartel."

Gilberto RodrÃ-guez was known as "the Chess Player" for his role in planning the cartel's strategy, while his younger brother was dubbed "the Master" for inventing new ways to hide drugs. Techniques by the Cali cartel included smuggling cocaine in shipments of coffee, frozen vegetables, concrete posts, and ceramic tiles and lumber, among other things, usually using Mexico as a transit point.

Gonzales -- joined in Washington by U.S. law enforcement officials and the Colombian ambassador -- said the RodrÃ-guez brothers "were responsible for the importation of over 200,000 kilograms of cocaine" to the United States from 1990 to 2002, including years when they ran the organization from a Colombian prison.

Miguel RodrÃ-guez's son, William, was sentenced to more than 21 years in prison earlier this year in Miami for his role in helping to run the cartel while his father and uncle were behind bars.

Chepesiuk noted that the assets to be turned over by the RodrÃ-guez brothers amount to a small fraction of the money that was earned by the Cali cartel, which in its heyday was estimated to bring in $5 billion to $7 billion a year. The family's investments included a credit card company, a pharmaceutical firm and a chain of 350 drugstores.

Colombian Drug Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty In Miami (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

Sept. 26 (Bloomberg) -- The former leaders of Colombia's Cali cocaine cartel pleaded guilty to drug charges in Miami and agreed to forfeit $2.1 billion in assets.

Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, who are brothers, were sentenced to 30 years in prison on their guilty pleas to one count each of conspiring to import cocaine into the U.S., the Justice Department said. The men, 62 and 67 years old, also agreed to plead guilty later to a New York charge of conspiring to commit money laundering, the government said.

The two men were responsible for importing more than 200 tons of cocaine into the U.S., Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a news conference in Washington.

``The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signals the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel," Gonzales said.

WASHINGTON Two Colombians who headed the Cali cartel pleaded guilty Tuesday to drug trafficking and money laundering in a complex deal that U.S. officials said marked the end of the gang that once terrorized Colombia and dominated cocaine smuggling into the United States.

As part of their plea deal — reached after months of negotiations with U.S. agencies — Gilberto Orejuela, 67, and his brother Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 63, agreed to forfeit billions of dollars in assets linked to their drug trade.

Wearing pinstriped business suits and shackled at the ankles, each was sentenced to 30 years in a U.S. prison during the pleading in a Miami courtroom.

"The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signals the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a Washington news conference. "This is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement."

A separate deal described in court will protect six of the brothers' relatives in Colombia from prosecution on obstruction of justice and money laundering charges. That agreement also could permit 28 people with ties to the brothers to keep property and other assets not tainted by drug money.

As described by Gonzales and Adam J. Szubin, director of the Foreign Assets Control office at the Treasury Department, the 28 people will be required to turn over any assets — such as houses, bank accounts, and businesses — acquired with drug trafficking. Once those assets are surrendered, the Arejuela family members could eventually be removed from a U.S. list freezing their assets and blocking them from doing business with U.S. entities.

U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno accepted the guilty pleas and approved the sentencing agreement between prosecutors and defense lawyers.

The brothers agreed to forfeit to the United States $2.1 billion (€1.65 billion) in assets linked to drug trafficking, but the two clearly made many times that amount during the cartel's heyday in the 1990s. Gonzales and the eight other U.S. and Colombian officials at the news conference were unable to estimate how many illegal billions of dollars the cartel made during the more than 20 years the two brothers ran it.

The forfeited assets were detailed in an 11-page list and included properties and businesses around the world. But neither brother is being required to cooperate in any ongoing or future criminal investigations, according to the plea agreement.

White House drug czar John Walters told the news conference that the cartel had operated by terrorizing Colombian society and killing prosecutors, judges and political candidates and was responsible for "the torture and murder of more than 100 people" whose bodies were dumped in a Colombian river to keep others downstream in fear of the gang.

Assistant Homeland Security Secretary Julie L. Myers said the pair would be "the highest-level drug figures to ever occupy a U.S. jail cell." The only other contender for that honor might be Carlos Lehder, who helped found an earlier Colombian drug gang, the Medellin cartel. He was sentenced to 55 years in federal prison in a 1992 plea bargain.

"Are you sure?" Moreno asked Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela when he entered his plea.

"Very sure," he replied.

The Cali cartel became the world's leading cocaine smuggling ring after eclipsing the rival Medellin cartel, which fell apart when several top members were arrested and Medellin top kingpin Pablo Escobar was killed in a 1993 shootout with Colombian police.

The Cali cartel was once responsible for as much as 80 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States. It was known for its ingenious smuggling methods, hiding cocaine in such things as hollowed-out lumber and cylinders of chlorine, even shipments of frozen broccoli and okra.

Miguel became known as "The Master" for his inventiveness in finding new ways to hide drugs, while Gilberto's nickname was "The Chess Player" for his role as the cartel's strategic thinker. Their family invested in dozens of legitimate businesses around the world, including the Colombian discount drug store chain Drogas La Rebaja.

William Rodriguez Abadia, Miguel's son and Gilberto's nephew, agreed to forfeit about $300 million (€236.3 million) in worldwide assets after pleading guilty in March to U.S. charges and agreeing to testify against his father and uncle.

The Rodriguez Orejuela brothers were convicted in Colombia of drug charges in 1995, but were indicted in 2003 in Miami on charges that they continued to run their cocaine empire from behind bars. Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela was extradited in late 2004 and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela in early 2005, the highest-ranking of more than 300 drug traffickers extradited since the U.S. and Colombia signed a new treaty in 1997.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and others have investigated the Cali cartel since 1991, resulting in more than 100 convictions, the seizure of more than 50 tons of cocaine and $15 million in cash.

All told, the Cali cartel is estimated to have smuggled more than 250 tons of cocaine into the United States since the 1970s. A recent DEA analysis said that several Colombian organizations now control that country's cocaine trade, increasingly in concert with Mexican organizations that distribute the drug in the United States.

Two Brothers Who Ran Cartel Plead Guilty (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

MIAMI — In what the government called "the final, fatal blow" to the world's biggest cocaine supplier, two Colombian brothers who helped found the infamous Cali cartel pleaded guilty Tuesday to drug trafficking, agreed to forfeit billions in tainted assets, and received what could amount to a life sentence.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, ages 67 and 63, were each sentenced to 30 years in prison. They were the highest-ranking of more than 300 drug traffickers extradited to this country since the United States and Colombia signed a new treaty in 1997.

The brothers also struck a deal with prosecutors to protect six of their relatives in Colombia from prosecution on obstruction and money laundering charges. Twenty-eight family members will be permitted to keep some assets not tainted by drug money and could be removed from a Treasury Department list that has kept their property and bank accounts frozen since 1995.

The Cali cartel, once responsible for as much as 80 percent of the cocaine brought into the United States, was known for its ingenious smuggling methods: hiding the drug in such things as hollowed-out lumber, cylinders of chlorine, even shipments of frozen broccoli and okra.

The brothers' pleas "effectively signal the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in Washington. "This is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement."

Miguel was known as "The Master" for his inventiveness in finding ways to hide drugs. Gilberto's nickname was "The Chess Player" for his role as the cartel's strategic thinker. Their family invested in dozens of legitimate businesses around the world, including a Colombian discount drugstore chain with more than 400 stores.

In court, Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela issued an apology "to the people of the United States and to all individuals in authority. I am doing this from the bottom of my heart."

The brothers agreed to forfeit to the United States $2.1 billion in assets linked to drug trafficking, but the two probably made many times that amount during the cartel's heyday in the 1990s. Neither brother is required to cooperate in any current or future criminal investigations, according to the plea agreement.

The Miami attorney for the family members, Marc Seitles, said the deal would allow the relatives to escape the cartel's shadow. "They are going to get the benefit of a new day, of starting a new life," Seitles said.

Colombia's chief prosecutor, Mario Iguaran, praised the agreement in a statement, saying it "concludes one the most painful chapters of our recent history" which resulted in the death of numerous government officials, innocent citizens and the undermining of Colombia's crime-fighting institutions.

The Cali cartel became the world's leading cocaine smuggling ring after eclipsing the rival Medellin cartel, which fell apart when several top members were arrested and its kingpin Pablo Escobar was killed in a 1993 shootout with Colombian police.

The brothers were convicted in Colombia of drug charges in 1995 but were indicted in 2003 in Miami on charges they continued to run their cocaine empire from behind bars. Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela was extradited in 2004 and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela in 2005.

In March, William Rodriguez Abadia, Miguel's son, agreed to forfeit about $300 million in worldwide assets after pleading guilty to U.S. charges and agreeing to testify against his father and uncle.

The Cali cartel is estimated to have smuggled more than 250 tons of cocaine into the United States since the 1970s.

Colombia continues to provide some 80 percent of the world's cocaine. Despite record eradication and extradition numbers, the supply continues to be robust, and the traffickers are said to include right-wing paramilitary chiefs and leftist rebels.

Colombian Drug Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty (NYT)

By Maria Newman

Two leaders of the Colombian drug trade were sentenced to 30 years in prison today after they pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to import cocaine into the United States. Federal officials heralded their imprisonment as the end of the notorious Cali drug cartel.

At a hearing in a federal court in Miami, the brothers Miguel and Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela, who prosecutors said directed the Cali drug cartel in Colombia for more than 20 years, also agreed to plead guilty to a charge of conspiracy to commit money laundering by hiding the proceeds of narcotics trafficking.

Federal prosecutors believe these sentences to be so significant that they were announced in Washington by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other top-level federal and state officials.

“These two men were responsible for importing more than 200 tons of cocaine into this country over the course of many years,” Mr. Gonzales said. “While at the height of their power, the intimidation and violence of their cartel held the people of the Colombian countryside hostage to fear.”

Mr. Gonzales said the two brothers also agreed to pay $2.1 billion in forfeiture.

“The brothers’ guilty plea effectively signaled the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel,” Mr. Gonzales said. “There are always other traffickers and thus continuing challenges for law enforcement, but this is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement.”

In a separate deal, prosecutors agreed not to bring obstruction of justice and money laundering charges against six children of the two brothers, in return for they and 22 other members of the Rodríguez Orejuela family agreeing to forfeit all of their assets anywhere in the world “that were obtained directly or indirectly with narcotics proceeds.” They will also give up all assets in the United States, no matter how they were acquired.

“None of the 28 family members are involved with narcotics trafficking,’’ said Alexander Acosta, the United States attorney for the Southern District of Florida.

At a hearing this morning, the brothers apologized for their actions.

“I am willingly submitting myself to American justice,” Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela, 67, said at the hearing, according to The Miami Herald.

”It is an honor to be before this court,” said his brother, who, like Gilberto Rodríguez, was dressed in a dark business suit and was shackled at the ankles. “I want to apologize to my family and ask for forgiveness for any suffering I may have caused them.”

Mr. Gonzales said the prosecution of the two came about only with the cooperation of the government of President Álvaro Uribe Vélez of Colombia, who agreed to extradite the two. Carolina Barco, Colombia’s ambassador to the United States, was at the news conference today.

“Together we have proven that Colombia will not be held hostage by drug lords, and that those who seek to flood the neighborhoods of the United States with the poison of illegal drugs will be held accountable, they will be discovered and they will be brought to justice,” Mr. Gonzales said.

John Walters, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, who was also at the news conference, praised President Uribe for his “courage” in helping to bring down the two formidable drug kingpins.

“People in the past talked about the Cali cartel as the peaceful cartel, but their reign of terror and blood, their war with Pablo Escobar in the early 90’s, still haunts the collective memory of many in Colombia and many in this country that worked against them,” he said. “The Cali cartel was one of the most powerful criminal organizations ever, seeking to buy or kill anybody that got in their way.”

Officials said at the news conference that there has been a significant drop in the amount of cocaine produced in the Andes region of South America, including Colombia. But they acknowledged that even with the Cali cartel out of the way, hundreds of other smaller cartels, some of them left-wing groups, have filled the vaccuum.

Julie Myers, an assistant secretary of homeland security, said that the Cali cartel’s methods evolved, in the 15 years they were under investigation by American authorities, to avoid detection. In the same way, she said, investigators know that the current drug dealers are finding new ways to smuggle their trade, like hiding illicit drugs “in frozen broccoli, put it in ceramic tiles, operating from jail cells.’’

“But law enforcement continued, and that’s what we’ll do for smaller cartels or for big cartels is, we’ll work together as a group to dismantle these,’’ she said.

Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, September 27, 2006

The Colombian kingpins who revolutionized the global cocaine trade appeared as mere mortals in Miami federal court on Tuesday in pleading guilty to smuggling-conspiracy charges and apologizing for their life of crime.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodríguez Orejuela stood in dark businesses suits before U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno as he sentenced the Cali cartel founders to 30 years in prison and ordered them to forfeit $2.1 billion in assets from their once-powerful empire.

"I am willingly submitting myself to American justice," Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela, 67, who was shackled at the ankles, told the judge.

Said Miguel Rodríguez Orejuela, 63, who was also cuffed: ``I want to apologize to my family and ask for forgiveness for any suffering I may have caused them. . . . I'm doing this fully convinced it will bring something better."

So significant was the case of the Colombian brothers -- responsible for 80 percent of the cocaine sold in the United States in the 1990s -- that U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and South Florida's U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta took the rare opportunity to hold a news conference in Washington on Tuesday afternoon.

`FATAL BLOW'

'The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signal the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali Cartel," Gonzales said. ``There are always other traffickers and thus continuing challenges for law enforcement, but this is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement."

Indeed, last March, Gonzales publicized a crackdown on another Colombian narco-network that controls a big chunk of the cocaine trade from South America through Mexico to the United States. He announced the indictment of the entire top leadership and dozens of other commanders of Colombia's FARC guerrillas on charges of running a $25 billion drug operation responsible for 60 percent of the cocaine on U.S. streets.

On Tuesday, the Rodríguez Orejuela brothers pleaded guilty to conspiring to smuggle tons of cocaine into the United States. The brothers also agreed to plead guilty to a separate indictment filed in New York that charged them with conspiring to launder their drug profits.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Matt Axelrod estimated that the figure was "over 200,000 kilograms" -- imported to South Florida and other parts of the country from 1990 to July 2002. The brothers packed the white powder in concrete posts, frozen vegetables, coffee and ceramic tile, among other creative ways.

The brothers faced up to 30 years in prison because they conspired to import more than 150 kilos of cocaine -- even after they were arrested by Colombian authorities in 1995 and were incarcerated in Bogotá until their extraditions to Miami in 2004-05.

The judge, known for his wit, drew laughs from the packed courtroom when he responded to Axelrod's smuggling estimate: ``I think that would probably meet the threshold."

RELATIVES SPARED

Their plea deal came with some benefits: The brothers don't have to worry about the fate of other family members who allegedly were linked to their narcotics enterprise.

As part of their plea deal, 28 family members -- including sons, daughters and cousins -- signed a separate agreement that removes them from a U.S. Treasury Department list that designated them as part of the Cali operation, according to their attorney, Marc Seitles. Of those, six family members won't be prosecuted on drug-related charges of obstruction of justice or money laundering.

The agreement allows the brothers' family members to keep some of their wealth that was untainted by drug profits, such as real estate in Spain. "The best chess players understand that every now and then you must sacrifice some important pieces for the safety and security of the entire board," said Miami lawyer David O. Markus, who represented Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela, while attorney Roy Kahn represented the brother Miguel.

The brothers' syndicate reached its zenith in the early 1990s, when they allegedly exported more than 4,000 kilos of cocaine per month to the United States. Despite their incarceration, prosecutors said Miguel Rodríguez Orejuela's son, William Rodríguez Abadia, a Colombian-trained lawyer, continued the family narcotics business through 2000. The son, who pleaded guilty in March, agreed to testify against his father and uncle at a trial scheduled for November.

Their prosecution capped an investigation that began almost two decades ago by Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent Ed Kacerosky and assistant U.S. Attorney Ed Ryan. Upwards of 100 Cali cartel members were convicted as part of Operation Cornerstone in the United States and Colombia.

The Washington Times/UPI, September 26, 2006

The Colombian brothers believed to have founded the Cali cartel pleaded guilty to drug trafficking Tuesday in Miami and were sentenced to 30 years in prison.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodr?guez Orejuela apologized to their families and to the people of the United States for their activities, the Miami Herald reported.

"It is an honor to be before this court," said Miguel Rodr?guez Orejuela. "I want to apologize to my family and ask for forgiveness for any suffering I may have caused them. ... I'm doing this fully convinced it will bring something better."

Both brothers are in their 60s and the sentences mean they are likely to die in federal prison. Under the plea agreement, the government agreed not to prosecute six other members of their family and allowed them to keep some assets not related to drug trafficking, including real estate in Spain, the Herald said.

In the mid 1990s, the Cali cartel is believed to have smuggled several tons of cocaine a month into the United States.

CBS News/AP, September 26, 2006

(CBS/AP) Two Colombian brothers pleaded guilty Tuesday to U.S. drug trafficking and money laundering charges stemming from their roles as founders of the Cali cocaine cartel, and agreed to forfeit billions of dollars of assets linked to their drug trade.

The pleas cap a 15-year effort to dismantle the Cali cartel, reports CBS News' Stephanie Lambidakis. It started as a Customs' investigation in 1991 when a drug dog sniffed cocaine at the Miami seaport. The drugs were found in concrete posts.

Gilberto, 67, and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 63, made their pleas in an agreement reached after months of negotiations with several U.S. agencies. The two brothers who once ran the world's top cocaine supplier could now spend the rest of their lives in prison; each received a 30-year sentence.

One person describes Cali as the Wal-Mart of the drug world in terms of sheer volume and dominance of the market, says Lambidakis. It's estimated the Orejuelas controlled 80 percent of the cocaine market in the 1990s largely because of the corporate mentality of the two brothers and the ingenious ways in which they hid drugs, such as in frozen broccoli. The Drug Enforcement Administration believes the successor organizations are fractured and will never have the clout of Cali.

Miguel became known as "The Master" for his inventiveness in finding new ways to hide drugs, while Gilberto's nickname was "The Chess Player" for his role as the cartel's strategic thinker. Their family invested in dozens of legitimate businesses around the world, including the Colombian discount drug store chain Drogas La Rebaja.

A separate deal described in court will protect six of the brothers' relatives in Colombia from prosecution on obstruction of justice and money laundering charges. That agreement also could permit 28 people with ties to the brothers to keep property and other assets not tainted by drug money. The 28 could eventually be removed from a U.S. list freezing their assets and blocking them from doing business with U.S. entities.

U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno accepted the guilty pleas and approved the sentencing agreement between prosecutors and defense lawyers.

The brothers agreed to forfeit to the United States $2.1 billion in assets linked to drug trafficking, but the two probably made many times that amount during the cartel's heyday in the 1990s. The forfeited assets were detailed in an 11-page list of items and included properties and businesses around the world.

But neither brother is being required to cooperate in any ongoing or future criminal investigations, according to the plea agreement.

"Are you sure?" Moreno asked Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela as he entered his plea.

"Very sure," he replied, appearing with his brother wearing pinstriped business suits instead of the usual tan prison garb. They were shackled at the ankles.

The Cali cartel became the world's leading cocaine smuggling ring after eclipsing the rival Medellin cartel, which fell apart when several top members were arrested and Medellin top kingpin Pablo Escobar was killed in a 1993 shootout with Colombian police.

The Cali cartel avoided that violence and tried to look like legitimate business people. It showered their largess in Colombia by building soccer stadiums and did other "good works."

According to Immigrations and Customs Enforcement, while in prison in Colombia, the Orejuelas kept running the enterprise. The extraditions really seemed to help the U.S. government turn the corner on ending the Cali cartel.

William Rodriguez Abadia, Miguel's son and Gilberto's nephew, agreed to forfeit about $300 million in worldwide assets after pleading guilty in March to U.S. charges and agreeing to testify against his father and uncle.

The Rodriguez Orejuela brothers were convicted in Colombia of drug charges in 1995, but were indicted in 2003 in Miami on charges that they continued to run their cocaine empire from behind bars. Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela was extradited in late 2004 and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela in early 2005, the highest-ranking of more than 300 drug traffickers extradited since the U.S. and Colombia signed a new treaty in 1997.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and others have investigated the Cali cartel since 1991, resulting in more than 100 convictions, the seizure of more than 50 tons of cocaine and $15 million in cash.

All told, the Cali cartel is estimated to have smuggled more than 250 tons of cocaine into the United States since the 1970s. A recent DEA analysis said that several Colombian organizations now control that country's cocaine trade, increasingly in concert with Mexican organizations that distribute the drug in the United States.

Colombian Drug Lords Jailed In US (BBC)

BBC News, September 27, 2006

The brothers were once among the world's most powerful criminals Two brothers who led Colombia's infamous Cali drug cartel have each been sentenced to 30 years in US jails.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela pleaded guilty in a federal court in Miami to conspiring to import 200,000kg (441,000lb) of cocaine into the US.

The sentencing came after the pair reached a plea agreement to forfeit $2.1bn (£1.1bn) while charges against some of their relatives were dropped.

The US attorney general said the deal was the cartel's final, fatal blow.

"This is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement," Alberto Gonzales said.

Empire run from jail

The brothers founded the cartel and were once considered among the world's most powerful criminals.

The BBC's Jeremy Mc Dermott in Bogota says they were always family-orientated and that, in the end, was the reason for their guilty plea.

They struck a deal with prosecutors to protect six relatives from money-laundering and obstruction charges. Twenty-eight family members will be allowed to hold onto some assets not tainted by drugs.

"The brothers are happy that their families are taken care of," said Roy Kahn, a lawyer for the family.

"And to them, whether it's 30, 20 or 15 years - to them it's going to be a lifetime in jail. But they're willing to do that for their family's future and their family's welfare."

Clever traffickers

The Cali cartel was once responsible for up to 80% of the cocaine smuggled into the US, and was known for its ingenious smuggling methods that hid cocaine in hollowed-out timber, cylinders of chlorine, and even shipments of frozen broccoli and okra.

Miguel, 63, was extradited to the US in March, three months after his brother Gilberto, 67, was flown to Miami. Both initially pleaded not guilty.

The brothers were accused of organising drug-trafficking and money-laundering from the Colombian prison in which they had been held since 1995.

In March, William Rodriguez Abadia, Gilberto's son, was sentenced to more than 20 years in prison by a judge in Miami, after he agreed to co-operate against his father and his uncle.

Abadia, a lawyer, is alleged to have led the cartel after the pair were arrested in 1995.

Judge Sentences Founders Of Cali Cartel To 30 Years (MCT)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-Sentinel

McClatchy Newspapers, September 27, 2006

MIAMI - Wearing business suits and ankle cuffs, the two brothers who once ran the world's largest drug trafficking organization said the words Tuesday U.S. prosecutors had waited more than a decade to hear.

The aging drug kingpins pleaded guilty in Miami federal court to smuggling more than 200 tons of cocaine into the United States. They agreed to turn over companies, bank accounts and other assets connected to the drug trade worth more than $2 billion.

Now, Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela, who turned cocaine running into a sophisticated, multibillion-dollar business as leaders of the notorious Cali Cartel, will spend 30 years in prison.

To reach the plea agreement - which closes the book on the last of Colombia's mega-cocaine trafficking organizations - government lawyers entered an unusual deal to protect 28 family members in Colombia from being permanently labeled as drug traffickers.

In exchange, Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela admitted to smuggling massive amounts of cocaine into U.S. ports throughout the 1990s, including shipments hidden inside concrete posts, frozen vegetables, coffee, ceramic tiles, chlorine gas tanks and crates of pumpkins.

They also agreed to plead guilty to money laundering charges in a criminal case pending in New York.

"I have admitted all the charges, and I will submit myself to American justice," said Gilberto Rodriguez-Orejuela, 67, known as "the Chess Player".

Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela, 63 - known as "El Senor" - apologized to his family, the people of the United States and to U.S. law enforcement.

"I'm doing this fully convinced this is to bring something better," he said.

After the proceeding, federal law enforcement officials declared victory over the Cali organization.

"The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signal the final fatal blow to the powerful Cali Cartel," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in Washington, D.C.

Drug policy experts say any victory for law enforcement is largely symbolic.

The demise of the cartel did little to reduce the flow of cocaine into the United States, said Adam Isacson, head of the Colombia project at the Center of International Policy in Washington, D.C. Instead, it cleared the path for a new generation of mini-cartels, more fragmented and often more dangerous than their predecessors, he said.

"Instead of Al Capone, you've got a bunch of little guys," Isacson said. "They stay local. They keep their heads down. It's much harder to pin down."

The Rodriguez-Orejuela brothers created the Cali Cartel in the 1980s with a third man named Jose Santacruz Londono. After a bloody war with the Medellin Cartel run by Pablo Escobar, the group took control of the cocaine trade in the early 1990s.

The organization ran every step of the drug trafficking business, including production, transportation, distribution and money laundering.

Unlike the flashy Escobar, who was gunned down in 1993, the Cali leaders operated their crime syndicate like businessmen. They cloaked themselves in respectability by funneling millions of dollars in drug proceeds through a worldwide network of legitimate companies, including major retail pharmacy and pharmaceutical laboratory chains in Colombia.

The cartel allegedly bought security with payments to Colombian politicians, including a donation of nearly $6 million to the campaign of former President Ernesto Samper.

Samper turned on the cartel under increasing pressure from the U.S. government. In 1995, Colombian authorities arrested Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela in Cali. Both were serving sentences in a Bogota prison when a 2003 federal grand jury in Miami indicted them.

The U.S. indictment alleged conspiracies to import and distribute cocaine, launder money and obstruct justice through bribes and murder. According to prosecutors, Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela continued to run the family business from prison, turning over day-to-day operations to Miguel's eldest son, William Rodriguez-Abadia.

In March, Rodriguez-Abadia, 40, pleaded guilty and agreed to testify for the government against his father and uncle.

Miami attorneys Roy Kahn and David O. Markus, who represent the brothers, argued that under the terms of their extradition they could not be prosecuted for criminal activity prior to Dec. 17, 1997 - the date the Colombian constitution was amended to permit foreign extraditions.

Tuesday's plea deal ended that debate. U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno made it clear he was imposing 30-year sentences on the men for their illegal activities after 1997.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Axelrod said his office would recommend the men serve their sentences in a Florida medium-security prison.

As part of their contract with the 28 family members, prosecutors agreed not to charge six of the men's grown children in Colombia with obstruction of justice and money laundering for past conduct.

DOJ_NMG_0069856

The agreement also permits those family members to retain modest assets. If they refrain from illegal conduct, the U.S. Treasury Department would remove the 28 relatives from a list of suspected drug traffickers subject to economic sanctions. Illegal activity would invalidate the deal.

Marc Seitles, who represented the relatives, praised the deal.

"Their only crime is being sons and daughters of the founders of the Cali Cartel," he said.

The U.S. investigation into Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela began in 1991 with the detection of 12,000 kilograms of cocaine at the Port of Miami. The discovery spawned a massive investigation known as Operation Cornerstone that would lead to the convictions of more than 100 people.

Today, cocaine shipments are generally smaller and come into the United States across the southwest border with Mexico, instead of into South Florida ports, said John McKenna, a special agent with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

"When the Cali Cartel was operating you might see shipments of 2,500 kilograms at a time," McKenna said. "You don't see that anymore."

Despite Cali Cartel Plea Deal, Challenges Remain In Colombian Drug War (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, September 26, 2006

Although U.S. and Colombian officials claimed a final victory over the Cali cartel following the guilty plea by its two founding members, significant challenges remain in the drug war and the Colombian government's efforts against the FARC narco-terrorist rebel group.

At a news conference, the Colombian ambassador to the United States, Carolina Barco, said, "For Colombia, the drug problem has been its major challenge, and we have been fighting this since the 1980s, with great conviction and at great cost."

According to the DEA, the FARC rebels (Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia) control large parts of the coca production areas in Colombia and are responsible for supplying more than 50 percent of the world's cocaine and more than 60 percent of the cocaine that enters the United States. They have provided it to many Mexican trafficking organizations and according to some U.S. officials, have recently begun to shift their trafficking networks into Venezuela.

FARC guerrillas use the proceeds to purchase weapons and munitions for their war against the Colombian government. The insurgent group has been active in the country since the 1940s, but fighting intensified in the late 1990s when the FARC gained more territory and had several key victories over the national military.

Barco described the struggle that has gripped the country for years and the consequences of the drug trade, saying, "As a Colombian, I think we all need to continue to speak out to what drug trafficking means to any country, because it is that terrible combination of incredible amounts of money, which breed corruption, and incredible amounts of violence."

'Top Extradition Partner'

Despite increased eradication flights, which U.S. and Colombian officials say are having an effect, coca production in Colombia and other Andean nations remains high. However, cultivation levels have dropped drastically since the mid to late 1990s.

A report by the United Nations Office of Drugs and Crime found that coca production in Colombia increased by 8 percent over last year.

San Antonio Express-News, September 26, 2006

Mexico City -- To send a chilling message to their underworld rivals, Mexican drug cartels are adopting a method of intimidation made notorious by Middle Eastern terrorist groups.

Already this year, at least 26 people have been decapitated in Mexico, with heads stuck on fences, dumped in trash piles and -- most recently -- tossed onto a nightclub dance floor.

Although beheading goes back centuries as a form of execution, it has become the latest tactical escalation of a turf war that gets nastier all the time, with hit men looking for new ways to instill fear.

"Before, they tortured the hell out of people, but they didn't throw their heads out in public," said James Kuykendall, a retired U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

Why this form of murder and mutilation is being used now is anyone's guess.

Beheadings have had a high international profile in recent years, as the tool of radical Islamist groups that release videos of hostages being executed.

In Mexico, as crime bosses fall and turf shifts, the pattern of killing is changing.

The infamous Gulf and Sinaloa cartels and their smaller offshoots are fighting for control of smuggling routes from the southern border with Guatemala to the northern border with the United States.

"It is clearly a message for the living. What they are trying do with these beheadings is leave an impression on their enemies," said Jorge Chabat, a Mexico City analyst who studies drug trafficking. "This is a sign the war is spreading and it is getting more horrible."

Police, wise guys and lawyers are among the dead, but most of the victims remain unidentified. Some were blindfolded or showed signs of torture.

The boldest strike came this month when five heads were scattered on the dance floor of a bar in the state of Michoacan -- a region west of Mexico City notorious for drug trafficking.

"The family does not kill for pay, does not kill women and does not kill innocents," read a handwritten sign left beside the heads. "The only ones who die deserve to die, and all the people know that this is divine justice."

Saying the attacks were too delicate a topic, Mexican police and federal prosecutors refused to discuss the beheadings in more than the most general terms.

They point to the Zetas -- a group of highly trained Mexican army deserters -- and the Maras -- Central American gangsters known for their brutality and extravagant facial tattoos -- who work for the cartels as hit men.

No arrests for the killings have been announced. Beheadings reportedly have occurred in the states of Guerrero, Michoacan, Baja California and Nuevo Leon.

The crimes are every bit as chilling a calling card as the old "Colombian necktie," used by cartels in that country, which involved slicing a person's throat and pulling the tongue through the wound.

Mexico's first narco-decapitation came in April in Acapulco. The heads of two police officers were stuck in plastic bags and mounted on a fence that surrounds government offices.

The cartels are saying there is now a higher price to pay than the traditional gangster death for opposing them, said Bruce Bagley, a University of Miami analyst who studies Latin American drug traffickers.

"Filling people full of bullets is old hat -- this has really been an attention-getter and it has clearly scared the hell out of people," he said.

AP, September 26, 2006

MEXICO CITY (AP)--Mexico's president-elect says murder and mayhem fueled by drug smuggling have overwhelmed the governments of the nation's capital and key states across the country.

Felipe Calderon said the wave of bloodshed knows no politics; it is ravaging state governments controlled by each of Mexico's three major parties. He singled out the capital, the northern states of Sinaloa and Tamaulipas, the southern state of Guerrero and his home state of Michoacan, as being especially hard-hit.

"It seems to me that drug violence has overwhelmed the governments of the PAN, the PRI and the PRD," Calderon said in a radio interview.

The PAN is the ruling National Action Party, while the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, controlled Mexico's presidency from 1929 until losing to President Vicente Fox in 2000. In the July 2 presidential election, Calderon barely beat leftist former Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador of the PRD, or Democratic Revolution Party.

Calderon called for legislative and law-enforcement efforts across party lines "in a very coordinated way."

He said during his daily briefing with reporters at Los Pinos, the Mexican equivalent of the White House. "The fight has not been overwhelmed, but there's still much to do."

Calderon will take office Dec. 1, replacing the term-limited Fox.

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico City has long expressed concern about the growing wave of violence along the northern border, where people are gunned down with automatic weapons almost daily, and dozens of Americans have been kidnapped.

Authorities say more than 1,500 people have died in Mexican drug violence so far this year.

Narcotics investigators on both sides of the border attribute the spike in killings to a territorial war between drug gangs battling for control of lucrative smuggling corridors into the United States.

But U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza recently extended warnings to say Americans should use extreme caution when traveling anywhere in Mexico.

"The bottom line is that we simply cannot allow drug traffickers to place in jeopardy the lives of our citizens and the safety of our communities," Garza said in a statement Sept. 14.

Calderon said drug violence "is generating much more diplomatic pressure" from Washington, adding that upcoming U.S. congressional elections have made Mexico even more of a hot issue than usual.

Violence has sometimes reached spectacular level in Calderon's native state of Michoacan in central Mexico, west of the capital.

On Sept. 6, gunmen with their faces covered burst into a seedy nightclub in the Michoacan city of Uruapan, fired guns in the air and rolled five severed human heads onto the dance floor.

Investigators say Michoacan is a base for powerful cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamine smugglers with ties to some of the country's largest and most-violent drug gangs.

Beheadings also have occurred in Guerrero state, home to the Pacific resort of Acapulco, and in Baja California, where the violent border city of Tijuana is located.

The War On Drugs: Ambushed In Jamund? (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

JAMUNDÍ, COLOMBIA

Arcesio Morales Buitrago is in charge of the keys at Mi Casita. A soft-spoken man diagnosed as schizophrenic, he is the doyen of the patients at the leafy psychiatric home.

On May 22, right after the Monday afternoon bingo game, three cars skidded to a halt on the road that dead ends at Mi Casita. Ten men in blue jeans and police vests and one man in a ski mask piled out.

"Judicial police! Open up!" they shouted.

Mr. Morales, as the one responsible for the keys, hurried down the path to comply.

DOJ_NMG_0069859

As he reached the green iron gate, however, Sergio Berrio, the administrator of the home, leaned out from the balcony above and screeched: "Stay back! Don't open!"

Morales froze. That's when the shooting started: a torrent of bullets and grenades rained down on the police from the nearby forest. "The war came here," Morales recalls incredulously, "...all the way here."

What followed in the next 45 minutes was the calculated massacre of one of Colombia's best counternarcotics police teams - all hand-picked and trained by the US. None survived.

This is a story of those policemen - of the members of Colombia's military that killed them - and of the narcotraffickers that, according to Colombia's attorney general, ordered the hit.

The investigation of the Jamundí massacre to date suggests the reach that Colombia's drug lords maintain today, and has shaken officials in Washington and Bogotá. The US Congress has temporarily frozen funding for Plan Colombia, the $4.7 billion effort to stop the illicit drug trade - and a chorus of disappointed and angry voices in both capitals is demanding an honest evaluation of the US' most expensive foreign aid program outside of the Middle East, six years after it set out to win the war on drugs.

"Three thousand Americans a year die from Colombian drugs," says US Ambassador to Colombia William Wood. "That's like suffering a World Trade Towers attack every year."

Talking about drugs in terms of an attack on the US is not new. President Richard Nixon coined the term "war on drugs" in 1971, and President Ronald Regan popularized it in the 1980s, as crack cocaine was devastating America's inner cities. Then, with the cold war drawing to a close, illicit substances and those who trafficked them became the new international enemy - and the countries that produced them became battlefields. Colombia has emerged as the biggest battlefield of all.

An estimated 5.5 million Americans have used cocaine at least once in the past 12 months, roughly the same number as were doing so in 2002, according to the annual US Department of Health and Human Services survey. More than 2.3 million Americans are "current" users, defined as consuming the drug within the last month - a slightly higher number than the regular users counted in 2002.

Cocaine consumption is rising faster in Europe, but the US still has the highest rate of cocaine use anywhere in the world.

And while Ambassador Wood's 3,000 US deaths related to cocaine use is debated, the source of the narcotic is not. Colombia supplies an estimated 80 percent of cocaine worldwide, and more than 90 percent of the cocaine (and half the heroin) in the US, according to the State Department.

Three years after President Reagan defined drugs as a national security threat, President George H. W. Bush intensified this war. Under the 1989 Andean Initiative, aid to the region was boosted and US training and support for counter narcotics military and police was sanctioned.

Bolivia and Peru, the world's two other major coca-producing nations, received sharply increased assistance too - but the majority of the drug-war funds went to Colombia. In 1989, Colombia got $18 million for military and police assistance. A year later, US funding increased five-fold, making it the Western Hemisphere's No. 1 recipient of US security assistance, a distinction it maintains today.

Plan Colombia, the counternarcotics program conceived by Colombian President Andres Pastrana, modified and launched by President Bill Clinton in 2000, and since embraced by President George W. Bush, carried this commitment to new levels.

In its first 18 months, Plan Colombia spent $1.3 billion in the region, the vast majority - $860 million - in Colombia. Of that aid, some 75 percent - $642 million - went toward security - including the formation of a new counternarcotics brigade within the Colombian army whose job was to ease the way for the massive aerial herbicide spraying of coca crops. Since its launch, Plan Colombia has cost the US $4.7 billion, of which 75-80 percent has gone to the security forces.

The plan has achieved significant results in terms of coca fields eradicated, clandestine drug laboratories burned and tons of drugs seized. Thousands of people involved in the drug trade have been caught, killed, put behind bars, or extradited to the US.

Further, the decades-old drug-fueled conflict between right-wing paramilitaries, leftist guerrillas, and the government has abated perceptibly, say analysts. A halting process of demobilizing the paramilitaries is under way, and the rebel Revolutionary

Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) has lost ground to the army. President Alvaro Uribe was re-elected this May in a landslide thanks to his success in improving security in the country.

But the drug trade and the war against it continue to spawn violence, massive displacements of population, and high levels of corruption here, tearing at the social fabric of the country. And Colombia continues to be heavily, some say dangerously, militarized, with its army taking on internal security roles that would be prohibited in the US and many other democracies.

Now the Jamundí ambush is forcing some officials in Colombia (the No. 1 producer of cocaine in the world) and the US (the No. 1 consumer) to reevaluate their approach.

"We have spent $4.7 billion in Colombia ... and we brush under the rug a host of uncomfortable questions - about the military ... degrees of corruption, and overall efficacy of the drug war effort," says Bruce Bagley, an expert on drug trafficking at the University of Miami. "And then, along comes a Jamundí and calls the entire presumption of this war on drugs into question."

When the shooting started near the psychiatric home, Morales dove into a wide gutter along the driveway, covering his ears with his hands and pressing his face as close to the concrete as he could bear. When he finally emerged, he saw more than a dozen Colombian soldiers from the alpine battalion of the Army's 3rd Brigade descending from the hills. On the ground outside the gate were 11 bodies, riddled with bullets.

"They were my most effective, trustworthy, elite group," laments Brig. Gen. Oscar Naranjo, director of the judicial police. Seven of the men in the team were members of the police's top counternarcotics unit: a group of approximately 200 police who have gone through rigorous vetting and training by the US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA).

Those seven killed in Jamundí were part of a 15-person team that had, in the past 18 months, smashed 15 drug rings, captured 205 traffickers, including 23 wanted for extradition to the US, and seized nearly 4.4 tons of cocaine.

That day in May, they had come to the Cauca Valley, 195 miles southwest of the nation's capital, together with an informant and three police specialists, on a tip that 440 poundsof cocaine were stashed in the psychiatric home.

A tragic case of "friendly fire," is how Army commander Gen. Mario Montoya originally described the "shoot out," protesting that the troops had no advance knowledge of an undercover operation and had mistaken the police for kidnappers.

But as the smoke cleared, a different narrative began to take shape.

"This was not a mistake, this was a crime; this was a deliberate decision, a criminal decision," Attorney General Mario Iguarán announced a few days later. The soldiers, he bluntly charged, "...were doing the bidding of a drug trafficker." Eight of the policemen were shot in the head, and two were shot in the back, according to forensic reports. "This is one of the gravest cases in our history," says General Naranjo. "This is active corruption, and my men are dead. This cannot be tolerated."

According to a senior official investigating the case, speaking on condition of anonymity, the police unit that day may have been looking not just for drugs, but for a specific drug trafficker: Diego Montoya Sánchez, a reputed head of the Norte del Valle (North Valley) cartel.

Since the dismantling of the Medellín and Cali cartels in the 1980s and early 1990s, the Norte del Valle Cartel has become Colombia's most powerful drug ring. Officials say that the two factions of the cartel are behind 30 percent of the cocaine sent to the US, and Montoya is on the FBI's 10-most-wanted list, right beside Osama bin Laden, with a bounty of $5 million on his head. According to the investigator, the police unit had been told Montoya was hiding in the psychiatric home, posing as a patient.

The Mi Casita administrators, who lost almost half their private funding after the media reports linked them to Montoya, deny any connection to narcotrafficking. The police investigation has turned up no drugs or evidence that a drug lord had been at the home. The police, says the investigator, may well have been on a wild goose chase set up by the army unit, acting on behalf of Montoya.

Fifteen soldiers, including rising Army star commander Col. Bayron Carvajal, were soon arrested - and the investigation, say officials in the attorney general's office, is likely to reach higher in the military ranks and will possibly include the police or even politicians.

Colonel Carvajal's younger brother, Juan Carlos, maintains the soldiers' innocence, suggesting instead the police might be the corrupt ones in the story. "Uribe needed to blame someone," says Carvajal, arguing that Colombia's president could not afford to have the DEA's top trained police unit implicated in any scandal - especially not in late May, right before the presidential elections. "My brother and the others are political pawns. They are being made to take the fall," he insists.

In fact, Carvajal's allegations are not considered to be too far a stretch - the Norte del Valle group is known for its connections to the police. Former cartel leaders such as Danilo González, Victor Patiño, and Patiño's half-brother Luís Ocampo were all former policemen - as is Wilber Varela, currently Montoya's biggest internal rival.

But, evidence against the soldiers is mounting. The most damning is a series of electronic text messages allegedly sent between Carvajal - who was not at Jamundí at the time - and his lieutenant on the ground immediately before the massacre. "Everything is set for tonight," reads one message leaked by authorities. "Get ready for the group to come with the chicken so you can get it," reads another, referring to the nickname of the civilian informant who was leading the police that day.

And now, one senior official close to the investigation says investigators have heard a tape recording of Carvajal speaking on the phone with narcotraffickers to arrange payment for his defense lawyers.

"Jamundí is the tip of the iceberg," says Professor Bagley, arguing the massacre is indicative of the serious gap between Plan Colombia's promise to train a modern, professional military and the realities of the day. The events of that May afternoon, he says, should serve as a serious wake-up call: "This is a disaster for [President] Uribe and Plan Colombia."

At Mi Casita, more than three months later, many of the patients remain traumatized by the massacre. One woman yells out "Police, police...open up!" at the slightest provocation. Another bites herself whenever she hears loud bangs. And Morales, the only eyewitness to the killings, hears the voices of the policemen crying out for mercy when he tries to sleep at night. "Was it my fault?" Morales asks, wringing his hands. "I talk to my saints and ask them for forgiveness."

Mr. Berrio, the administrator at Mi Casita tries to calm Morales, "We can't escape this war. And we can't win it either," he consoles the flustered man and himself at once. "But you did the best thing you could. You kept your head down. That's all any of us would have done."

• Coming next: Is Plan Colombia working? Why Diego Montoya Sánchez is worth $5 million to the FBI

He likes fast cars (but police seized his personal mini racetrack last year, along with 74 ranches and eight houses). He has a flare for the macabre (his men once ambushed a rival group and then piled the corpses in a pyramid on a road). And, he reportedly likes it when people call him "El Señor de la Guerra," or Mr. War.

Heavyset and gruff, Diego Montoya Sánchez is one of the reputed leaders of Colombia's Norte del Valle cartel. He has a $5 million bounty on his head and is on the FBI's "10 most wanted list" for drug trafficking, conspiracy to import with intent to deliver drugs to the US, money laundering, and racketeering.

In the late 1990s, the Norte del Valle cartel - named for a valley in western Colombia - trafficked about half of the cocaine sold in the US. Today, officials estimate that the cartel holds about 30 percent of the market.

For the past two years, the cartel has been riven by a brutal internal power struggle between Mr. Montoya and his rival Wilber Varela, a.k.a. "Jabon" or Soap. Each faction leader has turned to different sides of Colombia's civil war for support: Varela is reportedly allied with the guerrillas of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC). Montoya reportedly has ties to the right-wing paramilitaries.

House OKs New Gun-show Rules (RTD)

By Peter Hardin, TIMES-DISPATCH WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Richmond Times-Dispatch, September 27, 2006

ATF agents' tactics in Richmond area led to bill; Scott vote decried

WASHINGTON -- The House of Representatives yesterday passed a bill to revamp federal enforcement rules for gun dealers, born in part from complaints about agents' tactics at Richmond-area gun shows.

The bipartisan bill would give the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives more tools to punish federally licensed gun dealers who break U.S. firearm-sale rules. It was passed on a vote of 277-131.

Its chief proponents, including Virginia Rep. Robert C. Scott, D-3rd, labeled the bill a balanced approach to provide needed intermediate penalties, including civil penalties or a license suspension, that fall short of revoking a dealer's license.

Warnings and revocation of licenses are the only punishments for dealers under current law.

As many as 98 percent of gun dealers' federal violations now result in nothing more than a letter of reprimand, or a meeting with ATF officials in their offices, Scott said during debate of the bill Monday.

The bill "will result in improved, fair and meaningful enforcement of our gun laws," said Scott, who had teamed with Rep. Howard Coble, R-N.C., to draft the bill and push it to passage.

But foes painted the bill as potentially gutting the ATF's power to go after corrupt gun dealers.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., referred to correspondence from former ATF officials, including two former directors, opposing the bill.

"ATF already faces severe constraints in its ability to crack down on gun dealers who violate the law. [The bill] would further jeopardize ATF's ability to enforce the law against these rogue elements," former ATF officials wrote in a letter dated Friday.

They contended that a legal standard set in the bill for revoking gun dealers' licenses would be virtually impossible to meet.

"This is a misguided piece of legislation that allows a small minority of corrupt gun sellers to continue to sell guns to criminals without penalties," said Rep. Carolyn McCarthy, D-N.Y.

The National Rifle Association supported the bill while the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence fought it.

"Why Congressman Scott is part of this surprises and disappoints us," said Paul Helmke, president of the Brady Campaign.

Scott has compiled a generally liberal record. He is the senior Democrat on the House subcommittee on crime, terrorism and homeland security. Coble heads that panel.

At a subcommittee hearing earlier, complaints were lodged against ATF for questionable law-enforcement practices at gun shows in the Richmond area.

"Neither Mr. Scott nor I is interested in ham-stringing the ATF," Coble said Monday. "But I note for a fact that in some instances the ATF agents became heavy-handed, maybe even unruly, in the Virginia situation; I think this will address that problem."

Andrew Arulanandam, a spokesman for the NRA, recently called Scott's support for the bill "a testament to the legislation that this is, in fact, reform that is needed."

The bill also directs the inspector general for the Justice Department to review the ATF's gun-show enforcement program.

AP, September 27, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) - The local head of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives says he hopes to establish a permanent gang investigation field office here, part of a growing law enforcement response to gang activity statewide.

Kelvin Crenshaw, special agent in charge of the ATF's Seattle office, told The Seattle Times he plans to ask his bosses in Washington, D.C., this fall for permission to establish the gang office, which he said would mean more agents and funding for complex investigations.

The plan is part of a response to what law enforcement officials see as a recent increase in gang activity. In Seattle, a regional hub of such crime, 101 cases were referred to the police department's gang unit between Jan. 1 and Aug. 31 of this year - more than the 94 cases in all of 2005.

The ATF has been compiling a regional database of gang members, and last year formed a violent gang task force with members from the FBI, Seattle Police and the King County sheriff's office. Crenshaw's second-in-command, Doug Dawson, said the database will also help officials determine what cases meet the threshold for federal prosecution, determined in part by firearm use and the amount of drugs involved.

Meanwhile, the state attorney general's office has set out to conduct a statewide "threat assessment" under the belief that Western Washington gangs have been moving into Eastern Washington cities, said Chris Johnson, policy director for Attorney General Rob McKenna.

McKenna could suggest that legislators create sentencing enhancements for crimes committed by known gang members, Johnson said.

According to police and gang experts nationwide, increasing criminal sophistication, demand for drugs, demographics, migration patterns and generational conflicts have all played roles in the violence.

Quantifying any increase in gang-related violence is tough, though, because there isn't a nationally accepted definition of what constitutes a gang. Many law enforcement agencies, including the King County sheriff's office, don't categorize or track the number of crimes committed by suspected gang members.

That's because it's not illegal to be a gang member. Instead, many agencies focus on criminal behavior.

"I don't want to say gangs are running wild in the city, but I don't want to close an eye" to the issue either, Seattle Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske said.

"Gangs aren't just a Seattle problem - there's a lot of concern right now," both locally and nationally about rising levels of gang violence, Kerlikowske said.

Between 30 and 60 street gangs operate in Seattle and its suburbs, police estimate. Gentrification and housing costs have pushed gangs into cities like Kent, Auburn, Federal Way and SeaTac, where a growing number of suburban kids are being lured into the gang lifestyle, said Gabe Morales, a gang consultant from Des Moines who teaches police, corrections officials and local school district officials about gangs and gang-prevention strategies.

Also at play are turf wars involving so-called OGs - original gangsters - who are returning to business after a decade or more in prison and fighting with younger gang members, experts say.

An ongoing war between gang members in Seattle's Central Area and rivals in the Rainier Valley has featured such intergenerational fighting, said Morales and Lt. Eric Sano, who until last week was commander of the SPD's gang unit.

IMMIGRATION:

Supreme Court To Rule On Immigrant Car Theft (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to hear a California case to decide whether immigrants convicted of stealing a car must be deported.

A strict federal immigration reform law passed in 1996 says that immigrants, including permanent residents, who commit an "aggravated felony" in the U.S. must be sent home, regardless of how long they have lived here or whether they have a family and a job.

But the Justice Department and some lower courts have disagreed on which crimes, including auto theft, are aggravated felonies.

Next week, the Supreme Court will take up a separate South Dakota case to determine whether immigrants who are convicted of drug possession can be deported as felons. The outcome is expected to affect tens of thousands of immigrants across the country.

This week, the justices met for the first time since late June, and they announced they had agreed to hear nine of about 1,900 pending appeals, including the government's claim that auto thieves and their accomplices are guilty of a deportable crime.

The case before the court involves a California law on auto thefts, but government lawyers said all 50 states have similar measures.

Four years ago, Luis Alexander Duenas-Alvarez, a native of Peru who became a legal U.S. resident, pleaded guilty to stealing a 2002 Honda Accord in Marin County, near San Francisco, and was sentenced to three years in prison. Federal authorities took him into custody for deportation.

The 1996 law has a list of aggravated felonies that lead to deportation, including any theft that carries a prison sentence of more than a year.

Government lawyers contend that any immigrant convicted of auto theft in California should be deported under that law.

DOJ_NMG_0069864

But earlier this year, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed. The court ruled that the California law is too broad to fit the definition of theft in the federal law because it includes accomplices to auto theft.

The government counters that all states have laws that allow accomplices to be charged with auto theft.

In their appeal on behalf of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, government lawyers said the 9th Circuit was wrong on two points. First, Duenas-Alvarez stole the car and therefore was a thief. And second, Congress meant to include accomplices to the crime when it wrote the federal law.

The government said at least 8,000 deportation cases in the nine Western states in the 9th Circuit would be affected by the court's ruling. The oral argument in Gonzales vs. Duenas-Alvarez was set for Dec. 5.

The justices also said Tuesday they would reconsider the 9th Circuit Court's decision to reverse the death penalty that was given to an Arizona murderer who refused in 1990 to have mitigating evidence presented.

Once on Death Row, Jeffrey Landrigan, the murderer, appealed his sentence and claimed his lawyer failed to present mitigating evidence on his behalf. In March, the 9th Circuit agreed with his claim in a 9-2 decision.

In June, Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard asked the Supreme Court to take up the case, arguing that federal judges should defer to state courts in most instances. And in this case, the state judges concluded that the defendant, not his lawyer, was responsible for his plight. The high court will hear the case in January.

The justices also said they would consider reviving a Washington state law that shields school teachers from having their dues used for political purposes without their permission.

In the past, the court has said unionized workers can be forced to pay their fair share of the cost of bargaining with managers, but they had a right not to pay for political efforts. In 1992, Washington's voters adopted a measure that requires public employee unions to seek permission before any of a member's dues can be used for politics.

But earlier this year, the Washington Supreme Court said this requirement violated the union's free-speech rights. The state and several teachers appealed.

Although the case of Washington vs. Washington Education Association raises questions about politics and the First Amendment, the ruling is likely to affect only one state's law.

More Than Two Dozen People Detained On Fort Bragg (FAYOBS)

By Justin Willett, Staff writer

Fayetteville (NC) Observer, September 27, 2006

Fort Bragg officials this morning detained 28 people, mostly construction workers, as they tried to enter post with false or fraudulently obtained identification.

The operation — the second this year — was conducted at the All American Freeway access-control point between 6 and 8 a.m.

In July, 58 people were detained at the Knox Street and Randolph Street entrances to Fort Bragg.

Tom McCollum, a Fort Bragg spokesman, said the 28 were taken to a immigration detention center in Cary.

People caught in the sweep could be charged with presenting a false or fraudulently obtained federal or state identification and criminal trespassing, according to a statement about today's operation.

?C;If it is shown that employers knowingly hired these people, the employer can be cited with aiding and abetting and or conspiracy charges,?D; the statement said.

Fort Bragg's garrison commander can also bar contractors from working on post, McCollum said.

Following the July 18 sweep, all but 10 of the 58 people detained were charged with illegal entry into the United States. Six people received federal jail sentences in August, and the other 42 each pleaded guilty to a single charge related to their illegal status.

McCollum said that since July, Fort Bragg has detained 14 people trying to enter post with false or fraudulently obtained identification.

In the past year, Fort Bragg has detained 224 people, mostly construction workers, trying to enter the post under false pretenses, according to the Fort Bragg statement.

DOJ_NMG_0069865

Agencies involved in today's sweep included: Fort Bragg's Directorate of Security and Emergency Services, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, U.S. Marshals, the Defense Criminal Investigation Service, the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Raleigh.

U.S. Judge Orders Deportation Of 3 Egyptian Students Who Disappeared From University Exchange Program (FINDLAW/AP)

By Timberly Ross, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - OMAHA, Nebraska-Three Egyptian students who sparked a nationwide search when they failed to show up for a university exchange program last month were ordered deported Monday.

The students - Mohamed Ibrahim El Sayed El Moghazy, 20; Ahmed Refaat Saad El Moghazi El Laket, 19; and Moustafa Wagdy Moustafa El Gafary, 18 - had admitted they violated U.S. immigration laws and asked Judge James Fujimoto to allow them to return home voluntarily.

Fujimoto, who presided over the hearing via teleconference from Chicago, denied the request and ordered the three deported, citing their brief time in the United States, lack of long-term and family ties here and decision to flee immediately upon entering the country.

In the future, the three will need special permission to ever re-enter the U.S., which they would not have needed if they were allowed to leave voluntarily.

"Voluntary departure has been granted in thousands of other cases, and this one is not unique," the students' lawyer, Amy Peck, said after the decision was announced.

Peck has said the three said they feared they would be sent home if anyone in the group did not show up to the exchange program. She said when some students left the group after arriving in New York, her clients decided to go sightseeing in San Francisco. They then took a bus to Des Moines, Iowa, and used fake names, she said.

Peck did not know if they would appeal the decision.

The three were among 17 students from Mansoura University in Egypt invited to a monthlong exchange program at Montana State University. Only six students showed up to the program, prompting U.S. authorities to issue a nationwide search for the remaining 11 students. All were detained, but none were considered a terrorism risk.

Senators Criticize Border Security Measures (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The Republican architects of the Senate immigration bill criticized the border security measures under consideration in Congress as piecemeal and inadequate. Senators John McCain of Arizona, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina said they supported border security, including a measure to add fencing to the border with Mexico. But they said that such measures alone would fail to deal with the illegal residence in this country of about 11 million immigrants as well as labor shortages in particular industries. The senators called for an approach similar to the Senate bill, which would tighten border security, toughen penalties for employers who hire illegal immigrants, put most illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship and create a guest-worker plan to address labor shortages. They acknowledged that passage of such legislation was unlikely before the elections.

Senator Rejects Immigration Addition To Defense Bill (USAT/AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, The Associated Press

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — A senior GOP senator blocked Republican leaders Tuesday in their efforts to add immigration, handgun and Internet gambling measures to a defense bill.

Virginia Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, rejected requests from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and House Speaker Dennis Hastert to add the items to his bill on military pay.

Warner said in a memo to Frist he is “firmly opposed” to including unrelated measures in the defense bill.

Hastert wants to add to the defense bill a measure the House passed last week that would make it easier to deport illegal immigrants who are members of violent criminal street gangs.

“It's my hope the Senate will live up to its word so that we can send this measure to the president for his signature,” Hastert said.

Hastert also wanted to use the defense bill as a way to get a vote in the Senate on a House measure that would allow judges to carry handguns and bolster courthouse security. The proposal came in response to the murder of a Chicago federal judge's husband and mother last year.

Warner balked, saying he wanted to keep the defense bill bipartisan while U.S. troops are at war. Warner said he, along with Democrats and at least two other Republicans, would not sign off on the request.

Senate Democrats, including Minority Whip Dick Durbin, D-Ill., support tightening court security, but the House bill on judges carrying concealed weapons cooled their support.

Hastert said Tuesday that he has offered to drop the provision that would allow judges to carry a concealed weapon.

Frist has been pushing for the Internet gambling crackdown. Among other things, the provision would ban the use of credit cards, checks and other forms of payment to settle online wagers.

Other immigration measures passed by the House this month also have stalled as senators refused to add them to the Homeland Security spending bill. Among them are prison sentences for those who build or finance tunnels across U.S. borders, and a bill proposing a 700-mile fence.

States, Counties Begin To Enforce Immigration Law (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

CHARLOTTE -- Police here operated for years under what amounts to a "don't ask, don't tell" policy toward illegal immigrants.

As elsewhere in the United States, law enforcement officers did not check the immigration status of people they came into contact with, and in the vast majority of cases, a run-in with the law carried little threat of deportation.

But that accommodation for the burgeoning illegal population ended abruptly in April, when the Mecklenburg County sheriff's office began to enforce immigration law, placing more than 100 people a month into deportation proceedings. Some of them had been charged with violent crimes, others with traffic infractions.

The program takes one of the most aggressive stances in the United States toward illegal immigrants, and officials in scores of communities, including Herndon and Loudoun County, have been considering adopting their own version. The House earlier this month was weighing a measure "reaffirming" the authority of local law enforcement agencies to arrest people on suspicion of violating immigration laws.

Some Latino leaders say the program here is contributing to a discriminatory climate in which Hispanic drivers feel as if they are being "hunted" by police. And some law enforcement agencies elsewhere have shied away from enforcing immigration laws, saying that doing so would rupture any trust they have developed in Latino neighborhoods.

But advocates see it as a way to catch illegal immigrants who slip through porous federal enforcement measures and then run afoul of state or local police.

Mecklenburg County Sheriff Jim Pendergraph says there should be little sympathy for illegal immigrants caught by his program: They have already broken the law once by being here illegally, and then been arrested on suspicion of another crime.

"When any of them cross that border without proper documentation, they've violated the law -- however insignificant it may seem to some people," he said. "I've heard sad stories about folks wanting to come up here and have a better life and earn money for their family. I've arrested bank robbers who've had the same excuse."

While the program has led to the removal of many illegal immigrants charged with felonies, people arrested for lesser charges such as traffic violations are also subject to deportation. That, according to Hispanic leaders, has created a constant worry for people who are in the United States illegally and now fear deportation after a simple traffic stop.

Many illegal immigrants lack valid licenses. As a result, they now risk not only arrest but also deportation whenever they drive.

"It's tense, very tense," said Angeles Ortega-Moore, director of the Latin American Coalition in Charlotte. "It used to be everybody here loved the Latinos. They would say, 'We like you more than the blacks.' Now we're like the Big Bad Wolf."

"The law enforcement community is split on this issue," said Gene Voegtlin, legislative counsel for the International Association of Chiefs of Police. The local agencies against enforcing immigration law "are concerned about the chilling effect it will have on immigrants' cooperation with law enforcement," he said.

In Mecklenburg County, about 1,200 foreign-born people have been arrested since April, on charges ranging from traffic violations and trespassing to sex crimes, and nearly 600 have been found to be here illegally.

Among those snared earlier this month was Guadalupe Lara, an 18-year-old Mexican carpenter.

The fifth of eight children born to farmworkers in Queretaro, he walked across the border when he was 16 to find work. Two years later, he has only a wispy beard and stands 5-foot-3.

He makes $7.50 an hour and lives with four others in a small, sparsely furnished apartment. Though they lack beds, they have a television on which Lara watches his favorite telenovela, "Heridas de Amor." He sends money home monthly and calls home every week.

"It's difficult," he said in Spanish. "When I call they say 'How are you?' I say 'I am fine.' " On Monday night, Lara was pulled over by police after buying a pack of cigarettes. He was not drunk but had an open bottle of beer in the car. He also lacked a license. He was arrested and when asked admitted he had no papers.

Had he been detained elsewhere, his illegal status may not have mattered.

But in Mecklenburg, two sergeants and 10 deputies at the jail are trained to handle immigration infractions, running checks in databases and holding people in custody if necessary.

Some of those arrested face immediate deportation. Some are held on bond pending an immigration hearing. Lara was relatively lucky. Because he had no prior immigration or criminal charges, he was given a notice to appear before an immigration judge in Atlanta and released. He is likely to be ordered deported.

Lara says police now unfairly target Latinos. More than 90 percent of the illegal immigrants discovered in Mecklenburg are from Latin America.

"The police are just looking for problems with Hispanics," Lara said. "They know we don't have driver's licenses -- we can't get them -- and so they pull us over."

Liliana "La Chula" Ramos, a host on local Spanish radio, said: "A lot of people here are very afraid because they think the police will pull them over for anything. It's very difficult for people to get licenses now, and people have to go to work, so they're out there driving."

Philip Turtletaub, a Charlotte immigration lawyer, says he sometimes receives six or seven calls a day from relatives of illegal immigrants caught by the program. He tells them not to waste their money.

"Most people I can't do anything for," he said.

While he ventured no opinion on the program's fairness, he said he thinks it could make life as an illegal immigrant in the region so uncomfortable that fewer illegal immigrants would choose to live there.

"They're putting the pressure on these people. They're scaring them. People say we can't deport 10 million. But you don't have to. If you deport enough of them, others will go back voluntarily because they don't want to live in these conditions."

Besides Mecklenburg, six other state and local law enforcement agencies have started similar programs in recent years. A dozen more are being worked out with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. And in the past three months, hundreds of state and local departments have inquired about similar efforts, said Robert J. Hines, who heads the program for the ICE.

"When you are removing the criminal element from the community, it's hard to point a finger and say it's a bad thing," Hines said.

Loudoun County Sheriff Stephen O. Simpson said his department is considering participating. Early this morning, the Herndon Town Council was to vote on Police Chief Toussaint E. Summers Jr.'s request to apply for such a program.

Officials in Alexandria, Arlington, Fairfax and Prince William said they are not considering the idea, and police officials in suburban Maryland say there is lukewarm interest in deputizing officers to enforce immigration laws.

"In the Montgomery County area, we've taken more the track that we celebrate diversity," said Gaithersburg Police Chief Mary Ann Viverette, who is also the president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police. Immigration is "not an issue we want to enforce."

In federal testimony from August, Pendergraph, the Mecklenburg County sheriff, said "political correctness" is preventing some communities from adopting the program, and that "will eventually be the downfall of this country if someone doesn't wake up."

Like much of the mid-Atlantic region, Charlotte has seen a rapid rise in the number of Latino immigrants over the past 15 years, many of them here illegally. Between 2000 and 2005, the estimated number of illegal immigrants in North Carolina rose 38 percent, from 260,000 to 360,000, according to a Department of Homeland Security report.

The influx, particularly conspicuous in a metropolis clinging to its small-town past, has caused ripples of concern.

"Texas, New York and California might be used to large influxes of illegal immigrants -- but we're not," said Mecklenburg County Commissioner Bill James, who favors stronger enforcement. "James Carville had it right: We're just Mayberry with a major airport."

Local support for broad enforcement coalesced in July 2005 after a truck driven by an illegal immigrant whose blood-alcohol level was nearly triple the legal limit, hit a car, killing a local teacher and leaving the teacher's wife in a vegetative state. The accident resulted in Ramiro Gallegos's fifth impaired-driving charge in five years -- and led to the new enforcement policy.

"No more excuses," U.S. Rep. Sue Myrick (R) said at a news conference at the time, calling for tougher enforcement. "You're drunk. You're driving. You're illegal. You're deported. Period."

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Et tu, ACLU?

Things are fractious indeed at the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). More than 30 longtime ACLU heavyweights are calling for the ouster of the organization's leadership, claiming it failed to uphold "principles" it inflicts upon everyone else.

"We come together now, reluctantly but resolutely, not to injure the ACLU, but to restore its integrity and its consistency of principle," the group of former board members, staffers, donors and a lawyer said in a mission statement, according to the New York Times yesterday.

The group is irked that the ACLU checked its staffers against government lists of suspected terrorists during a fundraising drive, used data-mining to profile donors and planned to monitor staff e-mails. Criticism has been focused on Executive Director Anthony Romero and board President Nadine Strossen.

"It's clear that the organization's leadership has let it drift away from its core principles," said David Goldberger, an Ohio State University law professor who once defended the right of Nazis to march through a Jewish suburb of Chicago.

An ACLU spokeswoman says the group still fights "aggressively for the principles of free speech." The disgruntled protesters are certainly exercising theirs: They have set up a Web site -- www.savetheaclu.org -- which went live yesterday.

"It is a home for ACLU loyalists who have been shut out of the organization," said Ira Glasser, ACLU director from 1978 to 2001.

Round two

In the big Wallace vs. Bubba match this weekend, "Fox News Sunday" garnered its best ratings in three years, according to Nielsen, and the two combatants -- host Chris Wallace and former President Bill Clinton -- got a lot of buzz. Both political parties now claim the squabble "energized" their respective bases.

The match even attracted those who make wagers.

BetCRIS Sportsbook has posted the odds on whether Mr. Clinton will duke it out again with Mr. Wallace. The New York-based online betting group reveals that odds are running 4-to-1 that Mr. Clinton will return for another bout in the next 90 days, 3-to-1 in the next 120 days, 2-to-1 within 150 days and 1-to-1 within the next six months.

"Politicians are trained in the art of keeping cool and levelheaded," spokesman Mickey Richardson said. "When the opportunity arises to watch a former president become so easily roused, you can't help but stare. I would like to see him go head-to-head with Chris Wallace again. I just don't think he will."

Moral relativism

The Republican candidate for Arizona governor says the state's new September 11 memorial should be torn down, calling it an insult to America.

"It reminds us of American failings and American mistakes, real and imagined, before and after 9/11. This memorial is a tribute to moral relativism," Len Munsil said yesterday, according the Associated Press.

The memorial features such quotations as, "You don't win battles of terrorism with more battles" and "Erroneous U.S. air strike kills 46 Afghanistan civilians," among other things.

"Only in the relativistic context of left-wing protesters holding 'Bush is a terrorist' signs do such inscriptions make any sense," said Mr. Munsil, founder of the Center for Arizona Politics.

"It explains why despite the outpouring of public prayer and the bipartisan singing of 'God Bless America' on the steps of the U.S. Capitol, there is not a single mention of God in this memorial," Mr. Munsil said.

"I'm just sorry that they're trying to politicize 9/11. That's just wrong," Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano said.

Adios, Republicans?

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson says neither party will win votes at the ballot box this year on the issue of illegal border crossing.

"You don't get any votes on this either way," Mr. Richardson said during a meeting with the press in Washington yesterday, reports The Washington Times' Eric Pfeiffer. "In the end, voters look at bread-and-butter issues."

Mr. Richardson, a Democrat who is Hispanic and considering a run for the White House in 2008, said that any potential gains for Republicans will be offset by Hispanic voters who feel alienated by the party and an overall "2 percent surge" at the ballot box in the favor of Democrats over issues such as Iraq.

"President Bush did make some inroads with Hispanics in 2004," Mr. Richardson said. "The surge in Hispanics going Republican was because of President Bush, not because of any policies."

Mr. Richardson also said he doesn't expect immigration opponents to reward Republicans this fall, since Congress is not likely to pass an immigration-reform bill before it leaves Washington for the campaign trail. "When you control the White House and Congress, you only have one party to blame," he said.

Taxing situation

Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, said yesterday he wouldn't rule out killing any of President Bush's tax cuts in order to alleviate the dreaded Alternative Minimum Tax and balance the budget, Congress Daily reported.

Mr. Rangel stipulated that "everything has to be on the table" when considering which tax cuts must go, and when asked if he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum, he answered, "No question about it."

His remarks caused an immediate outburst among Republicans, claiming the Democrat had just admitted his party will indeed raise taxes if it comes to power in November.

"This is the first time since Walter Mondale that a national Democrat leader has openly called for across-the-board tax hikes," said Jonathan Collegio of the National Republican Congressional Committee. "In a single breath, Rangel made the notion of a Democrat Congress into a profoundly local pocketbook issue."

A Kinky moment

Former Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura is campaigning for Kinky Friedman, who aspires to be the first independent candidate to win the Texas governorship since Sam Houston 150 years ago.

"Do Texans have the guts to elect this guy?" Mr. Ventura asked a raucous San Antonio crowd yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0069870

"Texans love the Kinkster," Mr. Friedman chimed in, according to the Minneapolis Star-Tribune.

The two swaggering politicos have both received campaigning advice from Dean Barkley and Bill Hillsman, who created ads for Mr. Ventura and the late Paul Wellstone.

"Both Kinky and I shoot from the hip," Mr. Ventura countered, brandishing his newly brunette, shoulder-length braids. "But I'm the only former governor in the United States of America who can look like this."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House OKs $70B For Iraq, Afghanistan (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, September 27, 2006

Just days before leaving Washington to campaign, Congress is moving to provide $70 billion more for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan as part of a record $448 billion Pentagon budget.

With Iraq alone costing about $8 billion a month, another infusion of funds will be needed next spring. Opinion polls show the war continues to be unpopular with voters, but even Democratic opponents of the war generally embrace the Pentagon measure, since it provides funding for body armor and other support for U.S. troops overseas.

The House passed the Pentagon appropriations bill Tuesday night on a 394-22 vote, and the Senate could clear the bill for President Bush as early as Wednesday or Thursday.

The House-Senate compromise bill provides $378 billion for core Pentagon programs, about a 5 percent increase, though not quite as much as Bush requested. The $70 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan is a down payment on war costs the White House has estimated will hit $110 billion for the budget year beginning Oct. 1.

With final passage of the bill, Congress will have approved $507 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and heightened security at overseas military bases since the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The growing price tag of the Iraq conflict is partly driven by the need to repair and replace military equipment destroyed in battle or simply worn out in harsh, dusty conditions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Almost $23 billion was approved for Army, Marine Corps and National Guard equipment such as helicopters, armored Humvees, Bradley Armored Fighting Vehicles, radios and night-vision equipment.

Another $1.9 billion is for new jammers to counter improvised explosive devices in Iraq and Afghanistan and $1 billion is provided for body armor and other personal protective gear.

The measure includes a Democratic-sponsored provision against establishing permanent military bases in Iraq. GOP leaders dropped identical language from an Iraq funding bill this June.

"If the president had told us the truth, that Iraq and Saddam Hussein ... presented no real threat to us, that there was no likelihood of weapons of mass destruction, that there was no connection to al-Qaida ... would this Congress have voted for war?" said Rep. Jerrold Nadler, D-N.Y. "I don't think so."

"Is the world better or worse off without (Hussein)?" said Rep. Tom Cole, R-Okla. "I think it's better, and it took American action."

The bill would be the first of 11 spending bills to clear Congress for the new budget year.

So little progress has been made on other bills that the Pentagon measure also carries a stopgap funding bill to keep open, through Nov. 17, agencies whose funding bills won't have passed. Only the homeland security measure is expected to also pass before Congress leaves Washington to campaign.

The core bill contains $86 billion for personnel costs, enough to support 482,000 Army soldiers and 175,000 Marines. That would provide for a 2.2 percent pay increase for the military as Bush requested in his February budget.

Another $120 billion would go to operations and maintenance costs, slightly less than the Pentagon request. And $81 billion is provided to buy new weapons, with another $76 billion dedicated to research and development costs.

That's still not enough for the White House, which requested $4 billion more. But House appropriators diverted that money to ease cuts in domestic programs. Earlier this year, the Senate passed a version shifting $9 billion to domestic programs but backed off in the face of a White House veto threat.

The sprawling measure contains good news for lawmakers from Maine, California and Missouri, among others. The bill includes $2.6 billion for two super-modern Navy DD(X) destroyers. That is significant because it would allow Bath Iron Works in Maine and Northrop Grumman's Ingalls Shipbuilding in Mississippi to build one ship each.

A House-passed defense policy bill had called for only one DD(X) ship, to be built in Mississippi.

The measure also almost triples Bush's request for eight C-17 cargo planes, providing for 22 of the aircraft, which are built in Long Beach, Calif. Several components are manufactured at Boeing's St. Louis-based defense company.

But Lockheed Martin's F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, which is assembled in Fort Worth, Texas, would face cuts. Bush requested five planes, but lawmakers cut that back to two, though funds are provided for advanced purchases of parts for 12 more.

House OKs $70B For Iraq, Afghanistan (WP/AP)

By Andrew Taylor, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Despite intense partisan divisions over the course of the Iraq war, the House on Tuesday easily approved $70 billion more for military operations there and in Afghanistan. Lawmakers also adopted a record $448 billion budget for the Pentagon.

With Iraq alone costing about $8 billion a month, another infusion of money will be needed next spring.

The House passed the Pentagon appropriations bill by a 394-22 vote Tuesday night, and the Senate is due to cat before adjourning this weekend for the fall campaign.

The House-Senate compromise bill provides $378 billion for core Pentagon programs, about a 5 percent increase, though not quite as much as President Bush asked for. The $70 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan is a down payment on war costs the White House has estimated will hit $110 billion for the budget year beginning Oct. 1.

With final passage of the bill, Congress will have approved $507 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and heightened security at overseas military bases since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, according to the Congressional Research Service.

"If the president had told us the truth, that Iraq and Saddam Hussein ... presented no real threat to us, that there was no likelihood of weapons of mass destruction, that there was no connection to al-Qaida ... would this Congress have voted for war?" said Jerrold Nadler, D-N.Y. "I don't think so."

"Is the world better or worse off without (Hussein)?" asked Tom Cole, R-Okla. "I think it's better, and it took American action."

Opinion polls indicate the war continues to be unpopular with voters, but even Democratic opponents of the war generally embraced the Pentagon measure, which provides funding for body armor and other support for U.S. troops overseas.

The growing price tag of the Iraq conflict is partly driven by the need to repair and replace military equipment worn out in harsh, dusty conditions in Iraq and Afghanistan or destroyed in battle. Almost $23 billion was approved for Army, Marine Corps and National Guard equipment such as helicopters, armored Humvees, Bradley armored fighting vehicles, radios and night-vision equipment.

Lawmakers allotted $1.9 billion for new jammers to counter improvised explosive devices in Iraq and Afghanistan and $1 billion is provided for body armor and other personal protective gear.

The measure includes a Democratic-sponsored provision against establishing permanent military bases in Iraq. GOP leaders dropped identical language from an Iraq funding bill this June.

The bill would be the first of 11 spending bills to clear Congress for the new budget year.

So little progress has been made on other bills that the Pentagon measure also carries a stopgap funding bill to keep open through Nov. 17 agencies whose funding bills won't have passed. Only the homeland security measure is expected to also pass before Congress leaves Washington to campaign.

The core bill contains $86 billion for personnel costs, enough to support 482,000 Army soldiers and 175,000 Marines. That would provide for a 2.2 percent pay increase for the military, as Bush requested in his February budget.

The bill provides $120 billion for operations and maintenance costs, just less than the Pentagon request. And $81 billion goes for procurement of new weapons, with $76 billion dedicated to research and development costs.

That's still not enough for the White House, which requested $4 billion more. But House appropriators diverted that money to ease cuts in domestic programs. Earlier this year, the Senate passed a version shifting $9 billion to domestic programs but backed off in the face of a White House veto threat.

The sprawling measure contains good news for lawmakers from Maine, California and Missouri, among others. The bill includes $2.6 billion for two super-modern Navy DD(X) destroyers. That is significant because it would allow Bath Iron Works in Maine and Northrop Grumman's Ingalls Shipbuilding in Mississippi to build one ship each.

A House-passed defense policy bill had called for only one DD(X) ship, to be built in Mississippi.

The measure also almost triples Bush's request for eight C-17 cargo planes, providing for 22 of the aircraft, which are built in Long Beach, Calif. Several components are manufactured at Boeing's St. Louis-based defense company.

But Lockheed Martin's F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, which is assembled in Fort Worth, Texas, would face cuts. Bush requested five planes, but lawmakers cut that back to two, though funds are provided for advanced purchases of parts for 12 more.

Democrats Delay GOP Bills In Senate (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Senate Democrats are blocking Republicans from passing several of their top legislative priorities this week, including new border fencing, two of the Bush administration's key counterterrorism programs and a drastic reduction in the estate tax.

"The legislative corner they've painted themselves in is very difficult," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, told reporters yesterday.

Democrats, while accusing Republicans of presiding over a "do-nothing" Congress, are slow-walking legislation but appear unlikely to kill outright any of the security measures as elections approach.

Asked yesterday whether Democrats will take advantage of Senate rules that allow lawmakers to demand 30 hours of debate on each bill, Mr. Reid replied: "Well, unless there's some agreement, we're going to go ahead and do the 30 hours."

Democrats have been far less successful in delaying action in the House, where priority measures either have been passed or are expected to be this week.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, replied by saying, "It may be a do-nothing Congress for Mr. Hoyer and the Democrats because by and large they stand on the sidelines and do nothing."

Last night, the House was able to pass, on a 394-22 vote, the military appropriations bill. The proposal allocates $448 billion: $70 billion for the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq and $378 billion for general defense spending. The Senate is scheduled to pass the bill this week, before it adjourns for the November elections.

Democrats spent much of yesterday discussing the National Intelligence Estimate, which determined that the war in Iraq is fueling terrorism worldwide.

"It's obvious that Republicans are trying to shift the focus away from the administration's failures in Iraq to other issues," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, said at a press conference. "They may not have a plan to complete, successfully, the mission in Iraq, but they do have a plan to win elections here at home."

Mrs. Clinton was asked about the "Fox News Sunday" interview with her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who responded angrily to a question from host Chris Wallace about whether he could have done more to stop Osama bin Laden from launching a terrorist strike on the United States.

"I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks," she said. "All you have to do is read the 9/11 commission [report] to know what he and his administration did to protect Americans and prevent terrorist attacks against our country."

She leveled a pointed attack on the Bush administration for its response to a classified report before the September 11 attacks titled "Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States."

"I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States,' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team," she said.

Reid Sees New Beginning (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

With the clock still running on the 109th Congress, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is looking ahead to the next session, when he expects to have a stronger hand to play and share more in common with his Republican counterpart.

In a wide-ranging interview, Reid said he has high expectations for both the upcoming midterm elections and the 110th Congress itself. He also expressed optimism about working with the man all but certain to be the next Senate Republican leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.).

His outlook is bright enough that Reid, speaking in his Capitol office, said he's planning to talk to McConnell in the coming days about working together to restore a level of comity to the Senate that he believes has been lacking in the reign of Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

"Prior to the Nov. 7 election, I'm going to reach out to Mitch," Reid said. "I think what we should do when we get back here is sit down on a bipartisan basis and see if we can start doing some things like we used to do around here."

Reid's veiled condemnation is a clear indicator of his disdain, not for Frist the man, but rather for the current Majority Leader's style. Frist spent just eight years in the chamber before becoming leader and, unlike many of his predecessors, has shown a penchant for taking risks in passing legislation, often sending controversial measures to the floor without the certainty of having the 60 votes necessary to beat back a filibuster.

"As a person, I like Bill Frist," Reid said. "I think he's in public service for the right reasons. But I felt his lack of an institutional memory, knowledge of the Senate, didn't bode well in my opinion."

While Frist has received mixed marks in his tenure, Reid isn't without his critics, either. As the foremost brake on a Republican-dominated government, he has established a reputation during his two years as Minority Leader for tossing aside bipartisanship as well when it was convenient, preventing bills from coming to the floor and dropping procedural surprises on his colleagues.

Republicans say they are still reeling from Reid's infamous memorandum earlier this year questioning the ethics of 33 GOP Senators. While Reid later apologized, aides and Senators still insist the move went over the line and has not been forgotten.

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said it is easy to blame Frist or McConnell — as the leaders of the majority party — for allowing relations across the aisle to deteriorate. But Thune argued that they have consistently made a good-faith effort to work with Democrats, and Reid holds the power to change things come January.

"It's largely up to him," Thune said. "He's in a position to throw grenades and blow things up or he's in a position to make things work."

"The issue is not Bill Frist's institutional knowledge or whether or not he could get things done," added a Senate GOP leadership aide. "The issue is that Democrats — since George Bush was elected president and throughout Bill Frist's tenure — never acknowledged Republicans were the governing party."

It remains to be seen if Reid and his fellow Senate Democrats will enjoy a more civil atmosphere with McConnell next session, but at the very least, Reid may find a character connection with the prospective GOP leader.

Both Reid and McConnell are in their fourth term in the Senate, and worked their way up in the chamber as quiet operators known more for their poker faces than their charisma and love of the spotlight. Reid, like McConnell, considers himself a creature of the Senate, and is at times more obsessed with procedure than partisanship.

"I believe he has an institutional understanding — having been here a long time in the Senate," Reid said. "I think that will make my job more meaningful because Sen. Frist did not have an institutional knowledge of the Senate."

By any measure, Reid's first two years as Minority Leader haven't been easy.

"It's a difficult job anytime you have a diverse group like the Democratic Caucus," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), adding that Reid has won his party's respect and admiration across the board.

Minority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.), the chamber's No. 2 Democrat, said Reid, who succeeded then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle (S.D.) after a stunning electoral loss, has certainly brought his own style to the top Democratic post. But Durbin said Reid has proven his worth, deserving credit for stopping Republican efforts to reform Social Security and bar the use of the filibuster on judicial nominations by invoking the so-called nuclear option.

"I'm amazed by how well he brought us together, and how quickly we started working as a unit again," Durbin said.

Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee chairman and one of Reid's closest Senate allies, likened Reid to former President Harry Truman, calling him strong, loyal and direct.

"Nobody can work with the other side of the aisle like Harry Reid," Schumer said. "He knows the rules of the floor, his word is good and he understands you have to be bipartisan to get things done."

Despite his colleagues' confidence, Reid won't grade his own performance to this point, and is even loath to talk about individual successes and failures. But ask the veteran Nevada Democrat about the challenges he's faced, and he doesn't hesitate — even appearing shaken as he discusses what he calls the lowest point in his 20-year Senate career — Frist's threat last year to invoke the nuclear option and force up-or-down votes on judicial nominees. That standoff, Reid said, trumps all other legislative fights he had, on or off the floor.

"That was more than me, more than the Democratic Caucus. I thought that was an attack on our Constitution," Reid said. "I frankly have to tell you that I lost so much respect for my counterparts in the Republican Senate leadership as a result of that. ... I will never, ever forget what they tried to do to our country."

The winner of the nuclear option battle differs depending on whom you ask, but in the end Reid believes the minority came out the victor even though he "gave up some bad judges." In the end, a bipartisan group of moderate Senators dubbed the "Gang of 14" brokered the deal to keep the filibuster option intact while advancing a handful of controversial nominees.

Looking ahead to Nov. 7, Reid predicted that if the election were held today, Democrats would pick up five seats, just shy of the six needed to take control of the chamber. The entire election has turned on the Iraq War, Reid said, and public unrest over the conflict has given voters new reason to look to Democrats, and their agenda, as an alternative.

"I am more optimistic than I was six months ago," Reid said. "I've never said we'd take control of the Senate ... . It's a heavy, heavy lift. We realize that."

But taking a snapshot of today's political landscape, Reid said he believes Senate Democrats have a solid shot to pick up GOP-held seats in Pennsylvania, Missouri, Ohio, Montana and Rhode Island. Three others are potentially in play including Virginia, Tennessee and Arizona, he said.

On the Democratic side, Reid sees few windows for the GOP to knock off incumbents, but he did concede there is at least one vulnerable Democratic Senator this cycle, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.). Menendez, appointed in January to finish out the term of now-Gov. Jon Corzine, is facing an ever-more competitive bid to stave off GOP challenger, state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.

A self-described pessimist, Reid said he refuses to over-hype Democrats chances this November, nor will he entertain the possibility that his party could win the Senate and put him in charge of the chamber. But he does say that if not this cycle, 2008 will be the year of the Senate Democrat.

"We're in really good shape for the next election," Reid said. "We're going to get the majority. It's a question of whether we do it this time or next time."

Next cycle could be Reid's best and worst chapter, given at least six of his Senate Democrats are eyeing a run at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. Keeping his Caucus together will be more of a test in the 110th, but at least for now, Reid says Democrats have rallied as a unit — even with the constant media frenzy surrounding Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

"To this point, to be very honest with you and I say this candidly, I just think it hasn't been a problem," he said.

There has even been talk that Reid has offered up his own job as the Democratic leader to Clinton if she would agree to abandon an anticipated campaign for the White House. Those rumors — perpetuated in some blogs and by some political observers — are "just ridiculous," according to Reid.

Foolish or not, the gossip persists, but Reid insists he will not weigh in on his party's nominating process. Reid says he's talked to each of the would-be presidents about their plans, but none has asked for his endorsement and he isn't going to give it.

"I'm available to whomever wants to talk to me about the Nevada caucuses," Reid said. "But I'm not going to pick sides no matter how I feel personally."

"I don't think it would set well with those people that I don't endorse," Reid added. "I try to be fair to everybody.

Our Pathetic Congress (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

Little has been accomplished, too much will be left hanging and what was done was often done badly.

THE FINAL DAYS of any Congress are never pretty, as lawmakers scramble to finish a string of bills while getting out of town as early as possible to hit the campaign trail. After 37 years in Washington — 18 elections — we are pretty well inured to these shenanigans. But even those of us with strong stomachs are getting indigestion from the farcical end of the 109th Congress, slated for early Saturday.

This Congress hit the ground stumbling and has not lifted itself into an upright position. With few accomplishments and an overloaded agenda, it is set to finish its tenure with the fewest number of days in session in our lifetimes, falling well below 100 days this year.

This new modern record is even more staggering when one realizes that more than 25 of those days had no votes scheduled before 6:30 p.m., making them half- or quarter-days at best. The typical workweek in Congress (when there is a week spent in Washington) starts late Tuesday evening and finishes by noon Thursday. No wonder satirist Mark Russell closes many of his shows by telling his audiences what members of Congress tell their colleagues every Wednesday: "Have a nice weekend."

This part-time Congress has other parallels to the famous "Do-Nothing 80th Congress" that Harry Truman ran against successfully in 1948. The output of the 109th is pathetic measured against its predecessors and considering its priorities, which included a comprehensive immigration bill, tax reform and the research and development tax credit, lobbying and ethics reform, healthcare costs and insurance coverage, trade agreements, procedures for the detention and trial of suspected terrorists, and regulations for the oversight of domestic wiretaps, among many others. With just days to go before Congress adjourns and the fiscal year begins, not a single one of the 11 appropriations bills that make up the range of government programs has been enacted into law.

But the big problem with this Congress is not what it didn't do, it is what it did, and did badly. As of Tuesday, there were three must-pass pieces of legislation pending: defense and homeland security appropriations and the annual Department of Defense authorization. Each year, when the few must-pass bills move forward, there is a major temptation to throw on all kinds of extraneous provisions; when lawmakers can identify a train that is both leaving the station and sure to reach its destination, everyone has baggage they try to toss on board. Each year, responsible party leaders resist most of these measures, to preserve the integrity of the process and to keep shoddy bills with no vetting and no broad support from either being railroaded or inserted surreptitiously.

This year, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) has vowed to protect the defense authorization bill — but House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has other ideas. Hastert says he will kill the bill, doing damage to the Department of Defense and conceivably to troops in the field, unless Warner and his fellow senators cave and tack on an entire federal court security bill and another House anti-immigration bill.

The anti-immigration bill would allow indefinite detention of illegal immigrants protected under political asylum provisions, and it would deny court access to many. Hastert and his fellow House Republicans have refused to say exactly what they will include in the 300-page court security bill, but by most insider accounts, it will include not just commendable, bipartisan provisions to protect judges and law enforcement officials from threats but provisions to federalize the death penalty for murders of law enforcement officials, judicial employees or state and local employees, bypassing the law in states that have no death penalty.

It also reportedly would sharply restrict habeas corpus by, for the first time, singling out a special class of victims (judges and police officers); bypass hearings for juveniles charged with gang-related offenses and automatically have them tried as adults; and allow judges and prosecutors to carry concealed weapons, even where banned by state law.

Most of these measures have had no hearings — or cursory ones — much less debate or votes by the full House or Senate. Many are sharply opposed by states, which complain about the federal government trampling their laws and sovereignty.

IF THIS WERE ONE isolated instance of a Congress pushing through sloppy and ill-considered legislation to score political points before an election, we would wince but move on. But this breach of the normal legislative process is all too typical of today's Congress. Over the last five years, Congress has abandoned the web of rules and norms that have long governed how a bill is considered, how votes take place and how outcomes are decided. The infamous three-hour vote to pass the Medicare prescription drug bill two years ago — a vote supposed to last 15 minutes — stretched from 3 a.m. to 6 a.m. It was held open until the leaders could squeeze out enough votes to make a majority and resulted in several members, including then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, being rebuked by the Ethics Committee. But the truth is, rigging the rules for partisan advantage has become routine.

To be sure, efforts to close off debate and play hardball when votes are tight is not new; Democrats played these games when they were in the majority in the 1980s and early 1990s. But abuses of the regular order that used to be occasional and average — a six on a scale from one to 10 — are now chronic and sometimes hit 11.

The framers wanted Congress to move slowly and deliberately. But today, it is common to spring on the House and Senate a 1,000-page bill that has not been through any vetting process. With little notice and no time for anyone to read the bill, much less absorb or analyze it, with no amendments allowed, the leadership demands a party-line, up-or-down vote. This is a formula for poor oversight and worse law.

This November, will the public demand more from Congress, the first branch of government and the linchpin of American democracy?

Spending Data Going Online With New Law (USAT)

USA Today, September 27, 2006

President Bush signed legislation to create an online database for tracking about $1 trillion in government spending on grants and contracts. The law is intended to prevent wasteful spending by opening the federal budget to greater scrutiny. The law calls for the data to be online by Jan. 1, 2008. Budget information has been available to the public, but the website will make it easier to access. “This legislation will give the American people a new tool to hold their government accountable,” Bush said. Information on earmarks will be “just a few clicks away,” he said. Earmarks are items that lawmakers put into bills to target spending to a company or project in their districts. Citizens Against Government Waste, a taxpayer watchdog group, said such projects in fiscal year 2006 bills cost $29 billion.

Bush demurs on Clinton criticism

President Bush dismissed as “finger-pointing” criticism from former president Bill Clinton that the Bush administration hadn't been vigorous enough in going after al-Qaeda and its leader, Osama bin Laden. “We'll let history judge,” Bush said when asked at a news conference about Clinton's comments. Clinton said on Fox News Sunday that he left the new administration “battle plans” for going into Afghanistan, overthrowing the Taliban and searching for bin Laden. “They did not try” before the 9/11

Seized-property bill fails in House

The House fell short of the votes needed to pass legislation that would have given people faster access to federal courts when fighting state or local governments that have seized their property. The vote was 234-172 in favor of the bill, but it needed a two-thirds majority under the special rules used to bring the measure to the floor. The vote was largely along party lines: Republicans in favor and Democrats opposed.

New Law To Create Online Budget Database (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, September 26, 2006

President Bush said Tuesday that Americans will now be able to "Google their tax dollars," as he signed a law to create an online database for tracking about $1 trillion in government spending on grants and contracts.

The law is aimed preventing wasteful spending by opening the federal budget to greater scrutiny. The information is already available, but the Web site would make it easier for those who aren't experts on the process to see how taxpayer dollars are being spent.

"Information on earmarks will no longer be hidden deep in the pages of a federal budget bill, but just a few clicks away," Bush said in a signing ceremony. "This legislation will give the American people a new tool to hold their government accountable for spending decisions. When those decisions are made in broad daylight, they will be wiser and they will be more restrained."

Bush signed the bill in the Old Executive Office Building next to the White House, sitting before lawmakers and Internet bloggers who helped get it through Congress.

Senate leaders had tried to pass the bill in early August but Rep. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., blocked passage by lodging secret "holds" on the bill. The bloggers tracked down those responsible for the delay and the senators let the bill advance under the pressure.

The law calls for the Web site to go online by Jan. 1, 2008. It will list federal grants and contracts greater than $25,000, except for those classified for national security reasons.

"The Web site will allow our citizens to go online, type in the name of any company, association, or state or locality and find out exactly what grants and contracts they've been awarded," Bush said.

"By allowing Americans to Google their tax dollars, this new law will help taxpayers demand greater fiscal discipline," Bush said.

Bush Signs Bill To Create Spending Database (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday signed legislation creating a Web-based searchable database of federal government spending, calling it a first step in making the government more accountable to taxpayers.

The database, championed by bloggers, taxpayer groups and editorial writers nationwide, will allow people to search records for hundreds of billions of dollars worth of federal contracts and grants -- or, as Mr. Bush said, "to Google their tax dollars."

"We spend a lot of time and a lot of effort collecting your money, and we should show the same amount of effort in reporting how we spend it," the president said during a signing ceremony attended by lawmakers, congressional staff, columnists and bloggers.

Written by Sens. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, and Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, the legislation creates a database available to the public through a Web site. It will list every entity receiving federal funds, along with information about the amount and purpose of the spending.

The federal government issues more than $400 billion in grants and $300 billion in contracts each year to businesses, associations and state and local governments.

Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the White House Office of Management and Budget, said the information already exists, but now the administration must collect and compile it into a consistent format.

The law gives the administration until 2008 to have the database in full operation. Mr. Johnson said OMB will consult with key lawmakers and produce a plan for the database at the beginning of next year.

The Bush administration backed the bill during summer negotiations as a tool to improve government transparency and accountability.

A more limited bill sponsored by House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, passed the House in June, but the Coburn-Obama bill was blocked in the Senate by a "secret hold." This Senate tradition allows a single member to obstruct a bill's progress anonymously.

After brief negotiations, the bill passed both chambers of Congress.

Mr. Coburn and Mr. Obama, in a joint statement, gave "all the credit and praise" for the bill's passage to bloggers, editorial writers and citizens. Mr. Johnson said the campaign showed that the public has the power to demand tools for good governance.

"The public have spoken is the lesson here, and when the public speaks, things happen, and when the public wants something to happen, the Congress listens," Mr. Johnson said.

Dow Jones Newswire, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--The Bush Administration wants to "have an impact" on how the next farm bill is written in 2007, U.S. Department of Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said Tuesday.

While acknowledging that Congress will write the next farm bill - a multi-year blueprint for U.S. agriculture policy that includes billions of dollars worth of subsidies - Johanns stressed that it'll be President George W. Bush who either approves or vetoes it.

The USDA will publish its proposal for the next farm bill in January, Johanns told a farm group and reporters over lunch, laying out some of his priorities.

First on his list is the fair distribution of farm subsidies and the reform of "inequities" in the system. Currently, Johanns said, the five crops that get 90% of government subsidies - corn, cotton, wheat, soybeans and rice - only represent 21% of farm cash receipts. Specialty crops, such as fruits and vegetables, are mostly left out.

Government subsidies also must change in order to avoid provoking new complaints by member countries of the World Trade Organization. U.S. farm policy, he said, needs to be "beyond challenge."

Johanns highlighted Brazil's recent successful WTO challenge against U.S. cotton subsidies and stressed the country and others will continue to hammer at U.S. policy.

"We have to be realistic," he said about future challenges.

The American Farm Bureau Federation is lobbying Congress to extend the current 2002 farm bill by at least a year instead of overhauling policy in 2007.

The Farm Bureau had been willing to accept changes to the structure of subsidies, but only in return for substantial reductions in foreign tariffs on U.S. agricultural goods. That type of trade had seemed imminent while WTO countries were still negotiating a massive agreement, but those talks broke down and suspended indefinitely in July.

Farm Bureau President Bob Stallman told a gathering of reporters last week: "We're saying we want to extend the major structure and components of this farm bill. For the short term, and until we get a WTO negotiation, for the most part we ought to forgo major changes to our farm policy."

Spellings Back Ideas To Shake Up College (AP)

By Ben Feller, Ap Education Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

Handed a plan to shake up college life in America, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings is endorsing some of its key ideas and promising to get moving on them.

Her overarching theme is to make everything about college — choosing one, affording one, succeeding in one — easier for families. Parents should be able to shop for a college as simply as they shop for a car, she said, with a clear expectation of what they will get.

But higher education in the United States is a diverse field, and finding the will and the money for the agenda may prove difficult.

High on her list is the creation of a massive information system — a way to judge how colleges and universities are doing in helping students succeed. It would require a vast collection of data on students, with a promise that their privacy will be protected.

The Education Department would work with states and colleges to make that happen, Spellings said Monday, commenting for the first time on a national commission's ideas.

The department would then use the data to overhaul its college Web site. The idea is for people to compare one school to another, right down to the typical salaries of graduates.

She also pledged to make applying for financial aid easier and speedier.

"Some of this stuff is so commonsensical, and the urgency is so great," Spellings told The Associated Press. "We need to get going on this."

Spellings outlined her plans ahead of a Tuesday speech at the National Press Club. The Bush administration is getting more aggressive on college issues, a popular area for voters.

Spellings would not commit to one of her advisory panel's most specific ideas: increasing Pell Grants to cover at least 70 percent of in-state tuition costs. Pell Grants, the main form of federal aid for low-income students, now cover less than half the costs.

The idea would cost billions of dollars, either in new spending or cuts elsewhere.

Spellings said she supports more financial aid for poor families. But she would not get specific, wary of pre-empting President Bush before his next budget plan is released.

Ultimately, Spellings said she embraced recommendations that she can do something about. She said she will work with Congress and states on the others.

One, for example, called for a total restructuring of financial aid. It would mean consolidating dozens of programs that the commission found to be confusing and inefficient.

"I'm for it," Spellings said. "But obviously I understand that Congress needs to weigh in."

Spellings said she also wants to:

_Provide matching federal money to states, colleges and universities that report how well their students are performing. The money will be offered as an incentive for candor.

_Call together groups that accredit universities and try to change the standards upon which schools are judged. The goal would be to put more emphasis on student performance.

_Align high school standards with college work, another commission recommendation. But Spellings wants to do this by extending the No Child Left Behind law into high schools. The Bush administration has been proposing that for two years with little interest from Congress.

There was no mention of reforming student visa rules for foreign students. Or of leading a national strategy to make learning easier for nontraditional students, especially adults.

The commission, led by investor Charles Miller, called the U.S. higher education system one of the nation's biggest successes. But it also called it complacent and overly expensive, with little accountable for its students and poor access for minority students.

Spellings walked that line, too. She called higher education here the envy of the world, but then said the nation has turned into a leader, not a follower, in education competition.

Miller said he thinks Spellings has responded fairly to his group's recommendations.

"People tend to think you can run over to the Capitol and everyone there gets to decide," Miller said. "We have a national system, but it's not a federal system. She's got the right balance on that. She needs to get help from a lot of others. I think she'll engage them."

Spellings Outlines New Proposals For Higher Education (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Looking to extend its education policies into America's colleges and universities, the Bush administration outlined new proposals Tuesday that some higher-education officials fear will lead to standardized testing at the collegiate level and trample on students' privacy.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said sweeping changes were needed to make higher education more affordable, accountable and understandable to Americans who were shelling out tens of thousands of dollars annually to pursue college degrees.

In a speech at the National Press Club, she laid out a series of proposals developed by her Commission on the Future of U.S. Higher Education, which she appointed a year ago. In concept they'd extend to colleges the principles from President Bush's No Child Left Behind program, which seeks greater accountability from America's elementary schools by requiring them to impose standardized tests and publicize their results.

Even before Spellings spoke, several higher-education officials had blasted the proposals, saying they menace student privacy, potentially offer a one-size-fits-all approach to testing and don't sufficiently address student financial aid.

"It seems to me there is an encroachment here to substitute the judgment on higher-education matters that ought to be made by (college) presidents and faculty rather than legislators and commissions," said David L. Warren, the president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, which represents about 1,000 schools. "There is an ever-increasing reach into the academy."

Seeking to reassure nervous educators, Spellings said the White House had no interest in federalizing the country's 3,706 public and private two-year and four-year institutions. Instead, Spellings said, she wants a transparent system that makes shopping for colleges and universities as easy as shopping for cars.

"And let me be clear: At the end of it we neither envision, nor want, a national system of higher education," Spellings told the audience, largely educators. "On the contrary, one of the greatest assets of our system is its diversity, something we must protect and preserve."

Many academics question the wisdom and motive for perhaps the most controversial proposal from Spellings' commission: a massive database, even one with requisite privacy measures, to track students as they progress on campus.

The tracking process would be similar to the way students from kindergarten through 12th grade are monitored, Spellings said. Information from the database would help illustrate how colleges and universities are performing.

"Information will not only help with decision-making, it will also hold schools accountable for quality," she said. "As the commission wrote: `Higher education must change from a system primarily based on reputation to one based on performance.' "

Warren and other higher education officials said such a database could intrude on students' privacy.

"They're creating a data system that, if you breach the system, it can track back to the student, that will have everything from the student's life in college, K-through-12 and far beyond," he said.

Spellings also said that America's colleges and universities needed to improve measurements of student performance through testing. The commission's report mentions the Collegiate Learning Assessment, an exam that 134 colleges have used since 2002, and the Measure of Academic Proficiency and Progress as two good gauges of academic progress.

Several colleges and higher education groups say they have no objection to testing if comparisons are made on a peer-school basis. But they fear that the commission is steering toward standardized testing and a uniform comparison of institutions.

Commission member David Ward, the president of the American Council on Education, refused to sign the commission's report, saying it projects a "false sense of crisis" and appears to suggest a "one size fits all approach."

"A drive for such comparisons will inevitably lead to the attempt to adopt a single test," Warren wrote to commission Chairman Charles Miller last month.

Spellings also discussed trying to make college more affordable. But she didn't address the commission's suggestion to increase Pell Grants - the main federal aid for low-income students - to cover at least 70 percent of in-state tuition costs.

Spellings Aims To Impose New Standards On Colleges (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Chaker

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced plans to impose tighter standards on colleges and universities, saying the current higher-education system is too unaccountable to students and families who pay the bills.

In a speech addressing recommendations handed over last week by her 19-member Commission on the Future of Higher Education, Ms. Spellings called for making the college process simpler for families, from scrapping the current financial-aid system to creating a database of student information, and making colleges more accountable for the services they provide. That causes some in the higher-education community to bristle. "We're perplexed when she says there's not much information on accountability," says David Warren, president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities. "Our Web sites are overflowing with information."

Ms. Spellings said her department would implement some recommendations on its own and work with Congress on making others reality. But her actions are prompting questions about the scope of a federal department's authority over the decentralized and largely autonomous higher-education system.

"For most families, this is one of the most expensive investments we make," she said. "Yet there is little to no information on why costs are so high and what we're getting in return." She said she wants to create a database of individual student data to allow parents and policy makers to evaluate the performance of institutions. The commission has said that personal information such as names and Social Security numbers would be protected.

The plan has privacy advocates concerned, following revelations several weeks ago that the Education Department shared information on student financial-aid applicants with the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of the government's counterterrorism work.

Ms. Spellings also said she wants to encourage "outcome" testing to understand what students get out of school. She said she wants matching funds provided to colleges, universities and states that collect and publicly report these outcomes, and that the results should be part of the accreditation system of higher education.

Charles Miller, who chaired the advisory commission, has said he envisions an approach that wouldn't be so prescriptive as to require schools to use one particular test. That said, the panel's report points to such examples as the Collegiate Learning Assessment, used by more than 100 colleges, and the Measure of Academic Proficiency and Progress, which measures college-level reading, math, writing and critical thinking, and which 350 colleges use for their own self-assessment or accreditation. (The CLA is owned by New York nonprofit Council for Aid to Education, and the MAPP test is owned by the nonprofit Educational Testing Service, Princeton, N.J.)

The plan may prompt conflict with Congress, where members suggest it exceeds the Education Department's powers. Recently, the department sought to use a regulatory process to propose some rules arising out of the commission's report. The process, called "negotiated rulemaking," typically comes after legislation is passed, and prompted a letter to Ms. Spellings from leaders of the Senate education panel. "The draft recommendations...are broad and will likely require legislative action before they could be appropriately included in regulations," read the letter.

In her response to the senators, she said she had "no intention" of acting on any proposals that require statutory changes.

Secretary Vows To Improve Results Of Higher Education (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Saying she hoped to jolt American higher education out of a dangerous complacency, Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings vowed Tuesday to help finance state universities that administer standardized tests, establish a national database to track students' progress toward a degree and cut the red tape surrounding federal student aid.

In a speech, Ms. Spellings emphasized those and a few other measures from among dozens of recommendations issued recently by a federal panel, the Commission on the Future of Higher Education.

"This is the beginning of a process of long-overdue reform," Ms. Spellings told a crowd of university presidents, business executives, lobbyists and journalists in a speech that her department billed as one in which she would outline her agenda for change at the nation's colleges and universities.

The commission, convened by Ms. Spellings, completed work in August on a report that warned that American universities, while still the finest in the world, were losing their edge against heightened global competition.

In one of its most highly debated recommendations, the report called on public universities to measure learning with standardized tests, and listed two by name: the Collegiate Learning Assessment and the Measure of Academic Proficiency and Progress. During the panel's deliberations, many educators opposed the testing proposal, calling it misguided for the federal government to require the nation's more than 3,000 colleges, universities and trade schools to test and compare learning outcomes among such disparate students as physics scholars at Caltech and dance majors at Juilliard.

In her speech, Ms. Spellings moved forward with the testing proposal, but cautiously.

"No current ranking system of colleges and universities directly measures the most critical point, student performance and learning," she said. "We absolutely should. And Action 4 under my plan will provide matching funds to colleges and universities and states that collect and publicly report student learning outcomes."

David Ward, president of the American Council on Education, the largest association of colleges and universities, expressed approval for Ms. Spellings's proposal to provide federal matching money to institutions that already, voluntarily, are experimenting with standardized testing. Mr. Ward declined last month to sign the panel's report because, among other concerns, he said it could lead to government-imposed testing.

"I thought today's speech was very important for addressing anxieties," he said. "Now I can see she's not going to rush into some simple-minded solutions. I feel much better."

Ms. Spellings established the 19-member panel last year, including current and former administrators and faculty members from large research universities, community colleges, liberal arts colleges and for-profit trade schools as well as executives from Boeing, I.B.M. and other corporations. She asked them to examine the accessibility, affordability and accountability of the nation's colleges and universities.

In its final report, the commission recommended that the entire federal student aid system, which has 17 programs, be scrapped in favor of one that is more user-friendly.

Ms. Spellings said Tuesday that only Congress could carry out such a fundamental overhaul. But she said the department would seek to streamline the process immediately and cut the application time for federal loans and grants in half. She offered few specifics, however.

At the insistence of former Gov. James B. Hunt Jr. of North Carolina, the panel included in its final report a recommendation for bolstering the program of Pell Grants, which are the basic building block of federal aid, by making them cover a larger percentage of public college tuition. One university group estimated recently that that proposal could cost the nation $9 billion to $12 billion.

Ms. Spellings did not mention that proposal on Tuesday. But Mr. Hunt said she told him and other commission members in a conference call on Tuesday that she was "working with the Office of Management and Budget to see what could be done."

"So I think she's given a strong commitment," Mr. Hunt said.

Ms. Spellings also promised action on Tuesday on another commission recommendation: that the Education Department collect student data from colleges and universities and use it to create a "higher education information system."

Such a federal data system, she said, could provide new consumer-friendly information to parents and students looking for the right college. It could also be used to hold colleges and universities accountable for the number of students that they graduate and other measures of institutional performance, she said.

Ms. Spellings suggested that the higher education establishment would consider her proposals to be bitter medicine.

"After some of what I've said today, commencement speaker invitations may suddenly get lost in the mail," she said.

But the reaction from several university presidents and lobbyists who had previously expressed fears that the commission's work would bring new federal interference in higher education, seemed generally to be one of relief.

Richard Vedder, an Ohio University economist, who also served on the panel and had hoped it would lead to far-reaching measures to control university costs, said on Tuesday that he worried that the panel's year of study and hearings had produced a fog of rhetoric and little else.

"I'm concerned with a certain vagueness to it all at this point," Dr. Vedder said. "There's been a lot of platitudes — 'increase affordability, control costs' — but we've not come up with much that's specific about how to do that."

Spellings Calls For Tracking Of Students' Performance (WP)

By Lois Romano, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

College Accountability Needed, Education Chief Says

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called yesterday for greater fiscal and academic accountability in higher education and endorsed a controversial plan to keep long-term records on students that would track performance from the time they enter the system in grade school to show how their educations progress.

Responding to the final report from her Commission on the Future of Higher Education, Spellings also implored schools to hold costs down for low-income students. She pledged to seek more financial aid for students but largely sidestepped the commission's bold proposal for a substantial increase in need-based Pell Grants.

The commission, which Spellings appointed, in general painted a bleak picture of a prohibitively expensive higher education system that serves the wealthy and whose schools are not held accountable for student performance.

The panel proposed that college students undergo testing to ensure that the schools are meeting their academic promises and goals, the results of which would be part of a public database that would help students and parents assess and choose schools. Spellings made the point that few objective measures for judging the quality of a school are available to parents.

At the commission's recommendation, Spellings is offering financial incentives to schools that voluntarily report student assessments.

"Our universities are known as the best in the world, and a lot of people will tell you things are going just fine," she said in a speech at the National Press Club. "But when 90 percent of the fastest-growing jobs require postsecondary education, and fewer and fewer Americans are getting one, are we satisfied with just fine?"

DOJ_NMG_0069884

The commission recommended increasing the value of Pell Grants to cover 70 percent of the average in-state tuition at public colleges; the grants now cover only 48 percent of tuition. Spellings did call for a complete overhaul and streamlining of the unwieldy college aid system and acknowledged that more money is needed, but she stopped short of endorsing increases in Pell Grants.

David L. Warren, president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, said: "I found that quite remarkable, because it was the key recommendation from the commission. Yet she endorsed a unit record database, which would be enormously expensive to implement."

The association and other school groups oppose a data collecting system that would track individual students, because they worry it would infringe on privacy. But Warren acknowledged that some form of data collecting is needed to improve the system.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the senior Democrat on the education committee, criticized Spellings for not embracing the Pell Grant proposal and for not addressing the massive student loan industry, which he called "the most troubling aspect of higher education today."

Some advocacy groups complained that Spellings put too much of the blame for high costs on schools and not enough on government. "State support is the lowest it's been in 25 years, and public colleges are turning to parents to bridge the gap," said Lawrence Gold, director of higher education for the American Federation of Teachers.

Still others expressed concern about Spellings's suggestion to increase use of adjunct professors over tenured teachers to cut costs.

"Although I agree with the secretary that more research is needed on the teaching effectiveness of adjunct professors, I strongly believe that we will not dramatically improve the quality of postsecondary education with a part-time teaching force," Lee S. Shulman, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, wrote in an e-mail.

Educators have also balked at the commission's call for colleges to conduct student assessments and make them public, saying it would be virtually impossible to develop a uniform national academic measure because of the many diverse subject disciplines and concentrations.

But Mark G. Yudof, chancellor of the University of Texas system, argued that there should be "as much disclosure as possible, as much data as possible."

In an interview with Washington Post editors and reporters yesterday, Yudof said school presidents who oppose academic assessments "are wrong."

"I think they're dead wrong to say [higher education is] too ephemeral," he said. "I think this is going to happen with or without" them.

College Overhaul Called 'overdue' (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called Tuesday for greater accountability by colleges and universities, including the creation of a national database to track how well students learn.

She also called for an overhaul of the financial aid process and an increase in need-based aid.

Spellings' plans are in response to recommendations by a 19-member commission she created last year about the future of U.S. higher education. The commission said colleges and universities have slipped into "unwarranted complacency" and that higher education's financing system is "increasingly dysfunctional."

"This is the beginning of a process of long-overdue reform," she said. "Over the years, we've invested tens of billions of dollars in taxpayer money and just hoped for the best. We deserve better."

The development of a database has been among the commission's most controversial proposals, mostly because of concerns about student privacy.

Known as a “unit record” system, it would track the progress of individual — but unidentified — students over time as a way to better assess and compare the educational performance of institutions.

Although President Bush said in a statement that he strongly supports “the thrust of this important report,” Spellings will need approval from Congress to implement the database, and she could face an uphill battle. The House passed a bill in March that would prohibit a “unit record” system. Buck McKeon, R-Calif., chairman of the House Education Committee, didn't address the database question in his response Tuesday to Spellings' speech but said, “As she and I have discussed, I expect the department to work cooperatively with Congress.”

Proponents of a database that tracks students, including the State Higher Education Executive Officers, say federal data on graduation rates gives an inaccurate picture because it doesn't account for transfers to other schools. And though many schools keep their own records, they don't necessarily make the data public. About 35 states have systems in place, but they operate as “islands unto themselves,” Spellings said.

Spellings said her plan would make information available to parents, policymakers and others in an easy-to-understand format. Data could include students' majors, costs after student aid and how quickly they graduate. To protect privacy, the commission recommended that the database use anonymous identification numbers, not Social Security numbers.

Estimates for the federal cost to create the system infrastructure range from $10 million to more than $100 million, says the American Council on Education, an umbrella group for higher education. That doesn't account for costs to states or to institutions.

Leaders of a number of higher-education groups say they support such a database. But “the devil is in the details,” said Robert Berdahl, president of the Association of American Universities, which represents large research universities.

Spellings offered few details about the database Tuesday but told commission members Monday that she was open to testing such a database as a pilot project, said David Ward, president of the American Council on Education. Education officials said the department would begin with a voluntary, opt-in system for states and institutions.

Ward was the one commission member who did not sign the report, arguing that the commission was looking for “quick solutions.” But because Spellings said she would work with higher-education groups, he said, “my anxieties were actually substantially reduced.”

Lee Shulman, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, said in an e-mail that aside from the privacy question, there has been “far too little discussion of whether such a (database) system is worth creating … if the data it records is not worth using. Really poor and misleading data is far more dangerous than no data at all.”

Spellings Presses U.S. Colleges To Prove Their Worth (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

Sept. 26 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called on the nation's 3,700 colleges to cut costs while doing a better job of proving how well they teach.

Spellings, responding to the final report of her yearlong Commission on the Future of Higher Education, also promised to ask Congress for more aid for low-income students, without endorsing the panel's specific suggestion of a 50 percent increase.

The Bush administration formed the commission with the hope of making U.S. higher education more affordable and more capable of providing the workers, especially in science fields, seen as necessary to maintaining U.S. economic competitiveness.

``Our universities are known as the best in the world, and a lot of people will tell you things are going just fine," Spellings said in remarks prepared for delivery today in Washington. ``But when 90 percent of the fastest-growing jobs require post-secondary education, and fewer and fewer Americans are getting one, are we satisfied with `just' fine?"

The commission, in one of its most specific and costly recommendations, suggested Congress increase the value of the Pell Grant, the main federal grant for low-income students, to cover 70 percent of the average in-state tuition at public four- year colleges, up from 48 percent in the 2004-05 school year.

It offered that proposal on the condition that college tuition not rise faster than the growth in median family income.

More Aid Urged

Spellings said Congress ``must increase need-based aid,'' while warning it would make no difference to students ``if states and institutions don't do their part to keep costs in line.''

Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, the top-ranking Democrat on the Senate's Education Committee, criticized Spellings for failing to propose a Pell Grant increase and for failing to address problems with the student loan industry, which he called ``the most troubling aspect of higher education today.''

``That system squanders billions each year to provide corporate welfare to big lenders, rather than serving the best interests of our students,'' Kennedy said in a statement.

The commission also urged colleges take new steps to measure student performance and make that information publicly available as a means for prospective students and others to compare schools. In addition, it endorsed administration suggestions for a computerized system of tracking students over their lifetimes, another means of getting better measures of college performance.

Funds for Database

Spellings today proposed providing matching funds to states and institutions ``that collect and publicly report student learning outcomes,'' without elaborating in her prepared remarks.

The proposal for a computer database to track students has created controversy among universities, with some raising privacy concerns and others arguing they are shortchanged by current estimates of graduation rates.

A group of six associations representing U.S. universities, announcing steps they would take in response to the commission report, promised last week they would find a way to create the database.

``We are collectively holding hands on this issue,'' said David Warren, president of National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, which represents private schools including all Ivy League colleges and has been a leading opponent of the idea.

Hoping for Accountability

Spellings, in the prepared text of her address today at the National Press Club, said she hopes to bring to colleges the same principles of accountability that the ``No Child Left Behind'' law has brought to elementary and secondary schools.

Colleges, however, have resisted the idea of standardized tests, saying school provides an experience too diverse to be measured by any uniform means. Both the commission and the university associations instead have made general references to the need for colleges to show more ``accountability.''

Spellings, whose daughter attends Davidson College in North Carolina, said she wants prospective students and their families to have a far better sense of their options when choosing colleges.

``I, too, experienced the confusion and frustration many parents face with the college selection process,'' she said. ``I found it almost impossible to get my questions answered, and I'm the Secretary of Education!''

Spellings also endorsed commission suggestions to simplify the process of applying apply for federal financial aid, to improve high school programs that prepare students for college and to improve procedures for accrediting colleges.

Problem Areas Seen

More specific suggestions, such as the proposed Pell Grant increase, may be more difficult to implement, said Becky Timmons, director of government relations at the American Council of Education, which represents about 1,800 U.S. colleges.

The commission's proposed increase to 70 percent of in-state tuition would cost taxpayers almost $9 billion a year, as the maximum Pell Grant rises to $6,150 and the average grant reaches $3,845, up from the current maximum of $4,050 and average of $2,445, Timmons said.

That increased cost would become more than $10 billion a year if colleges realize the 7.5 percent increase in enrollment that the Education Department expects between 2006 and 2011, Timmons said in an analysis prepared by her association.

Congress has failed so far so far this year to act on a $10 billion-a-year plan backed by President George W. Bush, lawmakers from both parties and U.S. corporate leaders aimed at increasing U.S. economic competitiveness through programs such as research- related tax breaks and scholarships for science students.

A coalition of lawmakers will introduce a new version of that plan today, hoping for passage before Congress adjourns, said Jack Finn, spokesman for Senator John Ensign, a Republican of Nevada. ``It's important to get something done this year," Finn said.

Swagel Nominated To Treasury Post (WSJ)

WASHINGTON -- The White House nominated Phillip Swagel, an economist at the American Enterprise Institute, to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for economic policy.

Mr. Swagel, a former chief of staff at the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, was tapped as part of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's personnel makeover. The former Goldman Sachs chief executive has made a series of hires since taking Treasury's reins July 10, including former Goldman colleague Robert Steel, who could be confirmed by the Senate as early as this week to be Treasury's top financial policy adviser.

Report Criticizes Pentagon's New Travel Booking System (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

After a decade and more than $500 million in costs, the Defense Department's new travel booking system doesn't work, it doesn't save money, and most staff members don't use it, a new study says.

A Government Accountability Office report released yesterday slams the Northrop Grumman-designed Defense Travel System and calls Pentagon estimates of usage and cost savings into serious question. So poor is the Pentagon's analysis of the system's merits, the report says, that defense officials offered a credit card company news release as sole proof for its claim that the system saves millions of dollars each year.

"We requested, but the [Pentagon] could not provide, any analysis of travel data to support the assertion" of savings, the report says. Further, it says, "The department does not have reasonable [data] to measure the extent to which DTS is actually being used."

This is the second GAO report on the travel system, whose delays and cost overruns have made it subject to repeated attempts in Congress to kill it. Launched in 1998, the system was supposed to have been fully operational four years ago, yet as of this year it was difficult to tell who was actually using it, the report says.

Northrop Grumman spokeswoman Janis Lamar said the company has not yet had time to review the report. But she said, "We built a great system, and it's saving money." She said the system has been deployed to all 270 major military installations and is being used today by over 50,000 personnel on a daily basis.

"It's been a pig," said Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs subcommittee on federal financial management, who is trying to kill the travel system contract.

The Defense Department has spent more than $500 million on the program since 1998, an overrun of about $200 million, according to figures compiled by Congress from GAO and Defense Department reports.

"It's one big mistake after another . . . that Congress hasn't paid attention to because of very effective lobbying by the contractor," Coburn said. Los Angeles-based Northrop Grumman has spent $72 million in federal lobbying efforts since 1998, Political Money Line reported, and contributed $6.2 million to federal candidates and parties over the past 10 years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Northrop "ought to give some of our money back," Coburn said. "Even if [the system] rolls out, it's never going to pay for itself. It doesn't even get the best fare."

The system was born of a 1995 Pentagon task force recommendation to replace the department's outmoded, chaotic travel procedures with one standardized system for booking official travel, from airlines to hotels. But technical problems have foiled efforts to coax employees to use it.

The Pentagon estimates that the system will save $54 million a year, mostly by automating work once handled by employees. The report calls that estimate "unrealistic," partly because staff would be reassigned, but mostly, because the Pentagon could provide no backup for its claims.

Asked for proof that its system would save $31 million yearly in personnel costs, the Pentagon provided a copy of an American Express news release that discussed savings achieved through a completely different booking system, in a private company.

In a written response to the report, Undersecretary of Defense David S.C. Chu strongly objected to criticism of the Pentagon's estimates of personnel cost savings. "The Department is facing an enormous challenge and must successfully prosecute today's war while still making investments that safeguard the future," he wrote.

"It's time to close this program down," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), who chairs the Senate's Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee's investigations panel, which held a hearing last year on the bill.

"DOD has spent more than 500 million of American taxpayers' dollars on a travel system that was supposed to save money . . . It's an unconscionable waste."

In the Loop (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

RHIP, Mr. VP

Health and safety rules in Washington have for years warned residents never to get between Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and a camera.

There may now be a new rule: Never get in the way of President Bush heading for his soft down pillow.

Seems Vice President Cheney , in Grand Rapids, Mich., on Monday, landed at Andrews Air Force Base at 8:10 p.m . -- a full two minutes before Air Force One touched down.

But being president means never having to wait your turn. So Bush bounded down the steps, our colleague Peter Baker reports, and onto his chopper before Cheney's entourage even realized what was happening. Marine One quickly powered up, forcing Marine Two to sit on the tarmac until the top bird lifted off.

Marine Two waited barely a minute longer before taking off, producing a rare moment when both presidential and vice presidential helicopters were in the air, flying almost in tandem back into the city.

Cheney may have been disoriented after engaging in an unusual activity -- actually hanging with reporters on his plane during a "surprise" celebration of his 100th fundraiser this election cycle. His staff got a cake marked "100 -- on to victory," and when everyone was in place, summoned the veep from his private cabin to party.

He cut one piece of cake and stayed for a minute or so. A reporter asked which of the 100 was the most memorable. Cheney thought for a moment and said: "Stuff from 30 years ago is easier to remember. The rest is a blur." Then he returned to his cabin.

Unclear if he had any cake, but, if he did, might have slowed him on the tarmac.

Hill Salary Site Proves Too Big A Hit (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

A Web site documenting the salaries of the roughly 20,000 Capitol Hill employees went live last week -- and almost as soon came crashing down.

No, it didn't get shut down by a judge's order claiming that private information had been leaked. By law, the salaries of Hill staffers have long been available in thick books in the offices of the House and Senate clerks. The site came down because of the rush of traffic from computers housed in Congress -- and elsewhere.

It was a sign of the intense interest percolating on Capitol Hill and political blogs about the just-launched LegiStorm (http://www.legistorm.com). The site quickly went back online, offering a window for Hill staff and strangers alike into what everyone -- from senior senators' chiefs of staff to the House barber -- earns per year. It's popular trivia that the president earns

$400,000 per year and representatives and senators earn about $160,000 per year, but the information on staff salaries hasn't been so publicly available before.

"These kinds of records . . . were the bread and butter of reporting on the Hill for me," said Jock Friedly, a former Capitol Hill reporter who is behind LegiStorm. "I thought it was about time it was put on the Web."

Friedly said information kept in obscure House and Senate offices wasn't helpful to citizens or reporters doing research on Congress from outside Washington. "The goal is simply to make Congress a little more transparent." he said. Friedly, who runs a business selling government documents, said the site has only a few text advertisements so far.

The LegiStorm data show that slightly more than 200 Senate staffers earn $150,000 per year. Close to 300 House staffers make that amount, many of them on the House Appropriations Committee. Most employees seem to make about $50,000 to $60,000 per year. Many paid interns -- which Hill aides often start their careers as -- take home barely $200 per month.

"I've heard some people say they're gong to use this information as leverage," said a House staffer who has worked on the Hill for six years. "There's no uniformity to what people make."

Another House aide said he wished the site was available when he was negotiating his job three years ago. "Negotiating a salary for a new job is never a totally comfortable process, and this information would certainly give you a leg up as a job candidate," the aide said.

Some Hill staffers expressed gripes about LegiStorm. Because salaries are reported in quarterly increments, they might contain a year-end bonus that would overstate the aide's regular income.

Some staff members who work in district offices outside Washington were worried that their neighbors would take a look at their salaries, a piece of information not publicly available for most of the nation's workers, said Rick Shapiro, executive director of the Congressional Management Foundation, which consults with House and Senate offices on effective management strategies.

"I was concerned that having the American public having ready access to what everybody in Congress would make would lead to bashing people when you don't understand what the cost of living in Washington, D.C., is," Shapiro said. "If you're from North Dakota or other areas where the cost of living is much smaller, you might look at salaries and say this is outrageous."

The Threat To Judicial Independence (WSJ)

By Sandra Day O'Connor

In November, South Dakotans will vote on a state constitutional amendment being advocated by a national group called "JAIL 4 Judges." If the amendment passes, it would eliminate judicial immunity, and enable a special grand jury to censure judges for their official legal determinations. Although the amendment's supporters claim they seek a "judicial accountability initiative law" (JAIL), they aspire to something far more sinister -- judicial intimidation. Indeed, the national Web site of JAIL 4 Judges boasts with striking candor that the organization "has that intimidation factor flowing through the judicial system."

It is tempting to dismiss this proposed amendment as merely an isolated bout of anti-judge angst. But while the JAIL 4 Judges initiative is unusually venomous, it is far from alone in expressing skepticism of the judiciary. In addition to South Dakota, this election cycle has witnessed efforts in at least three other states that are designed to rein in judges who have supposedly "run amok."

Not to be completely outdone, Congress also has engaged in recent efforts to police the judiciary. Seeking to constrain the legal sources that are available to judges, some members of Congress have advocated measures that would forbid judges from citing foreign law when they are interpreting the Constitution. In addition, bills have been introduced in both houses of Congress supporting the creation of an inspector general to investigate and monitor the federal bench. Finally, the House of Representatives passed legislation over the summer that would prohibit the Supreme Court from considering whether the Pledge of Allegiance's inclusion of the words "under God" violates the First Amendment. * * *

Directing anger toward judges enjoys a long -- if not exactly venerable -- tradition in our nation. President Thomas Jefferson, for instance, was a particularly spirited antagonist of judges appointed by the Federalists. Moreover, President Franklin D. Roosevelt sought to increase the number of Supreme Court justices because the court invalidated several pieces of New Deal legislation. And I can distinctly remember seeing lawns and highways across the country that featured signs demanding the impeachment of Chief Justice Earl Warren.

But while scorn for certain judges is not an altogether new phenomenon, the breadth and intensity of rage currently being leveled at the judiciary may be unmatched in American history. The ubiquitous "activist judges" who "legislate from the bench" have become central villains on today's domestic political landscape. Elected officials routinely score cheap points by railing against the "elitist judges," who are purported to be of touch with ordinary citizens and their values. Several jeremiads are published every year warning of the dangers of judicial supremacy and judicial tyranny. Though these attacks generally emit more heat than light, using judges as punching bags presents a grave threat to the independent judiciary.

Troublingly, attacks on the judiciary are now being launched by judges themselves. Earlier this year, Alabama Supreme Court Justice Tom Parker excoriated his colleagues for faithfully applying the Supreme Court's precedent in Roper v. Simmons, which prohibited imposition of the death penalty for crimes committed by minors. Offering a bold reinterpretation of the Constitution's supremacy clause, Justice Parker advised state judges to avoid following Supreme Court opinions "simply because they are 'precedents.'" Justice Parker supported his criticism of "activist federal judges" by asserting that "the liberals on the U.S. Supreme Court . . . look down on the pro-family policies, Southern heritage, evangelical Christianity, and other blessings of our great state."

It should come as no surprise that the increased scapegoating of the judiciary has coincided with an increase in anger directed toward individual judges. In the last decade, threats and inappropriate communications directed toward the federal bench have more than quadrupled. According to the U.S. Marshals Service, complaints about such behavior were being logged at a record-setting pace this year. And while it is encouraging that Congress recently set aside funds for federal judges to have home security systems installed, it is deeply dispiriting that the demand for the systems among the judges was so high. Judge David B. Sentelle of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit was quite right when he observed, "Judges must be free to make judicial decisions without the fear of physical harm to themselves or to members of their families."

Given the escalating criticism that is leveled at judges, it seems appropriate to bear in mind the reasons that the Framers initially established an independent judicial branch. In Federalist No. 78, Alexander Hamilton explained why, in our constitutional system, "the complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential." Hamilton contended that the judiciary needed to be distinct from the legislative and executive branches because that was the best way to guarantee "a steady, upright, and impartial administration of the laws." Hamilton also believed that judicial independence was necessary in order to safeguard against "injury of the private rights of particular classes of citizens, by unjust and partial laws." It is well worth remembering that, far more often than not in modern times, the judiciary has admirably performed these two vital tasks: checking the other two branches and protecting minority rights.

An independent judiciary does not mean, of course, that it is somehow improper to criticize judicial decisions. To the contrary, it is a healthy sign for democracy that the public is engaged with the workings of the judicial system. Judges can -- and do -- sometimes render erroneous decisions, but that is why appeals are allowed to higher courts. Moreover, judges can be -- and are -- subjected to discipline for legitimate reasons. Members of the judiciary cannot sincerely believe that they should be regarded as above the very laws that they are charged with interpreting. Ours is, after all, a nation of laws, not men -- or even women.

Nonetheless, we must be more vigilant in making sure that criticism does not cross over into intimidation. Judges and lawyers certainly play essential roles in opposing attacks on the judiciary. Indeed, later this week, I -- along with Justice Stephen Breyer -- am co-chairing a conference on judicial independence at Georgetown University Law Center. But the legal community needs help from other sectors of society to ensure that the current mood of cynicism does not end up compromising the rule of law. This includes members of the business community. Adam Smith, writing in "The Wealth of Nations," well understood the importance of an independent judiciary: "[U]pon the impartial administration of justice depends the liberty of every individual, the sense which he has of his own security." Without judicial independence, Smith warned, "it is scarce[ly] possible that justice should not frequently be sacrificed to what is vulgarly called politics."

More broadly, of course, all of society has a keen interest in countering threats to judicial independence. Judges who are afraid -- whether they fear for their jobs or fear for their lives -- cannot adequately fulfill the considerable responsibilities that the position demands. In these challenging and difficult times, we must recommit ourselves to maintaining the independent judiciary that the Framers sought to establish.

Help Youths In Need (WT)

By Karen Burke Morison

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Congress has an opportunity to fix some costly problems that affect the hundreds of federal programs that target disadvantaged youth, by passing the Federal Youth Coordination Act.

These problems were aptly identified by the White House Task Force for Disadvantaged Youth, a group created by President Bush in late 2002. The president directed the group of 12 top federal officials to develop a complete picture of what the federal government was doing for disadvantaged youth and to figure out how it could be done better.

The task force, led by presidential policy advisers Margaret Spellings and John Bridgeland, reported that there were more than 300 such programs scattered throughout 12 agencies. They also found the total spending for these programs was significant ($223.5 billion in fiscal 2003), about one-tenth of the federal budget.

Big government spending often passes for compassion, but for that to be accurate, the programs need to work. But policy-makers seemed content to create these programs and keep them operating. Their effectiveness rarely entered the discussion.

Each department has also allowed "mission creep" to invade, leaving the programs far afield from their original congressional mandates. The task force determined that the program activities were dictated by their enabling statutes only 30 percent of the time. The agencies themselves accounted for the other 70 percent of the spending decisions, thanks to Congress' latest attempt to target the latest urgent problem with a broadly worded mandate, leaving the important details to the bureaucracy. Like a newly licensed driver with gas, a credit card and the car keys, the bureaucracy ran with this discretion, freely experimenting with this approach and that methodology, but rarely stopping to ask whether they were producing any measurable results. And so the number of programs, the amounts spent and the types of services offered grew and spread throughout government.

How this happened is not a mystery. The temptation arises in every administration as bureaucrats strive to show how their programs might be supportive of and relevant to the initiative du jour coming from whomever occupies the White House or secretary's office. This helps them avoid severe reductions, the redirection of their funds elsewhere or receiving the ax. Contrary to conservatives' beliefs that the bureaucracy is unresponsive, the task force found them to be almost overly so.

The reality of this system is a mess. Over time, with this carte-blanche authority, the agencies began offering services in which they had no expertise. For example, the Departments of Defense and Agriculture are operating programs with pregnancy-prevention services. Health and Human Services offers academic services and job-training programs. Housing and Urban Development is running a youth-employment program. Meanwhile, pretty much everyone is funding their own substance-abuse prevention programs. These problems exist in every youth-serving agency.

A considerable bipartisan consensus has developed in support of the final report of the task force, with almost 350 groups from around the country mobilizing to express their support for a "Youth Initiative" to be established within the White House, one of the report's key recommendations. The new office (or coordinating council) would develop and coordinate policy, maximize interagency collaboration to use the significant expertise within specific agencies, coordinate federal research (the results of which are almost never fed back into future programs), and identify and elevate models that work. With this process, ineffective and duplicative programs could be identified and eliminated, and money could be saved.

Coordination should be mandatory with children's programs, because it's about what services an agency offers as well as who receives them. So while HHS is designed to house health and welfare programs, and Education has academic programs, both departments lay claim to serving migrant youth. And foster kids. And kids in the juvenile justice system. And Indian youth. And so on. Yet the agencies almost never talk to each other, nor are they fully aware of what the others are doing. Given this environment, it would be surprising if there were not any duplication, overlap and gaps in communication.

The Federal Youth Coordination Act (H.R. 856/S. 409) was passed by the House in late 2005 with a strong bipartisan majority. But the bill, which recently received the endorsement of the American Bar Association, has been stalled in the Senate. There is no good reason not to pass this bill, which could put some sanity into the process.

Cheaper Oil Lifts US Consumer Confidence (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

US consumer confidence recovered from August's nine-month low to post a stronger than expected gain this month as prices at petrol pumps fell sharply.

The consumer confidence index rose to 104.5, up from 100.2 in August. September's data came in above economists' expectations, according to Bloomberg, that this month's figure would stand at 103.

Consumers told researchers that there were more jobs available and that they expected to earn more in the coming months.

"The improvement is not a big surprise when placed in the context of the sharp slippage in gas prices at the pump recently," said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Oil prices reached an all time high in July and continued at a very high level through much of August. But on Tuesday futures in Brent crude hit their lowest level in six months.

"If there is any disappointing signal, it is tucked away in the plans to buy within 6 months section, where plans to buy homes new or lived in look very soft," Mr Ruskin said.

The slowdown in the housing market is continuing; on Monday data showed that prices of homes already built fell for the first time in 11 years.

The Federal Reserve has said that it decided to stop raising interest rates partly because it thought a correction in housing markets would help slow growth and bring down inflation.

But analysts said that, as yet, falling demand for new and lived-in housing and some evidence of price falls have failed to seriously effect the US economy.

"Though today's reported confidence bounce was hardly a surprise, it adds to the evidence that housing sector weakness is at least thus far still contained to this narrow sector," said Mike Englund of Action Economics. "If the drop in real estate market prospects is to have a psychological impact on consumer spending, then presumably it should similarly impact confidence."

The authors of the survey said that indications of a more buoyant mood among consumers would nevertheless have relatively little impact.

"Even though consumers' concerns have eased, there is little to suggest a significant change in economic activity as we enter the final quarter of 2006," said Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board Consumer Research Center.

By John McAuley

NEW YORK -- U.S. consumer confidence rebounded solidly in September although it failed to regain all of the ground lost in August, as consumers responded favorably to the decline in gasoline prices, a report released Tuesday indicated.

The Conference Board, a private research group, said its index of consumer confidence for September rose to 104.5 compared with the upward-revised 100.2 seen in August. The August number stood at 99.6 before the revision. The current month's reading was just above economists' expectations for a reading of 104.0, according to a survey of 23 economists conducted by Dow Jones Newswires.

"A more favorable assessment of current conditions coupled with a less pessimistic short-term outlook boosted consumer confidence this month," said Lynn Franco, who directed the survey. "However, even though consumers' concerns have eased, there is little to suggest a significant change in economic activity as we enter the final quarter of 2006."

The present situation index, a gauge of consumers' assessment of current economic conditions, rose to 127.7 from 123.9 the prior month. Consumer expectations for the state of economic activity over the next six months increased to 89.0 from 84.4 in August.

The Conference Board noted in the report that respondents who assess economic conditions as "good" increased to 27.4% in September from 26.2%, while those who termed current conditions as "bad" slipped to 15.4% from the 16.6% who held that view in August.

In a welcome development, consumers' outlook for the economy's performance over the next six months also edged higher in September. Those expecting economic conditions to worsen slipped to 10.6% from 12.9% in August, while those expecting improved business conditions increased to 16.3% from 16.2%.

The report noted that the outlook for labor market conditions was also a bit more favorable. Consumers expecting fewer jobs to become available in coming months decreased to 17.1% in September from 18.1% in the prior month, while those expecting more jobs edged up to 14.4% from 14.2%.

Assessment of current labor market conditions also improved. The share of respondents saying that jobs are "plentiful" increased to 25.9% from 24.5%, but those saying that jobs are "hard to get" also edged up to 21.3% from 21.1%.

The conference Board report is based on a survey of 5,000 households, conducted by mail. The deadline for responses was Sept. 19.

Consumers' Outlook On The Economy Slightly More Upbeat (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Consumer confidence rebounded from a nine-month low in September, though still hovering near one of the lowest levels of the year, according to Tuesday reports indicating moderate economic growth.

The New York-based Conference Board's consumer confidence index rose to 104.5 in September from 100.2 in August. The index had tumbled in late summer as gas prices rose.

The index, based on a monthly telephone survey of 5,000 households, showed consumers more upbeat about both current conditions and the outlook for six months from now. But survey officials said the improvement didn't spell an economic surge.

“Even though consumers' concerns have eased, there is little to suggest a significant change in economic activity as we enter the final quarter of 2006,” said Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board Consumer Research Center.

The Federal Reserve has said it expects the economy to downshift through the end of the year and into 2007. What's unknown is the extent of the softening and whether it will work to gradually reduce inflation, as the Fed predicts.

The share of consumers calling conditions “good” rose to 27.4% from 26.2%. Those assessing conditions as “bad” slipped to 15.4% from 16.6%.

But the number of consumers expecting to buy a house in the next six months slipped from 3.8% to 2.8%, the lowest in nine months. And the share expecting to buy major appliances or autos fell.

In some good news for the Fed, the report shows consumers expect lower inflation in the future than they did in August.

Steven Wood, chief economist of Insight Economics, says that while the numbers are an improvement, the longer-term trend indicates consumers are “much more optimistic about the present but still quite worried about the future.”

Consumer spending accounts for about two-thirds of the economy.

Also Tuesday, the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond said manufacturing activity in its area rose in September from the previous month, with strong new orders and shipments. At the same time, material costs were up and expected to keep increasing.

Last week, the Philadelphia Fed reported a slowdown in business activity in its region.

DOJ_NMG_0069894

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

The U.S.'s huge budget deficit threatens to make the country's economy less competitive, according to a study by the World Economic Forum, an institute in Switzerland.

The institute's annual study of global competitiveness says the U.S. economy is the sixth most-competitive in the world, slipping from first place in last year's ranking, a result of mediocre scores for its public finances.

Switzerland ranks No. 1 in this year's survey, thanks to what the forum sees as a combination of efficient public administration and flexible markets. Three Nordic countries -- Finland, Sweden and Denmark -- come next, followed by Singapore and the U.S. (See the full rankings1 and more from the report2.)

COUNTRY RANKINGS 2006-2007

1. Switzerland
2. Finland
3. Sweden
4. Denmark
5. Singapore
6. U.S.
7. Japan
8. Germany
9. Netherlands
10. U.K.
11. Hong Kong
12. Norway
13. Taiwan, China
14. Iceland
15. Israel

Source: Global Competitiveness Report, World Economic Forum

The competitiveness study ranks countries according to a range of criteria -- including macroeconomic policies, market regulations, technological development, education systems and public institutions -- that the forum believes influence an economy's level of productivity, and thereby its ability to sustain economic growth over many years. The ranking combines economic indicators with the findings from a survey of business executives.

"The U.S. remains a very competitive economy," said Augusto Lopez-Claros, the forum's chief economist. "It leads in innovation and patent registrations, has some of the best universities in the world, and it has extremely high levels of collaboration between universities and industry," he said. "However, how you manage your public finances is very important."

Serial budget deficits in the U.S. have led to rising public debt, which means an increasing portion of government spending goes toward debt service. That means less money is available for spending on infrastructure, schools or other investments that could boost productivity. Heavy government borrowing, which means competing for money in financial markets with the private sector, also tends to drive up businesses' borrowing costs.

Middling scores were awarded to the fast-growing emerging economies of the world considered to be changing the economic balance of power: India ranks 43rd out of 125 countries in the survey, China ranks 54th, Russia 62nd and Brazil 66th.

Russia and China, despite good scores for macroeconomic management, are marked down for a lack of transparency and even-handedness in their public institutions, including their bureaucracy and judiciary, and for protections for property rights. Brazil is making progress on improving its public finances, but at too slow a pace, according to Mr. Lopez-Claros. Of the four countries, only India improved its ranking in the survey this year.

Although many economists and investors believe economic output in these four countries will overtake that of most of the world's established economic powers by midcentury, the World Economic Forum is unfashionably downbeat, warning that the emerging economies' growth could hit barriers unless they develop more-efficient public institutions.

"There is maybe a bit of hype about these countries," Mr. Lopez-Claros said.

No Longer No. 1, And No Wonder (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

On the surface, two studies out this week seem to raise warning flags about the competitiveness of the U.S. economy.

One, the annual ranking from the World Economic Forum -- the elite business organization that runs the annual winter schmooze-fest in Davos, Switzerland -- finds that the United States has fallen from No. 1, a position it shared with Finland for most of a decade, to an unsettling sixth place.

And the National Association of Manufacturers, along with the Manufacturers Alliance, is scheduled to release an update of an earlier study today showing that the burdens of regulation, taxation, litigation and health care are even greater than they were in 2002, when the "cost gap" between U.S. companies and those of our largest trading partners was 22.4 percent.

The predictable response from the business community will be to use these studies to warn of impending economic ruin unless the government adopts the Republican agenda of less regulation, lower taxes, tort reform, and relieving companies of health-care and pension costs.

Don't be fooled. These reports speak to the embarrassing failure of a decade of Republican rule in improving U.S. competitiveness. Business taxes, as a percentage of anything you want to measure, are at their lowest level in decades. The Bush White House has subjected new regulations to rigorous cost-benefit analysis. Several reforms make it less attractive for shareholders, workers and consumers to file frivolous lawsuits, but not necessarily for businesses. And in case you hadn't noticed, businesses have already made tremendous strides in shifting health-care and pension costs to workers.

In fact, an alternative reading of the new reports suggests that the business community needs to do some serious thinking about competitiveness and economic policy.

Let's take the legal system, a negative in both reports. It ought to be obvious to anyone who has followed the asbestos debacle or the medical malpractice issue that litigation has become an inefficient way to police the behavior of companies, executives and service professionals. But the only realistic alternative is regulation by government, which the business community opposes. You can't have it both ways.

You can't, for example, just tell smokers they have no recourse against tobacco companies that market products they know to be deadly if you don't have a Food and Drug Administration with power to regulate unsafe tobacco products. You can't tell shareholders they have no right to sue management if you oppose regulations that might give shareholders a voice in who runs the company. You can't tell workers not to sue employers for unsafe workplaces while you're busy neutering the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

This isn't an economic argument so much as a political one. A totalitarian state such as China may be able to duck these kinds of trade-offs, and there is no doubt Chinese exporters are more competitive as a result. But that is not realistic for an advanced democracy whose citizens prefer to use some wealth, or forgo some economic efficiency, in exchange for safer products and workplaces and more responsive corporate governance.

Or consider the manufacturers' legitimate complaint that they are at a disadvantage because of health-care and pension costs that, in other countries, are borne largely by government. Having raised the issue, however, it is hypocritical for the business lobby to oppose any tax increase that might be used to socialize these costs. Their phony solution -- that average Americans should essentially fund their own pensions and health care, with no increase in wages -- is so unfair and unreliable that Americans have roundly rejected it.

Indeed, a reasonable inference from the World Economic Forum rankings is that the best way to compete is to adopt the Nordic model of high taxes, a generous social safety net and lightly regulated labor markets. Scandinavian government spending accounts for more than half the economy, as opposed to a third in the United States. But the reason the Nordic countries score higher in the WEF study is that their governments run surpluses instead of deficits, cave in to special interests less often, operate efficiently and spend their money wisely.

In contrast to the WEF study, the manufacturers' analysis is pretty lame. Comparing the regulatory and tax regimes of an advanced industrial country with those of developing Asian countries is specious. I assure you that no NAM member would have his children breathe Beijing's foul air for long. I also find it hard to believe that manufacturing executives pine for the tax and regulatory regimes of Europe or even Japan. The study's comparison of wholesale energy costs conveniently ignores the large fuel taxes imposed by European governments. And no doubt you'll be shocked to learn that the higher costs of U.S. executive compensation were left out of the analysis.

The business community's fantasy is that the United States would soar to the top of the rankings if only we had Ireland's tax regime, China's environmental controls, Singapore's legal system and Chile's social-safety net. Each policy is part of a complex social and economic model that includes features that Americans, and American business, would find unacceptable. These are package deals, not individual offerings at a dim sum lunch.

This is a crucial moment for the business lobby. Its close allies in the Republican Party may soon lose their exclusive grip on Washington's policy levers. Business leaders can stick with a reflexive anti-government, anti-tax, anti-regulation agenda that has hit a brick wall lately. Or they can move toward the bipartisan center, where they might actually strike a deal or two that could make their companies, and the country, more competitive.

Steven Pearlstein will host a Web discussion at 11 a.m. today athttp://washingtonpost.com. He can be reached atpearlsteins@washpost.com.

By E.S. Browning

Continuing a steady march higher that has stunned some Wall Street pundits, the Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to its second-highest finish, within 54 points of the record that dates from more than six years ago.

The immediate spur was a pair of U.S. economic reports that hinted at a desired "Goldilocks" economy -- not too hot and not too cold. The Dow industrials responded with a gain of 93.58 points, or 0.8%, to 11669.39. That surpassed the six-year high hit this past May and was the best close since the Dow industrials finished at their record 11722.98 on Jan. 14, 2000.

Investors seem to have overcome dueling fears that the economy would prove too hot -- forcing the Federal Reserve to continue raising interest rates and stifle growth -- or too cold, leading to disappointing corporate profits. Instead, recent inflation figures have come in slightly below expectations and recent data on consumer spending have been stronger than expected.

Yesterday, the Conference Board released its September survey of consumer sentiment, which was more robust than expected. The report reinforced recent hopes that falling gasoline prices will help keep consumer spending afloat despite the slumping housing market. Later in the day, the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond said economic activity in the Southeast has been improving. In addition, oil futures resumed their recent declines, falling 44 cents to $61.01 a barrel.

Investors looked past some signs of trouble, notably in the housing business. Home builder Lennar reported a 39% quarterly profit drop and cut its forecast for the new quarter, saying the worst probably isn't over. Home-improvement concern Lowe's said profits this year would be at the low end of expectations. Reflecting the market optimism, both stocks rose despite the news, as investors bet that falling mortgage rates and falling oil prices would give demand a lift.

A number of stock analysts have been surprised by the market's steady gains, which began in mid-July as investors rightly anticipated that the Fed was about to pause in its campaign of interest-rate increases. Skeptical analysts lately have been warning clients that, with the Dow industrials already up 8.9% for 2006, and with most of those gains logged in the past two months, stocks could be poised for a pullback.

With three trading days left in the quarter, the Dow industrials are up 2.5% for September and up 4.7% for the quarter. That means September is likely to be one of the year's strongest months, even though, on average, it historically has been the weakest month.

"People fear the train has left the station and they are running to jump on," said Alfred Kugel, chief investment strategist at Chicago investment-management group Atlantic Trust/Stein Roe. Two months ago, many investors feared that the economy was overheating, that inflation could force the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates higher, and that tensions with Iran could keep oil prices oppressively high, he said. Today, the economy has moderated, the Fed appears to be done raising rates, and oil prices are falling. People are buying stocks "because of the bad things that didn't happen," Mr. Kugel said, and that has created a "stealth rally" since mid-July.

The day's upbeat economic numbers stifled the recent bond rally, at least temporarily, since it was fears of economic weakness that had driven people to buy bonds. Bond prices fell and yields rose. But the yield of the 10-year Treasury note, at 4.589%, remained near the seven-month low hit on Monday. Bond yields influence other market interest rates, and their decline has been good news for businesses and consumers alike, making borrowing cheaper in many markets including parts of the mortgage market.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished at a 5½-year high of 1336.34, up 0.8%, or 9.97 points. It is up 7.1% this year and 5.2% so far this quarter. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.55%, or 12.27 points, to 2261.34, up 2.5% this year. It is up 4.1% for the quarter, having recovered some of its lost ground from the first half of the year. The S&P 500 and the Nasdaq composite both fell more heavily than the Dow during the bear market, however, and neither is near a record.

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 2,137 stocks rose and 1,188 fell. Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.29%, or 0.62 point, to 217.22.

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 11/32, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.589%. The 30-year bond was down 14/32 to yield 4.718%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 117.15 yen, up from 116.50, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2690 from $1.2759.

Clinton TV Interview Energizes GOP, Dems (AP-Y)

By Marc Humbert

AP, September 26, 2006

Former President Clinton's angry response to questions about Osama bin Laden has partisans of every persuasion certain it will energize voters in the elections and affect a possible presidential bid by his wife.

Conservatives immediately labeled the interview a prime example of the soap opera that would run daily should another Democrat — say, for example, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton — win the White House.

Not so, countered Democrats. They argued the former president's feisty dressing-down of Fox News' Chris Wallace is just the wake-up call the party's liberal base needed six weeks before the election, a pointed criticism of the Bush administration's bungled search for bin Laden.

Either way, don't expect the furor to subside any time soon.

"We should replay that interview as often as possible," chortled Republican strategist Nelson Warfield on Tuesday.

"In this election there's been a lot of worry among Republicans about whether our base is motivated and is going to turn out to vote," Warfield said. "Nothing motivates the Republican base more than some puffy pontification from Bill Clinton. When he has a little fit on TV, it reminds us of the future that awaits if the Democrats should ever win another national election."

In the exchange with Wallace, the former president contended that, unlike him, the newly installed Bush administration ignored bin Laden until the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

"They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try, they did not try," Clinton said in the interview broadcast Sunday. Clinton also attacked Wallace for a "conservative hit job" by asking about his administration's failure to get bin Laden.

In the wake of the interview, the Clinton camp denied he had lost his cool.

"That wasn't a question, it was an accusation," said Clinton spokesman Jay Carson. "He knew exactly what he was doing and we knew exactly what we were going to do if he did that, as we suspected he would. But it's not what we wanted."

President Bush did not respond directly to Clinton's charges at a news conference Tuesday, saying, "I've watched all this, you know, fingerpointing and, you know, namings of names and all that stuff. Our objective is to secure the country."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice challenged Clinton's claim that he did more than many of his conservative critics to pursue bin Laden and accused the former president of leaving no comprehensive plan to fight al-Qaida.

Sen. Clinton, often mentioned as the leading Democrat for a 2008 run, said her husband's fire will help Democrats as they try to take control of the House in November.

"I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks," the New York senator, who polls show is headed for easy re-election, said Tuesday.

The former president largely is seen as an asset to his wife if she seeks the Democratic nomination, a potential drawback in a general election in which the name Clinton elicits strong feelings on both sides.

Still immensely popular with the party's base, he is a key draw at fundraisers and a masterful political strategist. In fact, the heated exchange represented something of a departure for an ex-president who, in recent months, has been largely content to boost his wife's stature.

"I do believe that if elected she would be magnificent" as president, he told the New Yorker magazine just before she crushed anti-Iraq war activist Jonathan Tasini in a September primary.

There is a lack of agreement on whether the former president really did know what he was up to by taking on Wallace with such vehemence.

But fellow conservative William Kristol, writing Monday for The Weekly Standard, suggested Clinton might have been laying out a battle plan for Democrats to fight Republican charges that they are "unreliable in the war on terror."

And, as Kristol noted, "Hillary Clinton has been having problems with the left wing of the Democratic Party. With this interview, Bill Clinton has the entire left wing of the Democratic Party rallying to him."

Still others say Clinton's outburst could cut both ways.

"I think he knew what he was doing. And, I think he lost his temper," said Democratic strategist Hank Sheinkopf, who worked on Clinton's successful 1996 re-election effort.

Sheinkopf called Clinton's performance "a two-edged sword" for Democrats, reminding voters of charges that the party is soft on terrorism but also demonstrating that the last Democratic president wasn't against using force.

"Clinton had no option but to defend the Democrats and defend his performance," Sheinkopf said.

If nothing else, the interview served to again put the other Clinton back in the spotlight at a time when much of the attention has shifted to his wife.

No big deal, said Sheinkopf.

"We're two years away from 2008," the Democrat said.

Warfield disagreed.

"It's part of this huge collection of baggage she hauls with her into a national campaign," the GOP strategist said. "Do voters really want to go back into four years of the national soap opera that is the Clintons in the White House?"

Sen. Clinton Hits Back At Rice Over 9/11 (AP-Y)

AP, September 26, 2006

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton hit back at Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday as the political fighting escalated over which president — Bill Clinton or George W. Bush — missed more opportunities to prevent the Sept. 11 attacks.

Clinton, D-N.Y., took aim at President Bush and Rice over their roles in 2001 before the attacks, part of the growing argument touched off after Bill Clinton gave a combative interview on "Fox News Sunday" in which he defended his efforts to kill Osama bin Laden.

"I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks," Hillary Clinton said. "I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined To Attack Inside the United States' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team."

The senator was referring to a classified brief given to Bush in August 2001, one that Democrats say showed the Bush administration did not do enough to combat the growing threat from al-Qaida.

When the brief was delivered, Rice was Bush's national security adviser, and Clinton's response was clearly designed to implicate her in the same criticisms that have been made of Bush.

Clinton's response came a day after Rice denied Bill Clinton's claim in the television interview that the Bush administration had not aggressively pursued al-Qaida before the attacks of 2001.

"What we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years," Rice said during a meeting with editors and reporters at the New York Post. "The notion somehow for eight months the Bush administration sat there and didn't do that is just flatly false, and I think the 9/11 commission understood that."

"We were not left a comprehensive strategy to fight al-Qaida," she told the newspaper, which is owned by News Corp., the company that owns Fox News Channel.

The former president became furious during the television interview when asked why he did not do more to fight al-Qaida.

"That's the difference in me and some, including all of the right-wingers who are attacking me now," Clinton said in the interview. "They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try. They did not try."

The interview has been the focus of much attention, earning the show its best ratings in nearly three years.

Rice questioned the value of the dialogue.

"I think this is not a very fruitful discussion," she said. "We've been through it. The 9/11 commission has turned over every rock, and we know exactly what they said."

Clinton Defends Husband's Tack, Adding That All Democrats Should Take A Hint (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — The war of words between the Bush administration and the Clintons intensified on Tuesday as Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton suggested that her husband would have reacted differently as president if he had heard the same warnings about Osama bin Laden's plans that President Bush had access to before 9/11.

In unusually blunt terms, Senator Clinton questioned the current administration's response to an intelligence briefing President Bush received about a month before the 9/11 attacks. It mentioned that Al Qaeda was intent on striking the United States using hijacked planes.

"I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States,' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team," she said during an appearance on Capitol Hill.

The comments by Senator Clinton ratcheted up an already bitter exchange of charges between the Bush and Clinton camps over how the two administrations responded to the threat posed by Al Qaeda before the attacks, which occurred nearly eight months into the Bush presidency.

In her remarks, Senator Clinton also suggested that Bill Clinton's animated defense of his own national security record as president, delivered only a few days earlier, provided a powerful example for Democrats, whom Republicans have sought to portray in recent national elections as too weak to lead the country in such perilous times.

"I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks," she said.

The skirmishing began on Sunday, when Mr. Clinton, in a combative interview on "Fox News Sunday," vigorously defended his handling of the threat posed by Mr. bin Laden, then suggested that the Bush administration had failed to grasp the threat in the months leading to 9/11.

Then, on Monday, in a meeting with editors and reporters of The New York Post, Mr. Bush's secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, struck back. She accused Mr. Clinton of making "flatly false" claims about the Bush administration's efforts to stop Mr. bin

Laden and disputing Mr. Clinton's assertion that he had "left a comprehensive antiterror strategy" for Mr. Bush and his advisers as they prepared to take office in 2001.

The battle between the Clintons and the Bush administration comes against the backdrop of the Congressional elections, with some Republican leaders arguing that their party's tough antiterror policies have helped protect the nation against further attacks.

In his television appearance, a visibly angry Mr. Clinton said that the Bush administration demoted his terrorism czar, Richard A. Clarke, who had argued for aggressive action against Al Qaeda and Mr. bin Laden before 9/11.

Mr. Clinton also accused his interviewer, Chris Wallace of Fox News, of orchestrating "a conservative hit job" on him by raising questions about his antiterrorism efforts.

"I want to know how many people in the Bush administration you asked, 'Why didn't you do anything about the Cole?' " Mr. Clinton said, referring to the bombing in October 2000 of the United States destroyer Cole in Yemen. Mr. bin Laden and Al Qaeda have been linked to that attack.

President Bush refused to respond directly to Mr. Clinton's criticism on Tuesday, saying instead: "I've watched all this finger-pointing and naming of names and all that stuff. I don't have enough time to finger-point. I've got to do my job, which comes home every day in the Oval Office, and that is to protect the American people from further attack."

The Republican National Committee mocked Senator Clinton's defense of her husband's administration. "For Mrs. Clinton to insinuate that the same administration that repeatedly missed opportunities to stop bin Laden would be better equipped to protect America is absurd," said Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the committee.

But Philippe Reines, a spokesman for Senator Clinton, noted that the 9/11 Commission Report found that after President Clinton received intelligence warnings in 1998, he immediately mobilized his National Security Council, the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. while also increasing security and putting airports and airlines on high alert. By contrast, he said, the commission found no indication of any further discussion before Sept. 11 among President Bush and his top advisers of the possibility of a threat of an attack by Al Qaeda in the United States, even after Mr. Bush received an August 2001 briefing that Mr. bin Laden intended to attack inside the United States.

For Senator Clinton, who is considered a possible contender for the presidency in 2008, her comments on Tuesday were unusually personal in tone. But Howard Wolfson, one of her chief advisers, made it clear that Senator Clinton would be taking an increasingly aggressive posture to thwart any Republican attempts to cast Democrats as timid on national defense this election season.

"She is not going to allow her party, her husband or herself to get Swift-boated," he said, referring to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, a group that attacked the Vietnam War record of Senator John Kerry when he was the Democrats' presidential nominee in 2004. "Democrats have to stand up and go toe to toe with Republicans on national security."

Senator Clinton made her comments at a news conference on the Hill, where Democrats argued that President Bush's handling of the war in Iraq and its aftermath had actually made America more vulnerable to terrorist attacks.

"Their policies are failing, our military is breaking and the American people are demanding a change," she said. "The administration has lost focus on winning the war on Iraq, and all Washington Republicans can focus on is winning elections here at home."

Bush And Clinton Teams Debate Pre-9/11 Efforts (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The election-year debate over terrorism has triggered a full-blown spat between the camps of President Bush and former president Bill Clinton as the two sides trade barbs over who was more responsible for failing to disrupt al-Qaeda before it could attack the United States on Sept. 11, 2001.

Bush complained yesterday that Clinton was engaging in "finger-pointing" by attacking the current administration's actions before the hijackings. "I don't have enough time to finger-point," Bush said. But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice did, calling Clinton's version of events "flatly false." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) returned fire on his behalf, asserting that he would have paid more attention to intelligence warnings in the weeks before the attacks than Bush did.

The unusual crossfire over the past few days effectively broke a tacit peace between the 42nd and 43rd presidents that has reigned for most of the past two years. Ever since Bush tapped Bill Clinton to work with his father, George H.W. Bush, on relief efforts after the Asian tsunamis of December 2004, the two have grown closer. Clinton and the older Bush teamed up again on Hurricane Katrina relief, and the president talked about growing to like his predecessor.

But with the hotly contested midterm elections just weeks away, Bush has tried to focus the nation's attention on the threat of terrorism, and Clinton has become more irritated at what he sees as attacks on his performance. The recent ABC miniseries "Path to 9/11" especially irked the former president because of what he saw as a skewed portrayal blaming him for not doing more to get Osama bin Laden.

Clinton, when asked about the matter on "Fox News Sunday," erupted in an angry, red-faced, finger-jabbing performance that has electrified the left and outraged the right. Clinton said that though he failed, at least he tried to kill bin Laden while Bush did not. "They had eight months to try," Clinton said. "They did not try. I tried."

Rice bristled at that in an interview in yesterday's New York Post. "The notion somehow for eight months the Bush administration sat there and didn't do that is just flatly false, and I think the 9/11 commission understood that," she said. "What we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years."

Hillary Clinton pointed to the intelligence memo presented to Bush in August 2001. "I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States,' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team," she said.

And Jay Carson, a spokesman for Bill Clinton, rejected Rice's contention: "Every single fact that President Clinton stated in his interview is backed up by the historical record -- including the 9/11 commission report. Everything President Clinton said was flatly correct."

Some of Clinton's statements on Fox have drawn scrutiny. He said that after the bombing of the USS Cole in 2000, "I had battle plans drawn to go into Afghanistan, overthrow the Taliban and launch a full-scale attack search for bin Laden. But we needed basing rights in Uzbekistan." The Sept. 11 commission, though, found no plans for an invasion of Afghanistan or for an operation to topple the Taliban, just more limited options such as plans for attacks with cruise missiles or Special Forces. And nothing in the panel's report indicated that a lack of basing rights in Uzbekistan prevented a military response.

Clinton also asserted that the Bush administration "didn't have a single meeting about bin Laden for the nine months after I left office." In fact, the Bush team held several meetings on terrorism through the interagency group known as the deputies committee and one on Sept. 4, 2001, through the principals committee composed of Cabinet officers. What Clinton may have been referring to was counterterrorism chief Richard A. Clarke's frustration that the principals disregarded his urgent calls to meet sooner because of a months-long policy review.

Rice came under fire for her assertion that "we were not left a comprehensive strategy to fight al-Qaeda" by Clinton's team. In fact, Clarke sent Rice an al-Qaeda memo on Jan. 25, 2001, along with a strategy to "roll back" the terrorist network, but the Bush team decided to conduct the policy review.

Another Clinton Seduction (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

At least Jerry Falwell didn't say Hillary smelled of sulfur.

But he did say that if she runs for president, she will bedevil evangelicals and fire them up to vote Republican with a dark force exceeding even Lucifer.

I suppose, since Senator Clinton's shrill right-wing critics usually portray her as a witch, being promoted to devil can count as a feminist triumph. And she's in good bipartisan company with the president, who was also cast as the devil by a world-class nutbar.

Hillary is morphing from workhorse back to show horse, paving the way for her historic presidential race with a series of big policy speeches. And she is taking on the other dynasty more energetically.

"I'm certain that if my husband and his security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States,' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team," she crisply told reporters on Capitol Hill yesterday.

Forty years after feminism brashly burst forth, female leaders are still struggling to figure out how to blend sexuality and strength in a way that will not backfire. Consider Hewlett-Packard, the progressive Silicon Valley company. Carly Fiorina was fired as chairman and chief executive after a stereotypically alpha male reign, while Patricia Dunn lost her job as chairman after she used what some critics called a stereotypical "Mean Girls" subterfuge to spy on male board members rather than confronting them directly over leaks.

Hillary is also trying different methods, searching for the key that would allow her to break into the ultimate mahogany-paneled men's club at 1600 Penn. She will try to get back to the West Wing based not on what she has done in the Senate, but on how she has done it.

She has been like a silent-film star, lacking a voice in this chilling time when the Bush administration has Photoshopped the Constitution, portrayed critics as traitors, and spurred terrorism with a misconceived and mismanaged war in Iraq.

Explaining why she had not taken any unpopular stances and championed no big ideas, Hillary answered Joshua Green more like diva than devil in the upcoming cover story for The Atlantic Monthly: "Everything I do carries political risk because nobody gets the scrutiny that I get. It's not like I have any margin for error whatsoever."

She has transformed her method from bulldozing alpha in the White House — high-handed, unilateral and insensitive on health care — to coalition-building gamma in Congress. Now the woman who hated being called first lady charms with the most handkerchief-dropping feminine wiles and stratagems, from fetching coffee for senior male Senate colleagues to stepping to the background so that preening male peacocks can hog the live shot.

As one of her male aides bragged to Mr. Green, it's so effective because the men who tried to impeach her husband don't expect the former first lady of the United States "to ask if you want two lumps of sugar."

"Fetching coffee, I think, is too much," said Michael Morris of the Columbia Business School. "But any good politician is a good flirt. Bill Clinton seduced every woman and every man he met."

One Hillary aide recently crowed to me about the surprising number of her male colleagues who have crushes on her. And the Rev. Falwell may have missed her bonding with conservative lawmakers at Hill prayer breakfasts. As Mr. Green writes, Hillary and Sam Brownback worked together on legislation after the Kansas conservative gave testimony at a prayer breakfast that he realized it was a sin to have trashed her.

It may not be turning the other cheek for Hillary, so much as triangulating the other cheek. "The Warrior," as her staff calls her, has not forgotten what she learned from her consort. The Clintons once polled on where to go on vacation when they were in the White House (Dick Morris advised that a camping trip would play well with swing voters), and now Mr. Green reports that the Clintons moved to Chappaqua at least partly in response to polling data.

He also writes that in 2003, the pollster Mark Penn created a 007-secret team to determine whether Hillary could break her pledge to serve a full Senate term and still have enough political clout to wage a presidential run — an assertion that Mr. Penn neither confirmed nor denied.

It may not smell of sulfur, but it smacks of truth.

What President Clinton Didn't Do . . . (WSJ)

By Richard Miniter

DOJ_NMG_0069903

Bill Clinton's outburst on Fox News was something of a public service, launching a debate about the antiterror policies of his administration. This is important because every George W. Bush policy that arouses the ire of Democrats -- the Patriot Act, extraordinary rendition, detention without trial, pre-emptive war -- is a departure from his predecessor. Where policies overlap -- air attacks on infrastructure, secret presidential orders to kill terrorists, intelligence sharing with allies, freezing bank accounts, using police to arrest terror suspects -- there is little friction. The question, then, is whether America should return to Mr. Clinton's policies or soldier on with Mr. Bush's.

It is vital that this debate be honest, but so far this has not been the case. Both Mr. Clinton's outrage at Chris Wallace's questioning and the ABC docudrama "The Path to 9/11" are attempts to polarize the nation's memory. While this divisiveness may be good for Mr. Clinton's reputation, it is ultimately unhealthy for the country. What we need, instead, is a cold-eyed look at what works against terrorists and what does not. The policies of the Clinton and Bush administrations ought to be put to the same iron test.

With that in mind, let us examine Mr. Clinton's war on terror. Some 38 days after he was sworn in, al Qaeda attacked the World Trade Center. He did not visit the twin towers that year, even though four days after the attack he was just across the Hudson River in New Jersey, talking about job training. He made no attempt to rally the public against terrorism. His only public speech on the bombing was a few paragraphs inserted into a radio address mostly devoted an economic stimulus package. Those stray paragraphs were limited to reassuring the public and thanking the rescuers, the kinds of things governors say after hurricanes. He did not even vow to bring the bombers to justice. Instead, he turned the first terrorist attack on American soil over to the FBI.

In his Fox interview, Mr. Clinton said "no one knew that al Qaeda existed" in October 1993, during the tragic events in Somalia. But his national security adviser, Tony Lake, told me that he first learned of bin Laden "sometime in 1993," when he was thought of as a terror financier. U.S. Army Capt. James Francis Yacone, a black hawk squadron commander in Somalia, later testified that radio intercepts of enemy mortar crews firing at Americans were in Arabic, not Somali, suggesting the work of bin Laden's agents (who spoke Arabic), not warlord Farah Aideed's men (who did not). CIA and DIA reports also placed al Qaeda operatives in Somalia at the time.

By the end of Mr. Clinton's first year, al Qaeda had apparently attacked twice. The attacks would continue for every one of the Clinton years.

• In 1994, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed (who would later plan the 9/11 attacks) launched "Operation Bojinka" to down 11 U.S. planes simultaneously over the Pacific. A sharp-eyed Filipina police officer foiled the plot. The sole American response: increased law-enforcement cooperation with the Philippines.

• In 1995, al Qaeda detonated a 220-pound car bomb outside the Office of Program Manager in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, killing five Americans and wounding 60 more. The FBI was sent in.

• In 1996, al Qaeda bombed the barracks of American pilots patrolling the "no-fly zones" over Iraq, killing 19. Again, the FBI responded.

• In 1997, al Qaeda consolidated its position in Afghanistan and bin Laden repeatedly declared war on the U.S. In February, bin Laden told an Arab TV network: "If someone can kill an American soldier, it is better than wasting time on other matters." No response from the Clinton administration.

• In 1998, al Qaeda simultaneously bombed U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, killing 224, including 12 U.S. diplomats. Mr. Clinton ordered cruise-missile strikes on Afghanistan and Sudan in response. Here Mr. Clinton's critics are wrong: The president was right to retaliate when America was attacked, irrespective of the Monica Lewinsky case.

Still, "Operation Infinite Reach" was weakened by Clintonian compromise. The State Department feared that Pakistan might spot the American missiles in its air space and misinterpret it as an Indian attack. So Mr. Clinton told Gen. Joe Ralston, vice chairman of Joint Chiefs of Staff, to notify Pakistan's army minutes before the Tomahawks passed over Pakistan. Given Pakistan's links to jihadis at the time, it is not surprising that bin Laden was tipped off, fleeing some 45 minutes before the missiles arrived.

• In 1999, the Clinton administration disrupted al Qaeda's Millennium plots, a series of bombings stretching from Amman to Los Angeles. This shining success was mostly the work of Richard Clarke, a NSC senior director who forced agencies to work together. But the Millennium approach was shortlived. Over Mr. Clarke's objections, policy reverted to the status quo.

• In January 2000, al Qaeda tried and failed to attack the U.S.S. The Sullivans off Yemen. (Their boat sank before they could reach their target.) But in October 2000, an al Qaeda bomb ripped a hole in the hull of the U.S.S. Cole, killing 17 sailors and wounding another 39.

When Mr. Clarke presented a plan to launch a massive cruise missile strike on al Qaeda and Taliban facilities in Afghanistan, the Clinton cabinet voted against it. After the meeting, a State Department counterterrorism official, Michael Sheehan, sought out Mr. Clarke. Both told me that they were stunned. Mr. Sheehan asked Mr. Clarke: "What's it going to take to get them to hit al Qaeda in Afghanistan? Does al Qaeda have to attack the Pentagon?"

There is much more to Mr. Clinton's record -- how Predator drones, which spotted bin Laden three times in 1999 and 2000, were grounded by bureaucratic infighting; how a petty dispute with an Arizona senator stopped the CIA from hiring more Arabic translators. While it is easy to look back in hindsight and blame Bill Clinton, the full scale and nature of the terrorist threat was not widely appreciated until 9/11. Still: Bill Clinton did not fully grasp that he was at war. Nor did he intuit that war requires overcoming bureaucratic objections and a democracy's natural reluctance to use force. That is a hard lesson. But it is better to learn it from studying the Clinton years than reliving them.

New Campaign Ads Have A Theme: Don't Be Nice (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Republicans and Democrats began showing at least 30 new campaign advertisements in contested House and Senate districts across the country on Tuesday. Of those, three were positive.

For Republicans, it was the leading edge of a wave of negative advertisements against Democratic candidates, the product of more than a year of research into the personal and professional backgrounds of Democratic challengers.

"What do we really know about Angie Paccione?" an announcer asks about a Democratic challenger in Colorado. "Angie Paccione had 10 legal claims against her for bad debts and campaign violations. A court even ordered her wages garnished."

For Democrats, it was part of a barrage intended to tie Republican incumbents to an unpopular Congress, criticize their voting records, portray them as captives to special interests and highlight embarrassing moments from their business histories.

In Tennessee, Democrats attacked Bob Corker, a Republican candidate for Senate, saying his construction company had hired illegal immigrants "while he looked the other way."

The result of the dueling accusations has been what both sides described on Tuesday as the most toxic midterm campaign environment in memory. It is a jarring blend of shadowy images, breathless announcers, jagged music and a dizzying array of statistics, counterstatistics and vote citations — all intended to present the members of Congress and their challengers in the worst possible light. Democratic and Republican strategists said they expected over 90 percent of the advertisements to be broadcast by Nov. 7 to be negative.

At the national level, the two parties are battling over issues like national security and the war in Iraq. But Congressional races play out on local airwaves, and the flood of commercials amounts to a parallel campaign, one that is often about the characters of individual challengers and obscure votes cast by incumbents. Frequently lost in the back-and-forth are the protests of candidates who say the negative advertisements are full of deliberate distortions and exaggerations.

While Democrats have largely concentrated their efforts on the political records of Republicans, the Republicans have zeroed in more on candidates' personal backgrounds.

Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said his investigators had been looking into prospective Democratic challengers since the summer of 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0069905

"These candidates have been out there doing other things — they have never seen anything like this before," Mr. Reynolds said of the Democratic challengers.

"We haven't even begun to unload this freight train," Mr. Reynolds said.

Democrats are learning just how deeply the Republicans have been digging. John Yarmuth, a Kentucky Democrat who is running for a House seat, has spent much of the past few days trying to explain editorials unearthed by Republican researchers and spotlighted in new advertisements. Mr. Yarmuth wrote the editorials for his student newspapers, and in them he advocated the legalization of marijuana, among other things.

Across the airwaves, Democratic challengers are being attacked for having defaulted on student loans, declaring bankruptcy, skipping out on tax bills, and being a lobbyist, a trial lawyer or, even worse, a liberal.

Steve Kagan, a doctor and Democrat running for Congress in Wisconsin, is being attacked for having sued patients who did not pay their bills. "Why not just tell the truth, Dr. Millionaire?" said an advertisement shown Tuesday.

Heath Shuler, the former Washington Redskins quarterback running for Congress as a Democrat in North Carolina, is being attacked in advertisements for owning a business that was late in paying $69,000 in back taxes.

Democrats are equally aggressive in their advertisements, going after Republicans on votes, ties to campaign contributors and, in the case of challengers, their own personal foibles. In one Democratic advertisement, the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff is shown in shadows wearing a hat as an announcer notes that he made contributions to Representative J. D. Hayworth, Republican of Arizona.

Democrats are even attacking Republicans on what should be their signature issue, taxes, most recently in an upstate New York race between State Senator Raymond A. Meier, a Republican, and Michael A. Arcuri, a Democrat, to fill an open Republican seat. "Raymond Meier raised taxes in Oneida County," the announcer says. "Meier raised taxes in Albany. What do you think he'll do" in Washington?

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that relatively inexperienced candidates might be vulnerable, but that Republicans had even worse problems this year, with a record of votes that he said had provided a steady stream of damaging information for Democratic campaigns.

"Let me tell you: candidates with lesser name identification are vulnerable to being defined," Mr. Emanuel said. "But candidates who are associated with an institution are also vulnerable. There are two sides to this sword."

While some public officials have criticized negative advertisements as destructive and blamed them for discouraging voter turnout, other analysts say they have come, if only by default, to play an important role. At a time of diminishing local news coverage of House and Senate races, they are one of the few ways in which voters learn about the candidates and their positions.

"Negative ads are more likely to talk about policy than positive ads," said Joel Rivlin, deputy director of the Wisconsin Advertising Project, which monitors political advertising. "How else do you find out about the flaws of a candidate besides a negative ad?"

Incumbent Republicans and, to a lesser extent, Democrats are being attacked on their voting records and positions taken on issues large and small.

With dollar figures scrolling across the screen, Democrats belittled Republicans for taking money from oil companies, suggesting that was a reason for high gasoline prices. "Drake voted for billions in tax breaks for the oil and gas industry," said a Democratic advertisement aimed at Representative Thelma Drake, Republican of Virginia. "She gets her way, big oil and gas get theirs."

In a blizzard of conflicting advertisements, Republicans and Democrats in all regions of the country are accusing one another of supporting amnesty for illegal immigrants or providing government benefits to them.

Bruce Braley, a Democratic candidate for a House seat in Iowa, attacked his opponent, Mike Whalen, on Social Security. "He actually backed George Bush's half-baked plan to privatize Social Security," an advertisement said. Mr. Whalen accused Mr. Braley, in his own advertisement, of wanting to pull out of Iraq and thus "risk the safety of our troops to advance his extreme liberal agenda."

Mr. Emanuel said he had warned his candidates about this part of the campaign, though he made a practice of waiting until after they had signed on to run. “I tell them: ‘I’m glad you’re running. Now get ready. This is a tough business. This is the hellfire you are going to go through,’ ” he said.

Mr. Reynolds has long believed that it would be this kind of information about Democratic challengers and not voter opinion on, say, President Bush or the war in Iraq that would determine whether Republicans held Congress this year. By way of example, he pointed to the case of Mr. Shuler.

“When he was a quarterback, it didn’t matter that he wasn’t paying $69,000 in taxes,” Mr. Reynolds said. “When you run for Congress, it matters.”

Mr. Reynolds burst out laughing when asked why he was not using more positive advertisements. “If they moved things to the extent that negative ads move things, there would be more of them,” he said.

Why Some Republicans Want To Lose (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

WASHINGTON -- As the White House and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill work to retain control of Congress in November's elections, a small but vocal band of conservative iconoclasts say they would prefer to see their own party lose.

The array of former members of Congress and officials from Republican administrations dating to the 1970s are using opinion articles, speeches and interviews to make the surprising -- and, to many of their friends and colleagues, near-heretical -- argument that it would be better for the country if their party lost. Some say they plan to vote Democratic for the first time in their lives. The Republican rebels say the modern Republican Party has so abandoned its conservative beliefs that it deserves to be defeated by the Democrats.

Three factors are driving the conservative backlash against the Republican-led Congress. Fiscal hawks are furious about the growth of the federal government. Conservative lawyers such as Bruce Fein, who worked in the Nixon Justice Department and Reagan Federal Communications Commission, are upset that Congress allowed President Bush to claim expansive powers to eavesdrop on American citizens and detain suspected militants without trial. Others say the war in Iraq is a costly diversion from the war on terror.

Other Republicans couch their desire for Republican losses in political terms, arguing that Democratic control of Congress for at least two years would increase the chances of Republicans retaining the presidency in 2008, by giving Republican candidates high-profile Democratic targets.

"Every Republican I know thinks Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid are the best things they have going for them," wrote Bruce Bartlett, a Treasury Department official during the presidency of Mr. Bush's father, referring to the top-ranking Democrats in the House and Senate. "Giving these inept leaders higher profiles would be a gift to conservatives everywhere," he added in an essay, part of a series by conservatives published recently in Washington Monthly magazine, under the heading: "Time for us to go."

"Republicans need a wake-up call," Joe Scarborough, a former Republican congressman who now hosts an MSNBC talk show, says in an interview. "We ran in 1994 against runaway spending, exploding deficits and corruption. But with Republicans in charge of both sides of Pennsylvania Avenue, what do we have? The same runaway spending, record deficits and culture of corruption." He uses his show as a forum for those views and has published two essays on the theme.

Most Republicans, of course, don't think it is time for the party to go anywhere and are irked at those who suggest otherwise. Mr. Scarborough says that after his essay was published in Washington Monthly, his invitation to serve as master of ceremonies at a congressional fund-raiser with President Bush was revoked under White House pressure. A White House spokeswoman says the administration decided "that there were better options for an emcee" at the event.

Even many conservative critics of the current Congress say they plan to hold their noses and work to retain Republican majorities in the House and the Senate, arguing that Democrats can't be trusted to keep the country safe from terrorism or to sustain economic growth.

And White House officials wouldn't welcome the stream of subpoenas and investigations that could come from Democratic-controlled congressional committees.

The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-policy advocacy group, says it will give $20 million this election cycle to Republicans who share its antitax beliefs, regardless of the candidates' chances of winning a general election. The group backed conservative challenger Steve Laffey's unsuccessful primary campaign against moderate Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, despite the Republican establishment's belief that Mr. Laffey was unelectable.

Pat Toomey, president of the Club for Growth, says the group would be happy to see Republican moderates lose -- Club for Growth declines to support Mr. Chafee in what is expected to be a tight race against his Democratic challenger -- but stops short of campaigning against Mr. Chafee and other Republicans in the general election,

"Being Republican has to stand for more than having an 'R' after your name, and if that puts some seats in jeopardy, so be it," Mr. Toomey says. "But accept losing the Republican majority altogether? I just can't quite go there yet."

Mr. Scarborough, for his part, says he can "build a strong intellectual argument" for voting Democratic but can't bring himself to actually do so.

For the moment, Democrats appear less fractured than their rivals across the aisle. Many Democrats are so eager for an electoral victory that they are pragmatically backing candidates they once might have shunned.

Some Republicans, by contrast, having tasted congressional power for 12 years now -- and control of the House, the Senate and the White House for nearly six -- are ready to try being the opposition. Mr. Fein, the former Reagan and Nixon appointee, describes himself as a lifelong conservative who has voted for Republican candidates all his life and is disgusted by Democratic support for affirmative action -- which he sees as institutionalized racism -- and economic populism.

But he says that congressional Republicans have forfeited their right to control both chambers by failing to confront Mr. Bush over his expression of executive power, his interpretation of due process and habeas corpus, and his willingness to ignore legislation that he sees as an infringement of his war-fighting powers.

"A Democratic Congress will obviously not be promoting a conservative agenda, but at least they'll have the incentive, which is critical right now, to exercise oversight and restraint on the president," he says. "And that's much, much more than you can say for the Republicans who currently run Congress."

Mr. Fein recently bought a home in Florida and says he is scrambling to register to vote there in November, when he plans to do something he has never done before: cast a ballot for a Democrat. He says Democratic candidate Christine Jennings, who is running to fill the House seat vacated by Republican Senate candidate Katherine Harris, is "just the type of moderate I like."

Marriage Gap Could Sway Elections (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, September 27, 2006

House districts held by Republicans are full of married people. Democratic districts are stacked with people who have never married. This “marriage gap” could play a role in the Nov. 7 congressional elections. Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to take control of the House of Representatives.

Twenty-seven of the 38 Republican-held districts with seats considered vulnerable by independent political analysts have fewer married people than found in the average GOP district. The USA TODAY analysis also shows that:

•Republicans control 49 of the 50 districts with the highest rates of married people.

•Democrats represent all 50 districts that have the highest rates of adults who have never married.

The political tug-of-war is between people who are married and those who have never been.

The “never married” group covers a variety of groups who form the Democratic base: young people, those who marry late in life, single parents, gays, and heterosexuals who live together.

The marriage divide drew attention in the 2004 presidential race. President Bush beat John Kerry by 15 percentage points among married people and lost by 18 percentage points among unmarried people, according to an exit poll conducted by national news media organizations.

Most serious Democratic challenges this fall are in Republican-controlled House districts that have lower marriage rates.

For example, the two seats most likely to switch from Republican to Democratic are Arizona's 8th District and Colorado's 7th District, according to the non-partisan National Journal. The districts — in which Republican incumbents are not seeking re-election — rank 251st and 307th respectively in marriage rates among the 435 districts.

Of the five Republicans who have the lowest rates of married people in their districts, four are in tough battles with Democrats. On the other side, Rep. Melissa Bean, D-Ill., whose district has a high marriage rate, faces a strong GOP challenge.

Rep. John Linder, R-Ga., whose district has the highest marriage rate (66.1%), says the gap exists because "people get more conservative when they settle down." Democratic pollster Mark Mellman says the gap is magnified because a greater percentage of married people vote than unmarried people.

'Fertility Gap' Helps Explain Political Divide (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, September 27, 2006

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, a Catholic mother of five from San Francisco, has fewer children in her district than any other member of Congress: 87,727.

These two extremes reflect a stark demographic divide between the congressional districts controlled by the major political parties.

Republican House members overwhelmingly come from districts that have high percentages of married people and lots of children, according to a USA TODAY analysis of 2005 Census Bureau data released last month.

GOP Congress members represent 39.2 million children younger than 18, about 7 million more than Democrats. Republicans average 7,000 more children per district.

Many Democrats represent areas that have many single people and relatively few children. Democratic districts that have large numbers of children tend to be predominantly Hispanic or, to a lesser extent, African-American.

This "fertility gap" is crucial to understanding the differences between liberals and conservatives, says Arthur Brooks, a professor of public administration at Syracuse University. These childbearing patterns shape divisions over issues such as welfare, education and child tax credits, he says.

"Both sides are very pro-kids. They just express it in different ways," Brooks says. "Republicans are congenial to traditional families, which is clearly the best way for kids to grow up. But there are some kids who don't have that advantage, and Democrats are very concerned with helping those kids."

Children in Democratic districts are far more likely to live in poverty and with single parents than kids in GOP districts.

Rep. José Serrano, D-N.Y., has 227,246 children in his Bronx district, the 10th most in the House. Only 29% of those children live with married parents.

By contrast, 84% of children in Cannon's central Utah district live with married parents.

Cannon used to have a locker next to Serrano at the congressional gym and considers him a friend. "The needs of kids in his district are just not the same as the needs of children in my district," Cannon says.

Marriage and parenthood define what's different about Democratic and Republican districts even more clearly than race, income, education or geography, USA TODAY's analysis of Census data found.

For example, Republicans represent seven of the 50 districts that have the highest concentrations of blacks. Both parties are well represented among affluent and well-educated districts.

Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., who represents the most-married Democratic district (32nd overall), discounts the importance of the marriage rates. "It's a statistic without meaning," he says. "If you look at numbers from enough different angles, you can see almost anything."

Pelosi says in speeches that her most important concern is "the children, the children, the children," says her spokesman, Drew Hammill. That's why she wants to raise the minimum wage to help low-income parents, he says.

The stay-at-home mom is uncommon in all congressional districts. Mothers work at the same rate — about 71% — in Republican and Democratic districts.

•Democrats represent 59 districts in which less than half of adults are married. Republicans represent only two.

•Democrats represent 30 districts in which less than half of children live with married parents. Republicans represent none.

Dems Seek K St. Cash (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 27, 2006

House Democrats are making an intense final push to raise inside-the-Beltway money before Congress adjourns, collecting most of it from the lobbying industry they have distanced themselves from this election cycle.

Democrats realize that lobbyists representing corporate clients are an important source of political contributions — funding that is vital to their chances of capturing the chamber. At the same time, Democrats have spent a lot of time and effort asserting that Republican rule has created a "Culture of Corruption" because of close ties between the GOP and certain special interests. The dynamic has created awkwardness for some Democrats.

Democratic leaders asked their entire caucus to come into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) headquarters yesterday and tomorrow to make fundraising calls. And last night, the DCCC held a fundraiser at Bistro Bis, a high-end restaurant a short walk from the Capitol, featuring lawmakers poised to take over as the chairmen of House committees.

Apart from the event held by the party fundraising committee, the Democratic ranking members of committees and subcommittees have been raised money aggressively. Several senior Democrats have held multiple fundraisers since Labor Day, collecting money for their party and Democratic candidates but also giving lobbyists and representatives of the business community opportunities to renew old acquaintances or forge new ones.

Lobbyists are key players on the Washington fundraising scene because they advise clients where to send their political contributions. That is especially true of lobbyists representing corporate clients because corporations are usually less politically savvy and experienced than labor unions or single-issue advocacy groups, such as environmental groups.

"Is there more interest in showing up at a Democratic fundraiser than three months ago? Absolutely," said Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.), who would become chairman of the oversight and investigations subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee. "I've found it easier to do the fundraising than it was three or four months ago."

Democratic staff and allied lobbyists report that there has been heavy interest in attending Democratic fundraisers this month.

For example, a fundraising luncheon that Rep. John Dingell (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the Energy and Commerce Committee, held for the DCCC yesterday was originally geared toward representatives of the energy industry. But organizers later made the decision to open it up to all interest sectors and it was well attended, drawing about 35 participants, most of them lobbyists.

One Democratic lobbyist representing energy sector clients said that in recent weeks he has received calls from many of them looking to give money for Democratic candidates.

"It's been surprising," said the lobbyist. "In years past it's been really difficult to write checks to any Democrat."

Tomorrow, Democrats will wrap up the cram-packed week with a large fundraiser hosted by House Democratic chiefs of staff at the Columbus Club at Union Station. The title of the event, "Countdown to the Majority," reminds many of the lobbyists who will attend that the aides hosting the party could be pulling the strings of power if Democrats win control of the House this fall.

The invitation lists nearly 30 chiefs of staff who will be present at the event, including Elizabeth Sears Smith, chief of staff in the personal office of Rep. Rahm Emaneul (D-Ill.), who chairs the DCCC.

A Democratic lobbyist planning to attend the event, however, explained that the event is not a secret. The lobbyist explained the low-dollar event, which only costs $250 per person, would enable lobbyists who are friendly with Democrats on the Hill but not able to write $1,000 personal checks to participate. Most fundraising events hosted by lawmakers charge more than many of the intended participants can give, he said.

But the lobbyist also acknowledged that the event would strengthen relationships between Democratic aides and the K-Street community.

Democrats may be shy about discussing the mingling between lobbyists and veteran aides in preparation of a possible Democratic takeover of the House because strengthening relationships with the lobbying community does not fit smoothly with their political message for much of this year.

"The Republicans have turned Congress into an auction house, for sale to the highest bidder," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), when Democrats unveiled their Honest Leadership and Open Government initiative at the beginning of the year. "You have to pay to play. That's just not right."

"When a prescription drug bill puts pharmaceutical companies first, senior citizens pay the price for their prescription drugs," she said. "When an energy bill gives tax breaks to oil companies already making historic and obscene profits, Americans pay the price at the pump and with record bills for their home heating oil."

Republicans have attempted to exploit the Democrats' strong rhetoric on lobbyists by warning that Democratic control of the House would be bad for the business community. Republican-allied lobbyists have perpetuated that argument among their business clients.

But Democrats have fought back, in large part by holding meetings between veteran lawmakers and staff and representatives of the business community.

Several ranking Democrats have held multiple fundraisers in D.C. since Labor Day, even though they are not facing tough elections this fall. Rep. John Conyers (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee, held two fundraisers last week. Dingell has held about a half dozen since the end of August, both for his own campaign and the DCCC.

Rep. Jim Oberstar (D-Minn.) has also held several fundraisers this month, but his campaign spokesman said he could not find out how many.

A lobbyist who attended said that Republicans have been spreading word that a Democratic majority would be "awful on taxes and new regulations."

He said the purpose of the meeting was to "disabuse [the business community] of that notion," and to show that Democrats would in fact be friendly.

GOP Opponent Asks DOJ For Murtha Probe (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

A Republican challenger to Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) has asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Murtha traded appropriations earmarks for hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from the clients of lobbying firms with close ties to the veteran lawmaker, including one where his brother works.

On Tuesday, Washington County Commissioner Diana Irey, Murtha's GOP opponent, delivered a letter to Mary Beth Buchanan, the U.S. attorney for the Western District of Pennsylvania, requesting that Justice begin a probe of Murtha immediately.

"This is a troubling development — an elected official should never undertake any activity that calls into question his motives," Irey said in a statement. "Nor should he undertake any activity that raises the possibility that he is trading his office for campaign cash."

The allegations about Murtha's relationship with the PMA Group and KSA Consulting — a lobbying firm that employs Murtha's brother, Kit Murtha, as well as a former aide — were first reported by the Los Angeles Times in June 2005.

Since then, some House Republicans have called publicly for an ethics probe of Murtha, although no GOP lawmakers have stepped forward to officially file a complaint against him. Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington recently included Murtha on a list of the most corrupt Members of Congress.

Taxpayers for Common Sense, another government watchdog group, analyzed the 2006 Defense spending bill and found at least 60 earmarks for PMA clients worth more than $95 million. Murtha is the ranking member of the House Appropriations subcommittee on Defense.

"Over the last six years, officials and clients of the PMA Group have contributed roughly $800,000 to Congressman Murtha's campaign fund," Irey said. "In return, they have received at least $95 million in federal contracts, loans, and grants. That's a better than 100-to-1 return on investment."

Mitchell said it was not surprising that defense companies, which make up the bulk of PMA's clients, would give to Murtha due to his position on the Defense subcommittee and his reputation as a strong supporter of national security, despite his more recent turn against the Iraq War.

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), a Murtha ally, became the subject of a federal investigation after a conservative organization wrote the Justice Department seeking a probe of his personal financial holdings. Mollohan was later forced to step down as ranking member of the House ethics committee, but he has kept his seat on the powerful Appropriations Committee.

New Report That Senator Uttered Slurs (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Another acquaintance of Senator George Allen said Tuesday that she heard him use a racial slur in 1976, contradicting a statement he made Monday in an effort to tamp down similar accusations.

Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, called the account by the woman, Ellen G. Hawkins, "another false accusation."

Mr. Allen, a Virginia Republican whose re-election campaign has been knocked off balance by the accusations, said Monday that he did not remember ever using the term and that "it is absolutely false that that was ever part of my vocabulary."

Mrs. Hawkins, who described herself as a rural Virginia housewife and an active Democrat, said in an interview Tuesday that she heard Mr. Allen use the slur repeatedly at a party on election night in 1976. She said Mr. Allen used the term while deprecating the intelligence of the black players on the Washington Redskins football team, which Mr. Allen's father coached. Recalling remarks about its star running back, Larry Brown, Mrs. Hawkins said that Mr. Allen "started in effect bad-mouthing him, saying what a shiftless you-know-what" he was.

She said she remembered the conversation because she was a big fan of the team and was shocked. She said Mr. Allen's statement on Monday was "just plain a lie."

She described her recollections in an e-mail message forwarded to The New York Times. Her former husband, who she said was at the party, did not return a call for comment.

Mr. Wadhams said the encounter "did not happen." He said that Mr. Allen remained "very good friends" with Mr. Brown and that as governor of Virginia, Mr. Allen had appointed Mr. Brown to the board of visitors at George Mason University.

Mrs. Hawkins is the third acquaintance in two days to recount hearing Mr. Allen use racist slurs. The accusations are the latest twist in events set off when Mr. Allen called a young Democratic campaign operative of Indian descent "macaca." Critics said the term was a racial pejorative derived from the name of a monkey species. Mr. Allen apologized for any offense and said he had just made up the word.

A college football teammate, Dr. Ken Shelton, has said Mr. Allen used racial slurs and engaged in a racist prank in college in the early 70's.

An anthropology professor, Christopher Taylor, said that as a graduate student at the University of Virginia he heard Mr. Allen use the epithet.

DOJ_NMG_0069912

Mr. Allen's campaign issued former teammates' statements saying they did not remember his using the term. The campaign also issued a statement from his former wife, Anne Waddell, who confirmed meeting Mr. Taylor but disputed his recollection. She said Mr. Allen "would never utter such a word."

Webb Dodges Question On Racial Epithet (AP)

By David Espo

AP, September 26, 2006

Democratic Senate challenger Jim Webb declined to say definitively Tuesday whether he had ever used a common derogatory term to describe blacks, stepping carefully after watching his campaign rival confront charges of racism.

"I don't think that there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips at one time or another in their life," Webb told reporters.

Webb referred to his novel, "Fields of Fire," which aides said includes occurrences of the n-word as part of character dialogue. But he added: "I have never issued a racial or ethnic slur."

Asked for clarification of his original answer, spokeswoman Jessica Smith quoted Webb as saying, "I have never used that word in my general vocabulary or in any derogatory way."

She declined to say whether he had ever used the word apart from when he wrote his book.

Webb fielded questions on the issue after two days of racially charged controversy surrounding Sen. George Allen, a first-term Republican seeking re-election in what has become an unexpectedly close race.

A college teammate of the senator stirred controversy this week when he said that a generation ago, Allen frequently used the n-word when referring to blacks.

Ken Shelton, a receiver on University of Virginia teams quarterbacked by Allen in the early 1970s, also said his teammate once stuffed a severed deer head into a mailbox belonging to a family he knew was black.

"The story and his comments and assertions in there are completely false," Allen responded in an interview with The Associated Press on Tuesday.

"I don't remember ever using that word, and it is absolutely false that that was ever part of my vocabulary."

Last month, Allen's use of the word "macaca" in referring to a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent caused an outcry. The word is considered an ethnic slur in some cultures, but Allen said he did not know that and had simply made up the word.

Webb has generally avoided commenting on the controversy surrounding Allen, telling reporters it was irrelevant to his attempt to illustrate differences in leadership styles.

Webb is the son of a military family, and he moved frequently during his childhood. Smith said he spent considerable time in the South during childhood summers because his father's family owned land in Virginia.

Edwards said the allegations lodged against Allen were "very troubling." He noted that the senator has denied them and said voters will have to decide for themselves where the truth lies.

On Tuesday, political analyst Larry J. Sabato said he didn't personally hear Allen use the epithet when they were classmates at Virginia. In a television interview a day earlier he had said he knew Allen had used the word.

Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics, wrote in an e-mail to The Associated Press: "I didn't personally hear GFA (Allen's initials) say the n-word. My conclusion is based on the very credible testimony I have heard for weeks, mainly from people I personally know and knew in the '70s."

Allen Urged To Focus On Successful Record (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069913

"I have to believe that some of [Democratic nominee James H. Webb Jr.'s] folks are stirring things up behind the scenes, but I think the majority of the blame falls with the Allen camp," said House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith, Salem Republican.

"I think you have to look at some of this stuff and wonder why they don't have him ready to talk about his positive achievements. That's all he has to talk about -- the things George Allen has done," Mr. Griffith said. "He really rewrote Virginia history with welfare reform, education reform, the abolition of parole -- those are three big items."

The Allen campaign yesterday was defending the senator against accusations by a former college football teammate that Mr. Allen regularly used "the N word" to refer to blacks and once crammed a severed deer head into a black family's mailbox after a hunting trip.

Ken Shelton, a radiologist who was a receiver for the University of Virginia in the 1970s when Mr. Allen was quarterback, made the accusations in an article on Salon.com.

In addition, political scientist Larry Sabato said Monday on MSNBC's "Hardball" with Chris Matthews that he thinks that Mr. Allen has used the slur.

Mr. Allen and his campaign staff have denied the accusations.

"The story and [Dr. Shelton's] comments and assertions in there are completely false," Mr. Allen told the Associated Press. "I don't remember ever using that word, and it is absolutely false that that was ever part of my vocabulary."

Allen strategist Christopher J. LaCivita said the senator and Mr. Sabato were not friends and did not associate with each other at the University of Virginia.

"Larry is obviously relying on words he heard from someone else," Mr. LaCivita said. "We believe it's completely inaccurate."

Testimonials from other teammates "contradicting the media's latest salvo" were posted yesterday on the Allen campaign Web site (www.georgeallen.com), which does not highlight the senator's record.

The Allen campaign had been in damage-control mode since the senator's frequent apologies for calling a Democratic staffer "macaca" and Mr. Allen's reaction to a reporter's question about his Jewish heritage.

"Nobody is getting information about issues they might care about," said state Sen. Kenneth Cuccinelli II, Fairfax Republican, adding that the media have driven stories questioning Mr. Allen's character.

"A strong feeling among many experienced campaigners is that you fight the fight where it arises," Mr. Cuccinelli said. "It isn't so much that there is a desire to carry on the campaign this way. This is how it has devolved. ... In my view, the way you deal with the negative, you project positiveness and success."

"From the other side's perspective, the beauty of this is they don't have to talk about issues -- they don't have anything to talk about," he says.

Mr. Cuccinelli said it is interesting that accusations of racial insensitivity are being made now.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams, who guided John Thune to a 2004 win against U.S. Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle in South Dakota, said the press has given Mr. Webb a "free pass."

Early on, Mr. Allen's positive TV messages shaped his campaign, and he enjoyed a double-digit lead in the polls. He had been one of the Republican Party's most likely presidential candidates in 2008.

Then, at a campaign rally in Southwest Virginia on Aug. 11, he singled out a dark-skinned staffer for Mr. Webb, called him a macaca and told him, "Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia."

Macaca is a racial slur in some European cultures.

Democrats Snarl At Steele In TV Ad, But He Bites Back (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

National Democrats yesterday ran their first TV ad against Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's U.S. Senate bid, prompting an immediate response ad from Mr. Steele.

The ad by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) says Mr. Steele "likes puppies, but he loves President Bush," showing a picture of Mr. Steele and Mr. Bush in a heart-shaped frame.

DOJ_NMG_0069914

Mr. Steele, a Republican, responded by releasing an ad that criticizes his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, for taking money from drug companies and voting against the importation of prescription drugs from Canada.

The DSCC's mention of puppies refers to an ad Mr. Steele released earlier this month warning of negative campaign ads from "the Washington crowd."

Saying that he will be accused of "hating puppies," Mr. Steele says, "For the record, I love puppies," in the ad.

The Steele campaign's strategy has been to pre-empt Democratic attacks, which he says were telegraphed in an internal memo released this spring that advised Democrats to turn Mr. Steele "into a typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African-American candidate."

Mr. Steele is the first black to win statewide office in Maryland.

The DSCC ads had been scheduled to begin airing a month from now and run up to the Nov. 7 general election.

But last week, the DSCC moved up its $1 million ad purchase by one month and presumably will run ads against Mr. Steele for six weeks instead of two weeks.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer has declined to comment about his group's "strategic decisions."

The DSCC ad features playful music to criticize Mr. Steele for supporting the war in Iraq, backing the president's veto of embryonic stem-cell research and opposing abortion.

In his response ad, Mr. Steele says, "You knew they were coming, nasty ads from the Washington crowd." He says that one of the "real differences" between himself and Mr. Cardin is that he supports "cheaper medicine from Canada."

"Congressman Cardin took money from drug companies and voted against cheaper medicine," Mr. Steele says.

Mr. Cardin's spokesman responded last night that "Michael Steele has taken more special-interest money in nine years than Ben Cardin has taken in 22 years.

"If Steele is against gifts from lobbyists, then why does he accept them?" said Oren Shur. "He says he wants to be a different kind of senator? This sounds like the same old Washington hypocrisy to me."

Democrats Dismiss Steele's Puppy Commercial (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The Boston terrier that has figured so prominently in Republican Michael S. Steele's television ad campaign reappeared yesterday in dueling commercials for Maryland's high-profile U.S. Senate contest.

Democrats began airing an ad that called such puppy talk a diversion from Steele's relationship with President Bush and his position on issues such as abortion and stem cell research. Steele, and the growling puppy, were on the air hours later, decrying the Democratic spot as the work of Washington insiders, particularly his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D).

The ad, released by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, is a direct jab at Steele's much-talked-about spot that cast the lieutenant governor as a different kind of politician. In that ad, Steele, looking more like a talk show host than a politician, warns viewers of forthcoming negative ads:

"Grainy pictures and spooky music saying, 'Steele hates puppies' -- and worse. For the record, I love puppies," Steele says, puppy in hand. "And I think you deserve better -- some real ideas for change."

The Democratic response pokes fun at that approach. "It's nice that Steele likes puppies, but he's running for the United States Senate, and it's important to know where he stands on the issues."

The screen repeatedly flashes a photo of Steele and Bush shoulder to shoulder as the announcer tells viewers that Steele supports the Iraq war, opposes abortion and backed the president's decision to veto a bill that would have increased federal funding for embryonic stem cell research.

"Michael Steele: He likes puppies, but he loves George Bush," the announcer concludes as the photo of Steele and Bush is framed in a heart.

DOJ_NMG_0069915

In a state in which Democrats outnumber Republicans in voter registration by nearly 2 to 1, Steele has consistently played down his party affiliation and support from the White House. He held a rally for Democratic supporters last week in Baltimore and unveiled signs with the logo "Steele Democrat."

Steele's quick retort yesterday labels the Democratic spots as "nasty ads from the Washington crowd." He brings back the puppy, which growls in agreement.

Steele says he wants to legalize the importation of cheaper prescription drugs from Canada, while Cardin voted against such a measure in Congress. He points out that Cardin has raised campaign cash from special interests, including pharmaceutical companies. Steele goes on to say that he would ban lawmakers from accepting gifts from lobbyists -- although he doesn't address campaign contributions.

"Want more of the same? I'm not your candidate," Steele says. "But if you're ready for change, then I'm your man."

Oren Shur, a spokesman for Cardin, called the assertions in the ad "blatantly hypocritical," noting that the Ehrlich administration did nothing to support Democratic efforts to import Canadian drugs and that Steele has taken gifts from lobbyists.

Both Cardin and Steele have raised campaign money from drug companies and collected hundreds of thousands of dollars from political action committees. Steele's fundraising efforts have also been helped by "Team Steele," a group of lobbyists assigned to bundle PAC contributions.

The 'Moderate Republican' Scam (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Republican of Rhode Island, is seeking reelection in his heavily Democratic state by insisting he's not really a Republican, or at least not part of the gang responsible for the decade's debacles. He didn't even vote for George W. Bush in 2004, he protests. He cast his vote for George H.W. Bush -- a kinder, gentler, more prudent, less strident Republican.

Big deal.

It matters not a damn whom Lincoln Chafee chose to support for president. His vote was one of roughly 435,000 cast in Rhode Island in the 2004 presidential election, and roughly 122 million cast nationwide. The election in which his vote did matter was that for majority leader of the Senate. There, he was one of just 100 electors, in a Senate nearly evenly divided. After this November's elections, control of the Senate may well hang by a single vote.

And if Chafee truly wished to alter the course of his party and his country in the spirit of his vote for Poppy Bush, he would, if reelected, cast his vote for majority leader when the new Senate convenes for Bob Dole or Howard Baker -- former Republican leaders who showed a decent respect for reality and an interest in doing the nation's business.

Rather than support an administration lapdog such as Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, the Republican whip, whom his party will probably put forth to run the Senate next January, Chafee would vote for some old-school GOP pol. Rather than just announce he's against the war and appalled by torture, he'd vote to put the Senate in the hands of someone with enough gumption and wisdom to stand up to a president who's hellbent on a war that's lost its purpose and who believes America should torture its prisoners either because it makes a nifty wedge issue to use against the Democrats or because he actually believes torture is an acceptable U.S. policy. (Or, to give the president the benefit of the doubt, both.)

Chafee and Maine's Olympia Snowe and such deathbed converts to moderation as Ohio's Mike DeWine are seeking reelection to the Senate by claiming that they represent a Republicanism less rabid than the Bush-Rove strain. They point to individual votes in which they broke with the president and flouted the party line. But those votes have been negated a hundred times over by their votes to make Bill Frist the majority leader, just as they would be negated when the new Senate takes office in 2007 if the moderates backed any Republican unwilling to make a fundamental break with Bush and Bushism.

The issue isn't the individual voting records of Frist and McConnell, which are indistinguishable from each other and define the mainstream of today's gorge-the-rich, drown-the-poor, stay-the-course Republicanism. The issue is that under the control of the Republicans, both the Senate and the House have abandoned their constitutionally mandated obligation to oversee executive branch endeavors, most especially endeavors gone as awry as the war in Iraq. The issue is that under Republican control, both houses have abandoned any effort to address America's real problems.

The House and Senate vote to ban flag-burning and gay marriage but never quite find the time to slow the rising costs of health care or raise the minimum wage or mandate fuel efficiency standards lest the polar ice cap melt. Chafee, Snowe and DeWine readily admit that a melted polar ice cap would be troublesome; they will fight it tooth and nail. But come time to vote for majority leader, they always vote for a leader of a party in thrall to big oil.

Problem is, Chafee and his moderate band are an ever weaker force in a party whose very essence is extreme, whose electoral strategy is solely to mobilize its base, whose legislative strategy is never to seek votes across party lines. And unless these moderates boldly go where they have not gone before and cast their vote for majority leader (and I don't mean in caucus, I mean on the Senate floor) for someone other than the nominee of their party caucus, they are not moderates at all. They are loyal and indispensable foot soldiers in the Republicans' continuing campaign to drag the nation rightward and backward.

And guess what. The moderates will vote for the extremist. "Moderate," after all, is only an adjective; "Republican" is a noun. Chafee, Snowe, the whole lot of them, are moderate enablers of an extremist party. That leaves those voters in Rhode Island, Maine, Ohio and other states where these self-proclaimed Republican moderates are running only one choice if they seek a Congress to check and balance the president, if they want a more moderate nation: Vote for the Democrat.

RNC Takes Lead In Key Senate Tilts (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

The Republican National Committee already has devoted close to a third of its advertising budget this fall to just three critical Senate races, with all indications that the committee hopes to build a firewall around those states to ensure the chamber's GOP majority.

In the division of financial labor among the three national GOP committees, the RNC is focusing its nearly $30 million advertising war chest on the battleground Senate races in Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee, according to Federal Election Commission records and interviews with a handful of top Republican operatives.

While aides warned that the state of play could change in the final six weeks of the campaign, several GOP strategists said that the current plan was for the RNC to continue focusing its television campaign on those three states.

FEC records bear out that plan so far, with the RNC showering more than $3.8 million in independent expenditures in those states in recent weeks — $2.8 million of that aimed at Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), who is trying to unseat Sen. Mike DeWine (R).

According to Democratic sources involved in media purchases, the RNC also has reserved another $4.7 million worth of ads in Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee, devoting more than $8.5 million worth of independent expenditures reserved for just those states so far.

Aides at the RNC declined to confirm or deny the spending figures for the independent expenditure program, citing laws that mandate it be run as a separate entity by separate workers, but noted that the committee plans an aggressive financial push in Congressional races.

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman publicly has declared that he will spend at least $60 million on Congressional midterms this fall, with the money about evenly split between financing get-out-the-vote efforts for all federal races and for the television air wars. But Mehlman and his aides have declined to spell out where their resources — which are vastly larger than the Democratic National Committee's — would be spent.

"We're going to be spending north of $60 million on politics this fall. We'll be using our financial advantage to help make sure that we maintain our majorities in the House and the Senate," said Brian Jones, an RNC spokesman.

However, other strategists said this week that the RNC would be spending its entire independent expenditure allocation on Senate races.

The RNC will be helping out House Republican candidates through the more than $30 million it is spending on the GOTV effort, known as the 72-hour program, and the committee also is helping House candidates by giving many campaigns $77,000 in coordinated expenditures that national committees are allowed to contribute.

The National Republican Congressional Committee has its own IE unit, which will be the sole vehicle for ads emanating from Washington, D.C., for House races, according to several sources.

"It's equal financial help for both [the NRSC and NRCC]. It's just easier for the RNC to help for an IE unit for Senate races," one GOP strategist explained, noting that several dozen House races remain highly competitive in the home stretch of the campaign.

Some aides explained the decision of RNC officials to focus its ad budget on the Senate races in Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee as both practical and politically expedient given the importance of keeping the chamber's majority.

Independent analysts, as well as party operatives when speaking privately, rate Sens. Rick Santorum (Pa.), Conrad Burns (Mont.) and Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) as the most endangered Republican incumbents. However, even if all three of those GOP Senators were to lose, Democrats would still have only 48 seats.

In addition to winning those three GOP seats, Democrats must hold all of their seats — including the suddenly endangered seat in New Jersey — and also claim Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee to reach 51. GOP strategists realize that winning two of the three seats guarantees their majority — a big part of the reason the RNC is taking a major role in support of DeWine, Sen. Jim Talent (Mo.) and Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, the GOP nominee in Tennessee.

With the RNC leveraging up to $30 million on TV in Senate races, that would more than negate the financial edge that the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has enjoyed over the National Republican Senatorial Committee. At the end of July, the DSCC had a more than $15 million cash-on-hand advantage over the NRSC, and, with a spending spree beginning in August, held an $11 million advantage at the end of last month.

The RNC's independent expenditures are being marshalled by Terry Nelson, who served as the political director for Bush-Cheney '04, while the NRSC's program is being run by Curt Anderson.

The NRSC's IE program is going to be spread across many states, with a focus on states such as Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Montana, as well as other competitive races, such as New Jersey and Maryland, where the GOP believes it has pickup chances. "We're going to put more into more states overall," one Senate Republican strategist said.

The future IE allocations for both the RNC and NRSC could shift because of the political chess match that Republicans are engaging in with Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the DSCC chairman.

The DSCC announced a new round of ads Tuesday in Tennessee, Rhode Island and Maryland. To date, Schumer has not sent any of his committee's IE money into Virginia, where Sen. George Allen (R) has suffered a series of self-inflicted mistakes that have allowed his opponent, Jim Webb (D), to make it a very close race. While Virginia previously had been considered safe ground for Allen by both parties, Democrats may want to put money into the Old Dominion, which might prompt a counter-action by one of the GOP committees.

However, Republicans anxiously are eyeing New Jersey, the most expensive race in the nation this year, where Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) has found himself trailing in the polls to state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R). GOP operatives are waiting to see if the DSCC has to shift dollars away from a GOP-held seat to defend Menendez.

The RNC-NRSC effort was most successful so far in Rhode Island, where Chafee beat back a primary challenge from Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey (R).

While the RNC ran the GOTV effort, the NRSC spent more than $500,000 in the campaign's waning days from its IE budget on TV ads, ad production and polling in support of Chafee, according to a database of IE expenses compiled from FEC reports by PoliticalMoneyLine.

In addition, the NRSC spent almost $60,000 on direct mail against Laffey, who national Republicans dubbed too conservative to have a chance at winning in liberal-leaning Rhode Island.

Whether the IE finances are coming from the RNC or the NRSC, each state with a critical Senate race has the same team of media consultants, pollsters and direct-mail firms working in it. In Tennessee, for example, where Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) is squaring off against Corker, the media consultant for IE spending is Scott Howell, while the Tarrance Group is handling polling.

DOJ_NMG_0069918

In some instances, the RNC and NRSC will spend in the same state, as is the case in Missouri, where the NRSC just launched a more than $1 million campaign largely focused on attacking Democratic nominee Claire McCaskill.

Also, at the end of August, the NRSC dropped more than $600,000 worth of attack ads in Ohio against Brown.

In total, the two GOP committees have spent at least $3.3 million against Brown, with millions more in reserve.

Bachmann: NRCC Overdrive (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

Republicans believe Minnesota's 6th Congressional district is solid GOP turf, but given the unfavorable political climate they have endured this cycle, they are not taking it for granted.

The National Republican Congressional Committee paid more than $310,000 to begin running ads Monday in the suburban and exurban Twin Cities district to bash Democratic nominee Patty Wetterling.

Wetterling, who gained national prominence as a child safety advocate after her son was kidnapped in 1989, lost to Rep. Mark Kennedy (R) 54 percent to 46 percent in 2004.

Despite the drubbing Kennedy gave Wetterling and Republicans' public confidence in their nominee to replace him, state Sen. Michele Bachmann, the NRCC has spent almost $500,000 on ads and direct-mail pieces hammering Wetterling since mid-August.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has yet to run independent ads or drop mail pieces in the district.

"Outside groups have been pouring money into this race on behalf of Patty Wetterling," Jonathan Collegio, a NRCC spokesman, explained. "This is an important race for the NRCC, and in the end we want to be decisive with our win."

Tom Horner, a veteran GOP operative in Minnesota who is not working on any campaigns, said the NRCC is just being smart.

"I don't think any race for an open seat in Minnesota is a slam dunk for Republicans in 2006," Horner said. "I think Minnesota still is a state closely divided.

"With that kind of an electorate in this kind of an environment where there is at least the potential for a Republican backlash ... no Republican can take anything for granted," said Horner, who is now a partner with the Minnesota-based public affairs firm Himle Horner.

Horner said 6th district voters definitely lean Republican and, more importantly, tend to be socially conservative.

"I do think though that right now Michele Bachmann is the leader and remains the favorite," he said. "Issues like abortion and same-sex marriage are more important in the 6th," which plays to Bachmann's strengths, he said.

Bachmann is an ardent social conservative and championed amending the state constitution to bar same-sex marriage or civil unions during her tenure in the statehouse.

Democrats contend that Wetterling's record of advocacy for families and children trumps Bachmann's voting record in the Legislature.

"National Republicans are desperately attacking Patty Wetterling because they know that the choice in this race between Michele Bachmann, who has a record of broken promises on raising taxes, and Patty Wetterling, who is committed to real tax relief for middle-class families, is an easy one for Minnesota voters," said Kate Bedingfield, a DCCC spokeswoman.

Since July, the NRCC has spent almost $27,000 on polling in the district, including about $10,500 on Sept. 13, according to independent expenditure reports filed with the Federal Election Commission. But the committee has declined to release any results.

EMILY's List, a pro-abortion rights political action committee backing Wetterling, is releasing a survey it commissioned on the race today, presumably finding Wetterling hot on Bachmann's heels if not leading.

Collegio said the NRCC's heavy spending in the district is just a counter measure.

"EMILY's List has directed enormous amounts of money to Wetterling's campaign and our expenditures are there to even the playing field," Collegio said.

DOJ_NMG_0069919

But when it comes to PAC largesse, Bachmann actually has benefited more than Wetterling.

According to an analysis by PoliticalMoneyLine, about $348,000 of the more than $1.1 million Bachmann raised for the race through Aug. 23 came from PACs. In contrast, about $138,000 of the $1.3 million Wetterling raised came from PACs.

Horner said another factor in the NRCC's desire to bolster Bachmann could be Kennedy's Senate campaign.

Currently he trails Hennepin County Attorney Amy Klobuchar (D) by a substantial margin in the Gopher State's open-seat Senate contest.

"The conventional wisdom going in would have been Michele Bachmann would benefit from Mark Kennedy's service in Congress in that district but as his race is at least perceived to be struggling ... then you start to worry, does it have the opposite effect?" Horner said.

GOP Scandals Dog Ohio Candidate (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

GRANVILLE, Ohio, Sept. 26 -- Joy Padgett, the GOP's new congressional candidate in Ohio, has been in a jam when it comes to finding a big-name Republican who could come to town and bring more than trouble.

Gov. Bob Taft? He was convicted of illegally accepting gifts. GOP gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell? He is getting trounced in the polls. Bob Ney, the current congressman? He admitted taking bribes and then checked himself in for alcohol rehabilitation.

This helps explains Padgett's excitement Tuesday as her lunchtime guest of honor took to the podium outside the historic Granville Inn. It was first lady Laura Bush. The president's approval ratings may be in the drain, but the first lady still regularly scores in the high sixties. She was in town to raise money for Padgett, and to offer the candidate at least a one-day respite from the troubles that her radioactive party affiliation is causing in Ohio's 18th District.

"Joy, who as I just told you was a schoolteacher for 20 years, owns custom-made brass knuckles," the first lady tells an overflow crowd of people who contributed between $100 and $1,000 to Padgett to attend the event. "When Joy says she's a tough campaigner and that she will fight for the people of Ohio, she really means it."

Padgett could use the endorsement. Earlier this month, she won the GOP primary to replace Ney on the November ballot in a district that, under normal circumstances, Republicans win comfortably. But Zack Space, the Democratic candidate, sometimes seems like the least of her problems.

"I am not going to downplay it: Voters are skeptical of everything" in the current political climate, Padgett said in an interview.

Democrats are pressing the scandal issue relentlessly, and it appears to be working with some voters. Vicki Sugar, a Granville resident who attended the Bush fundraiser, said: "This is the first time I have ever felt like I wanted to back out. Does it really matter if I vote Democrat and Republican?"

In a year when Republicans are battling low poll numbers nationally, there are few places where the GOP brand is more scuffed than in Ohio, where, since President Bush's election-night triumph here two years ago, national and local scandals have polluted the political atmosphere for GOP candidates.

A poll released this week by the Columbus Dispatch indicated Democrats could sweep races for U.S. Senate as well as Ohio governor, auditor, treasurer and secretary of state. This would be a remarkable turnaround after 16 years in which Republicans have enjoyed uninterrupted control of the governorship and dominated most statewide races.

In House races, Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking Republican leader, is facing the toughest race of her career and Padgett, battling in a district President Bush carried with 57 percent of the vote in 2004, is regarded as far from a lock to succeed Ney.

Nationally, it is the Iraq war, excessive spending and other issues that analysts generally regard as the root of the GOP's problems. In the Ohio River Valley, however, troubles can also be attributed to missteps and scandals at the state level. In Indiana, Gov. Mitchell E. Daniels Jr. infuriated voters by privatizing a toll road -- turning the work over to foreign companies -- and trying to adjust the time zone. In Kentucky, Gov. Ernie Fletcher has been dogged by a hiring scandal. They are two of the least popular governors in the country -- and they do nothing but harm GOP candidates in their sates.

Padgett, a 59-year-old state lawmaker from Coshocton, is trying to force the debate away from her party's problems toward policy issues such as immigration that she hopes will offer more favorable terrain. "I am a first-generation -- legal -- American," she said. She supports House legislation to tighten border security and says illegal immigrants should be forced to leave. "They have to come back legally," she said.

Padgett, who has represented 14 of the district's 16 counties, is counting on voters to overlook her self-described "casual" and "not social" relationship with the prison-bound Ney.

"Democrats want to make a lot out of it because they need an issue," she said. "He might be a factor if people chose for him to be."

This is the kind of district Republicans usually dominate in state politics. The Ohio 18th, a mix of small-town farms and mines, stretches from Appalachia to the Columbus suburbs. Margaret Jensen, from nearby Newark, said the GOP troubles are "unfortunate." But she quickly added: "We are die-hard Republicans. We'll never go over to the other side, no matter what."

Space, a 45-year-old lawyer, said the Ohio Republican party and the Iraq war have softened many "nevers" into "maybes." His strategy is to link the GOP hopeful with the GOP congressman so that voters will see "Padgett" on the ballot and think "Ney."

The Democratic candidate said that while he has been trying for months to focus voters' attention on the ethical transgressions committed by Ney, it was not until the lawmaker's recent agreement to plead guilty that it hit home. "The reaction among constituents is that he lied to them," said Space. "It constitutes a betrayal."

Space said voters now are beginning to understand that Ney's actions are not simply the result of one bad seed but rather are indicative of the stranglehold special interests have on the Republican majority. "It is a manifestation of something more malicious," the candidate said.

And, though Padgett rarely mentions Ney by name, Space is convinced that her ties to the legislator will complicate her campaign. Space said that Ney "anointed" Padgett as his replacement. She has said that is not true -- but she has to deny it over and over, underscoring the predicament of Republicans in a year when bad breaks outnumber good by a wide margin.

Campaign 2006: The Battle For Ohio, Round Two (TIME)

By Perry Bacon, Jr

Time, September 27, 2006

Just as in 2004, this year's election might come down to what happens in Ohio. But two years later, that's about the only thing that remains the same. A corruption scandal that implicated Republican Governor Bob Taft has sunk his approval ratings to 19%, making him the second-lowest-ranked governor in the country, according to Survey USA. Another corruption scandal forced G.O.P. Congressman Bob Ney to plead guilty to charges of accepting free gifts and meals from lobbyist Jack Abramoff. He's not seeking reelection, putting his House seat in danger for Republicans. And that's not all the problems for the G.O.P. in Ohio. "You've got a national anti-Republican, anti-incumbent sentiment that wasn't there two years ago," says Peter Brown, who surveys Ohio races for the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute. Voters aren't happy about the economy, Iraq or President Bush here either. Even Neil Clark, a veteran G.O.P. lobbyist and former top Republican state senate official, says "The state is poised to have a very bad day for Republicans."

Democratic chances of winning key races here are so high that top officials are trying to guard against activists getting complacent. "There is a danger that we may be too overly confident that there is going to be change," said Susan Gwinn, chairman of the Athens County Democratic Party in southeastern Ohio. "That's my biggest concern. I think, frankly, tighter numbers for us at the top of the ticket would probably be more mobilizing. I've heard people who say, 'I am not going to give any more money to that person, because he is so far ahead." And Democrats remain worried that the G.O.P. will outperform them at getting voters to the polls, much as the Republican turnout operation helped defy the oddsmakers in 2004. Both Democrats and Republicans say a ballot initiative to allow slot machine casino gambling in the state may help to turn out conservatives who would oppose it, although liberals may show up to support a proposed minimum wage increase also on the ballot.

These Ohio races are critical. Democrats need 15 seats to win back the House, and three of their best chances are in Ohio. In the Senate, where they need six seats, this is a place where they could win one. And both parties want the governor on their side come 2008, when the Presidential election could again be decided here. Not surprisingly, each party is active in the state, and outside groups are heavily involved as well. Both the liberal MoveOn.org and the conservative Chamber of Commerce have been running ads in the key races, and party operatives will be on the ground in the next few weeks. Here's a closer look at some of the key Ohio races:

SENATE

Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) v. Senator Mike DeWine (R): This race will say a lot about how both parties will perform at the polls in 2006, and perhaps 2008 as well. That's because there's nothing particularly compelling about the personal stories of either one of these candidates; they're both career politicians — DeWine served in the state senate, the U.S. House and was lieutenant governor, while Brown was a longtime state representative and the Ohio secretary of state. So it's a straight-ahead battle between two candidates who are emphasizing the same themes their parties are offering nationwide. DeWine and the national Republicans are running ads attacking Brown for his opposition to the Patriot Act, the Bush tax cuts and some measures the G.O.P. has pushed to stop illegal immigration, such as the immigration bill the House passed last year that didn't have a guest worker program. Brown is attacking DeWine for supporting trade agreements like NAFTA that he says have cost jobs in Ohio, backing President Bush on the war and not doing enough to hold down the cost of prescription drugs. Brown has long been a critic of these trade deals, which more moderate Democrats such as President Clinton have in the past supported, and if his populist rhetoric works, expect to see other candidates adopt such anti-trade rhetoric in the Midwest in 2008 to appeal to voters worried about the continuing decline of manufacturing jobs. DeWine has a history of winning close races, and for all the attention focused on it as a swing state, Ohio has long had two Republican senators and a Republican governor. But nearly all the polls over the last two months have shown Brown ahead.

HOUSE

Rep. Deborah Pryce (R) vs. Mary Joe Kilroy (D)

If Kilroy, a Franklin County Commissioner, wins this race, it would be the biggest individual victory for the House Democrats on election night, because Pryce, as the chairman of the House Republicans, is the No. 4 member of the leadership team. The Democrats see this district in Central Ohio as an opportunity to make a huge splash, as MoveOn.org and Americans United for Change, which opposes Bush's plan to revamp Social Security with private accounts, have been among the groups attacking Pryce in ads.

This race gets at one of the central questions of this campaign: will voters choose to dump incumbents who they think are perfectly nice people and good members to send a message to Washington and President Bush? Pryce is well-liked in the district and won 62% of the vote there in 2004, even while Bush and Kerry were split about evenly. And over the last few months, she's tried to reassure voters of her centrist views, by voting for and bragging about her support of embryonic stem cell research and raising the minimum wage, which most of the House Republican leadership opposed. Of course, on almost all the big issues, starting with the Iraq War, Pryce has supported Bush, and that's what Kilroy is hoping can sink the seven-term incumbent.

GOVERNOR

Ohio Secretary of State Kenneth Blackwell (R) vs. Rep. Ted Strickland (D)

This was supposed to be one of the most interesting races in the country, as the two candidates both have resumes that make them stick out in their parties. Blackwell is the controversial Ohio Secretary of State, whom many Democrats blame for problems some voters had, such as long lines at polling places, on Election Day in 2004. He's one of the major figures in the rise of the conservative, evangelical wing of the Ohio Republican Party and won a difficult primary over a more moderate opponent. And he's one of the few African-American Republicans running statewide in the country. Democrats are often unfairly described as a party that doesn't appeal to religious voters, as African Americans attend church in high numbers and tend to vote Democratic, but Ted Strickland is an unusual candidate as well: the congressman has a master's degree in divinity, has worked as an administrator at a Methodist children's home and talks openly about his faith in campaign ads. Both candidates were supposed to reshuffle the usual voting patterns, as Blackwell has showed up in black churches while Strickland has appealed to evangelicals who normally back Republicans. Only Strickland has succeeded so far. In polls, Strickland is getting 40% of the vote from self-described white evangelical Christians; John Kerry got fewer than 25% in 2004. By contrast, recent polls show Blackwell getting from 15% to 20% of the black vote, about the same as Bush got. Of course, this is the race most affected by the Taft scandal, since Blackwell is running to keep the governor's office in Republican hands. Barring a stunning turnaround, he won't: polls show Strickland ahead by 12 to 21 points.

Rep. Steve Chabot (R) vs. John Cranley (D)

The Democrats have adopted a risky strategy in a few key races: having a guy who already lost to the incumbent once try again. Cranley won only 45% of the vote in 2000 in this district near Cincinnati when he took on Chabot the first time. The six-term Chabot won 60% of the vote in 2004, but this is a close district in which Bush got about 51% of the vote in 2004. This is also a much more difficult year for Republicans, and Cranley has had six more years to establish himself as a city councilman in Cincinnati.

So Chabot, like other Republicans in tight races, is changing the subject from Iraq. He's touting his work to cut wasteful spending, while accusing Cranley of supporting "amnesty" for illegal immigration. Cranley is trying to keep voters focused on the problems at hand, running ads blaming Chabot for high gas prices and linking his opponent with voters' frustrations on other issues such as the increasing national debt.

HOUSE

Zach Space (D) v. Joy Padgett (R)

In the race to replace Bob Ney, State Senator Joy Padgett has one advantage; a conservative district in eastern Ohio where President Bush won 57% of the vote in 2004. The challenge for her will be to not allow Space to define her as being close to the Bobs. Space, a lawyer, will be trying hard, as ad an he started running last week calls Padgett "Bob Taft and Bob Ney's handpicked candidate."

Hospital Defends Promotion, Raise For Senator's Wife (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Officials at the University of Chicago Hospitals on Tuesday explained a large salary jump for Sen. Barack Obama's wife shortly after he took office as a normal promotion that reflected expanded duties in her job as a liaison with the South Side community surrounding the medical center.

Michelle Obama was promoted to vice president for external affairs in March 2005, two months after her husband took office in the Senate. According to a tax return released by the senator this week, the promotion nearly tripled her income from the hospitals from $121,910 in 2004 to $316,962 in 2005.

Hospitals spokesman John Easton said Obama's salary was in line with the compensation received by the not-for-profit medical center's 16 other vice presidents.

A tax return for the hospitals covering the 12 months ended June 30, 2005, shows most of the organization's vice presidents earning between $291,000 and $362,000.

Easton said the hospitals had made a determined effort to deepen their connections to the surrounding community, beginning in 2002, when Obama was hired for the new position of executive director for community affairs.

"There was a real initiative by the university and the hospitals to have a real relationship with the community," Easton said. "Over time, she developed a staff. … It went from zero staff to Michelle and 10 staff."

Michael Riordan, who was University of Chicago Hospitals president at the time, said he had planned early on for the position to evolve into a vice president's post as a way of showing the organization's commitment to community outreach.

"I knew where I wanted to go with this position," said Riordan, who now is the top executive of the Greenville Hospital System in South Carolina. "I wanted to identify someone to grow into it."

Riordan said Obama's promotion had nothing to do with her husband becoming a U.S. senator.

"She was hired before Barack was Barack," Riordan said. "She is worth her weight in gold, and she is just terrific."

DOJ_NMG_0069923

Easton said the hospitals' management had discussed a promotion to vice president with Obama previously but that she had been reluctant to undertake the commitment until her husband's Senate campaign was finished. In part, she wanted to wait until her family had made a decision on whether to maintain their primary residence in Illinois, which they did, and she had a better sense of the demands on her time as a senator's wife, he said.

At the time Obama was promoted to vice president, Easton added, she also had "at least one other, more lucrative offer" from a potential employer, though he declined to identify the competing organization.

Easton said the hospital management believed she merited the promotion based on a series of achievements. They included expansion of the institution's women and minority vendor purchases, rejuvenation of its volunteer program and work she did to help set up a collaborative effort with South Side clinics and doctors' offices to provide primary care for low-income residents who otherwise would seek treatment at the emergency room.

In explaining her salary increase, Easton and a spokesman for the senator both stressed her educational background, which includes an undergraduate degree from Princeton University and a law degree from Harvard.

Obama's new salary is significantly higher than her annual earnings during the seven prior years for which the Obamas have released their taxes. During those years, her wages ranged from a low of $50,343 in 1999 to a high of $121,910 in 2004.

After Obama's graduation from Harvard Law School in 1988, she worked for a few years as an associate at the corporate law firm Sidley Austin in Chicago. Such law practices typically pay lucrative salaries.

But after a few years, Obama moved into a series of positions in local government and non-profit organizations, which typically pay lower salaries.

According to a biography supplied by the medical center, she moved from the law firm to work first as an assistant to Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and then as the assistant commissioner of planning and development.

In 1993 she became the founding executive director of Public Allies Chicago, an AmeriCorps national service program. She later worked as an associate dean of student services at the University of Chicago, a position she held until she was hired by the University of Chicago Hospitals.

Bill Would Reimburse States For Printing Alternate Ballots (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Three Senate Democrats proposed emergency legislation on Tuesday to reimburse states for printing paper ballots in case of problems with electronic voting machines on Nov. 7.

The proposal is a response to grass-roots pressures and growing concern by local and state officials about touch-screen machines. An estimated 40 percent of voters will use those machines in the election.

“If someone asks for a paper ballot, they ought to be able to have it,” said Senator Barbara Boxer of California, a co-sponsor of the measure with Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin.

Republican leadership aides were skeptical about the prospects for the measure. It would have to advance without opposition from any senator and then make it through the House in the short time available before Election Day.

Dozens of states are using optical-scan and touch-screen machines to comply with federal laws intended to phase out lever and punch-card machines after the hanging-chads confusion of the 2000 presidential election. Widespread problems were reported with the new technology and with the poll workers using them this year in primaries in Arkansas, Illinois, Maryland, Ohio and elsewhere.

Local and state officials have expressed concern that the new systems might not be ready to handle increased turnouts. Election experts fear that the lack of a paper trail with most touch-screen machines will leave no way to verify votes in case of fraud or computer failure.

Last week, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. of Maryland, a Republican, joined the skeptics, saying he lacked confidence in his state’s new $106 million electronic system and suggesting that state officials offer all voters paper ballots as an alternative.

The proposed federal bill would provide 75 cents for each backup paper ballot that a precinct prints. If ballots are printed for half the 27 million voters expected to use touch-screen machines, Ms. Boxer said, her bill would cost Washington no more than $10.1 million.

Barbara Burt, vice president and director of election reform programs at Common Cause, a good-governance advocacy group, said that the bill would have been stronger if it had required precincts to provide paper ballots in federal elections, but that it was a step in the right direction.

"Lack of funding has been the main excuse that local election officials have used to avoid implementing paper precautions," Ms. Burt said. "This takes that excuse away from them entirely."

Ms. Boxer said mandating all precincts to provide paper ballots would have been impractical.

"I think Big Brother dictating something to local jurisdictions is a big mistake, because they will balk at it," she said. "What we're saying here is that you run your own elections, and we are going to help you run it properly. If local officials don't take advantage of the option to take precautions, then they're the ones on the line."

Brad Friedman, a liberal blogger and longtime critic of electronic voting, said that incentives to print paper ballots would help, but that without a federal mandate some voters would still have no choice but to use touch-screens.

On Thursday the Committee on House Administration, which has a role in overseeing election procedures, will hold a hearing to consider whether all voting equipment should produce a paper record that lets voters verify how they voted.

Ensign To Lead NRSC (RC)

By John Bresnahan And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

Sen. John Ensign will take the helm of the National Republican Senatorial Committee at the start of the 110th Congress, putting the Nevada Republican on the front line of what is certain to be a difficult election cycle for the GOP.

Republican leaders have been scrambling for nearly two months to recruit the next NRSC chairman after Sen. John Thune (S.D.), who was expected to assume the post, opted against a bid. Thune shocked the GOP Conference in early August when he announced he wasn't interested in the position, citing the travel burden and family commitments.

Ensign, who also declined the NRSC post when initially approached by party leaders, said he changed his mind after consulting with friends, colleagues, and his wife, Darlene.

"It's a big challenge, there's no question, it's a big challenge, but it's an important job," Ensign said in an interview Tuesday. "I think it's a job that I'm up to. I feel very privileged to even serve in a position like that."

Ensign added: "Nobody likes asking for money, that's the reason that a lot of people don't want to do it. I think it's an important job, and you have to raise the resources to get your folks elected."

The 48-year-old Ensign, who was first elected to the Senate in 2000 after two terms in the House, openly acknowledged the hurdles he will face as NRSC chairman next cycle.

Twenty-one Republican Senators are up for re-election in 2008, versus just 12 Democrats. When combined with the certain competition for donor dollars from a presidential campaign and a renewed battle for the House, the NRSC's ability to raise money and elect its candidates will be tested severely.

"I know I'm up against it," Ensign said. "It's a tough cycle. Twenty-one [GOP Senators] up. I realize that. I realize all the negative parts about it, and that makes it all the more exciting to me because it makes it that much more difficult."

The Nevada Republican offered praise for Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), the current chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. Schumer, who has been able to pull the Democrats into financial parity with the NRSC after years of trailing in the money race, is believed in some quarters to be prepared to return to the DSCC for another cycle, although no formal decision has been announced yet.

"Chuck Schumer is a very worthy opponent," Ensign said.

Ensign said his original decision not to accept the NRSC position was based more on the fact that it would keep him away from his family when the Senate was out of session, rather than any lack of desire to serve in the GOP leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0069925

"I wasn't interested because of personal considerations, not because I didn't want the job," Ensign said. I always wanted to do the job."

The Nevada Republican said he talked with several former NRSC chairmen about the demands of the job and was reassured that he could tailor it to fit his own personal style.

"Some chairman traveled very little, some traveled a lot," said Ensign, who has three children. Ensign said he and his wife "spent the last couple weeks exploring it, what's entailed, and I laid it all out for her. She's very enthusiastic in her support and that was very critical for me."

Several people close to Ensign, whom he would not identify, also told him to accept the post.

"It was personal friends of mine who told me to reconsider," he said. Ensign then held further discussions with some of his Senate colleagues, and by last weekend, had decided to inform party leaders that he would accept the job.

Ensign met with Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the presumptive Senate Republican leader in the next Congress, on Tuesday. The two huddled for about 30 minutes, during which Ensign "laid out his plan for 2008 and the role of the NRSC chair," said Don Stewart, McConnell's spokesman.

"I have discussed this with Sen. McConnell," Ensign admitted, although he would not go into further detail, including any discussions he may have had with retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

While McConnell has declined to endorse anyone for a leadership position heading into 2007, and the GOP Conference still must formally approve Ensign as the NRSC chairman, no other Republicans have thrown their hat in the ring, making it Ensign's by default. Senators who are "in cycle" are ineligible for the post, eliminating a huge chunk of the conference from consideration.

"This is an outstanding choice," said Brian Nick, spokesman for Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), current chairwoman of the NRSC. "Sen. Ensign is already a star in the Republican Conference. And his willingness to step up to the plate to tackle this incredibly challenging endeavor will be a huge benefit to Republicans."

Ensign's decision to seek the NRSC post leaves the vice chairman position open to Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), the only other candidate for that job, at least for the time being.

Many in the Republican Conference viewed Cornyn as the frontrunner for the position, a sentiment which could have tipped Ensign's decision to vie for the NRSC slot.

But in itself, the NRSC chairmanship can be a stepping stone to elected leadership. Both Frist and McConnell served stints as NRSC chairman, and Ensign's decision to accept what is sure to be a tough role in a difficult election cycle may earn him support within the Conference.

Ensign, a 1981 graduate of Oregon State, was a veterinarian before first coming to Congress in 1994. A born-again Christian, Ensign narrowly lost a bitter 1998 Senate race to now Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), falling by just 428 votes following a statewide recount.

In February 1999, former Sen. Dick Bryan (D-Nev.), announced that he would not seek re-election in 2000. Ensign immediately jumped into the race, and won a solid 10 point victory over Democratic lawyer Ed Bernstein.

Richardson Emerges As Possible Democratic Presidential Candidate (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico insists that he's focused only on helping Democrats win elections this year and won't decide until next year whether to run for president.

But over scrambled eggs and sausage Tuesday morning, he gave reporters a preview of the distinctive campaign he'd run - and how much he'd differ from likely rival Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

He boasts a decidedly different resume. He's arguably more candid. And he's definitely funnier.

"I haven't made a decision," said Richardson, 58. "I will make a decision early next year."

DOJ_NMG_0069926

Later, however, he ticked off the changes in the Democratic presidential primary calendar and how Western states could play a bigger role in picking the 2008 nominee - states that happen to be in his backyard. Was he already mapping his campaign? "I'm just kind of observing how it happens," he said, his smile giving way to a knowing laugh.

Richardson came to Washington to talk about his work as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association and the prospects for this year's 36 gubernatorial elections.

He's on the ballot himself. But he's coasting toward re-election to a second term, confident enough that he can tour the country helping other candidates for governor - and coincidentally earning the gratitude of potentially powerful pols who might be able to help him in 2008.

As governor, he's built a record that could serve as the centerpiece of a presidential campaign aimed at holding blue states and picking up red states. He's cut taxes. He declared an illegal immigration state of emergency. He dramatically increased death benefits for his state's National Guardsmen killed in Iraq, a move being followed by 36 other states.

"Being a governor is the best job I've ever had," he said. "A governor can actually do things. You can build schools. You can create jobs. You can give health care to little kids. We were able in New Mexico to insure every child under 5."

Richardson is keenly aware that the country tends to elect governors, not senators, to the presidency. Four of the last five presidents were governors first. No senator has been elected since John F. Kennedy in 1960.

"When you're in Congress, you don't have to worry about fiscal issues, about management. You're kind of voting, you're floating around," he said.

But Richardson would be the only one who also has foreign policy experience - often a weakness for governors. He served as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations in 1997-98 and keeps his hand in international affairs. This summer, he flew to Sudan to win the release of two journalists who were arrested while reporting in Darfur.

Personally, Richardson is very different from Clinton and other potential rivals.

For one, he's more candid.

As DGA chairman, he laughed that he came to the press breakfast "to give you the most positive spin, in case you haven't figured that out."

Belying that jest, he acknowledged that, if the election were held today, Democrats would pick up governors' offices in states such as Colorado, Massachusetts, New York and Ohio, but fall short in such states as California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Minnesota, South Carolina and Texas.

He insisted that Democrats could and would prevail in many of those states - but not all politicians would concede that their party would lose in them if the elections were today.

Finally, Richardson likes to share a laugh.

Take his comments on the growing voting power of Hispanics. "They're everywhere. I was just in Maine. I met the three of them. They came to the airport to see me," said Richardson, whose mother is Mexican.

The candor and laughs could fade if Richardson gets in the race and starts getting the much tougher scrutiny that probably helped turn Clinton defensive. But it's also possible that his warmer personality could help him weather the onslaught better.

Bill Richardson (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson came to a Monitor sponsored breakfast on Tuesday in two roles - chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association and potential presidential candidate.

As chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association, Richardson talked up his party's prospects in the 36 statehouse races that will be decided this November.

"I believe we will win the House of Representatives, the Senate probably [is] a little more difficult," Richardson said. "I can honestly say I believe we will win a majority of governorships this year.... We will win in New York. We will win in Massachusetts.

We will win in Colorado. We will win in Ohio. We will win in Arkansas. We have some very competitive toss ups in Nevada [and] Florida. We will win in Maryland. I would put Maryland in the 'feel confident' [category]."

Another governor's race where Richardson is confident is New Mexico. Although he is running for reelection, Richardson felt confident enough to take time out for a swing through several Eastern states to campaign for Democratic gubernatorial candidates.

Richardson was also in Washington as someone pondering a move from the state house to the White House. The governor told reporters at the breakfast that he "will make a decision early next year" on whether to run for president. But he is already clearly preparing for a presidential run.

For example, Richardson instantly offered up a highly detailed plan when asked what he would do about Iraq if he were president.

Here is a key portion of his response: "I would set a timetable for withdrawal. I would couple that with a political solution of the three ethic groups forcing them to have a political solution. There is no military solution. Specifically, I would divide up the oil revenue, the cabinet ministries and force them to come up with a new political framework. I would also study Senator Biden's federation [proposal]. I think that may be ultimately the right solution."

Richardson continued: "I would set up a Middle East peace conference that would deal with civil administration and reconstruction of Iraq.... Muslim and European nations would be part of that. I would then redeploy [US] troops, leave a residual force in Iraq [and] put [troops] where we really need them, [in] Afghanistan. I would put others in Gulf States to deal with international terrorism threats. And I would also use a large part of those financial budgets and reserves that we use in Iraq on homeland security in this country. This country is not fully protected. I would emphasize port security. I would emphasize security of our subways [and] our aircraft. I would put money in detection of those liquids that became such a problem...."

Iraq is playing a role in this year's governors races, Richardson said. He said Democrats are riding what he called a "2 percent wave" of voter preference in which the war in Iraq plays a key role.

"I think the Iraq war has a large part to do with that 2 percent, frustration over the Iraq war, frustration over the competence of the Republican administration," Richardson said. "I think all of that combines to help candidates at the state and federal level.... I think the Iraq war also is a factor in governors races. Not that every governor has a position on it. But I do think the Iraq war has coat tails ... that are benefiting Democrats. It is sort of a 'Republicans have been in office too long and they have botched this war and [voters are] going to take it out on Republican candidates.' I see that across the board."

In the longer term, Richardson expects the growth in the country's Hispanic population to help Democrats. "I think President Bush did make some inroads with Hispanic voters in the last election. Maybe 4 percent," Richardson said.

But he added, "I believe that is going to be eroded with a national perception of Hispanics seeing Republicans on the immigration bill wanting to criminalize aliens, wanting to build a fence, wanting to take citizenship away from undocumented workers' kids and having sort of a harsh attitude. So that is the flip side of the wedge issue. And in states with substantial Hispanic populations ... that is going to turn those voters into Democrats and it is going to give Democrats advantages in those states...."

Referring to states with growing Hispanic populations, Richardson said, "My view is that the West is the future of the democratic party - Nevada, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah."

There has been a controversy in the Democratic party over Democratic National Committee chairman Howard Dean spending to rebuild the party in every state. Dean's critics charge that he should focus resources on states with close races. Richardson said, "I am on Dean's side. I think what Howard Dean is doing makes sense.... That is what we should concentrate on. The DNC's role is to rebuild the state Democratic party. For instance in New Mexico ... because of the DNC we have 4 extra full-time campaign workers that have been there. That is helpful."

Ready To Rumble (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

Gotta love it when Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) accidentally come within touching distance and can't escape, but, because other people are watching, have to pretend to be nice to each other.

One such occasion occurred Tuesday, just outside the House Radio-Television Correspondents' Gallery studio where lawmakers often hold press conferences.

Hastert and other Republicans were inside the studio denouncing immigrant gang violence while Pelosi and her gang of Democrats were outside, waiting to get inside, to talk about the new National Intelligence Estimate report showing that the Iraq War has actually expanded terrorism rather than reduced it.

Pelosi, joined by Rep. John Murtha (Pa.), the leader of the Democratic drum beat against the Iraq War, and other Democrats were twiddling their thumbs waiting for Republicans to finish their spiel on gangs when the door opened. Hastert walked out and — voila! — suddenly found himself standing very, very close to Pelosi, who was wearing her signature perma-grin.

Struggling for pleasantries, Hastert said, "Fancy meeting you here!"

Pelosi, still smiling, responded in kind.

"We were talking about gang violence," Hastert said.

Everyone had a little chuckle, and Hastert went on his way. But we couldn't help but wonder: Who would take whom in a fight between the Speaker and the Minority Leader?

"The wrestling coach still has sharp skills," a GOP leadership aide said, without a trace of partisan bias, of course.

Phony Blogger Fired. A top aide to Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) was forced to resign Tuesday for using Congressional office computers to pose as a liberal on political blogs, in an apparent attempt to undermine Bass' Democratic challenger.

Bass asked longtime aide Tad Furtado to resign after HOH revealed Monday that the operators of two liberal blogs in New Hampshire had traced the suspicious poster's Internet protocol address to the House of Representatives' computer server.

"Tad Furtado posted to political Web sites from my office without my knowledge or authorization and in violation of my office policy," Bass said in a statement. He added that he was referring the matter to the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct "for their review."

House ethics rules prohibit employees from using government resources to engage in campaign activity. Furtado, who had worked for Bass since 1998, posted blog comments under the pseudonym "IndyNH" and "IndieNH." He pretended to be a liberal who didn't think Bass' opponent, Paul Hodes, could win. He suggested that "fellow" liberals follow him by investing their time and money elsewhere — "maybe CT or NY for me — they are at least close by."

Owners of the sites Blue Granite and NH-02 became suspicious and easily traced IndieNH's IP address to the House, where they figured very few offices, and perhaps only one, would have interest in the New Hampshire 2nd district race.

Reid Cherlin, a spokesman for Hodes, the Democratic challenger, told HOH, "This is the No. 2 staffer in Bass' office, and that's very serious. [Resigning] was the appropriate thing to do."

Cherlin wondered whether Furtado was conducting opposition research from Bass' office. Bass spokesman John Billings said categorically that Furtado "was not conducting opposition research from the office."

Bass said in his statement that he had "no knowledge" of his aide's activities, but that "I must ultimately accept responsibility for the actions of my staff. I sincerely apologize to anyone whose websites may have been disrupted by these posts."

Dialing for Dollars. At least we know where Minority Leader Pelosi gets some of her work done: at George's Salon in Georgetown. She was spotted there Saturday getting her hair done while talking a mile a minute on her cell phone, making fundraising calls for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

An aide had papers splayed out all over the floor around Pelosi to help her out with the pitch. (No wonder she's the single largest fundraiser for Congressional Democrats, having raised more than $45 million so far this cycle.)

"She's working so hard she can't even get a haircut in peace!" said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider.

Lantos Hearts Ricky. None of them got to dance with the Latin American pop star, but members of the House International Relations Committee did heap a whole lotta lovin' on "Ambassador" Ricky Martin when he testified before the panel on Tuesday about combating human trafficking.

No one — not even the women on the committee — seemed quite as smitten with the 34-year-old Martin as Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), the panel's ranking member. It was clear: Lantos had a man crush. He was diggin' la vida loca. Big time.

"Let me just say that while my wife of 56 years considers you devastatingly handsome, I think your true beauty lies inside," Lantos said. "Thank you very much, Ricky."

At press time, we were unable to confirm where Lantos and Martin plan to go on their first boys' weekend trip together.

Police Stop Protest At Senate Building (WP)

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The quiet, sunny atrium of the Hart Senate Office Building was transformed into a chaotic scene yesterday when dozens of war protesters filed into the lobby, formed a prayer circle, shouted Scripture and eventually were arrested as Senate staffers hung over railings and crammed glass-walled offices to watch.

Employees in the building and longtime area activists said they had never seen police allow such a demonstration in a government office building, with activists one and two stories up reading the names of the Iraq war dead, civilian and military. The names rang loudly through improvised megaphones into the building's open center. Dozens of police streamed into the atrium and arrested about 35 people, including Rick Ufford-Chase, who until recently was a top official of the Presbyterian Church (USA).

"I've been working here nine years, and I've never seen this much police activity -- except during the anthrax scare," said an employee who did not give his name because he said he had not been authorized to talk to the media.

Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Capitol Police, said: "We don't encourage people to demonstrate in the buildings. . . . I'm not aware of anything unusual about how it was handled on our end."

Thirty-five additional antiwar demonstrators were arrested yesterday around the U.S. Capitol in related protests. Hundreds of antiwar actions have taken place across the country this week as faith-based and other groups push for a timetable for the United States to leave Iraq. Thirty-four people affiliated with the umbrella organization coordinating this week's efforts, Declaration of Peace, were arrested Thursday after they refused to leave the White House without talking with President Bush.

Although leaders of major U.S. denominations have spoken against the Iraq war since it began, such proclamations are becoming louder and more prominent.

"Today was the first time national-level leaders were participating -- not just themselves but calling on members of denominations to join them," said Gordon Clark, coordinator of the D.C.-based National Campaign for Nonviolent Resistance. "And there's a big difference between going to a protest and putting your body on the line and resisting arrest. And that's what they haven't been doing before."

Participating yesterday was Rabbi Arthur Waskow, head of an interfaith dialogue center in Philadelphia and a leader of the Jewish Renewal movement. Arrested in addition to Ufford-Chase was the Rev. Jackie Lynn, president of the Chicago-based Episcopal Peace Fellowship.

Senate staffers watching the demonstration showed neither support nor opposition, simply gawking and taking photos with their cellphones as protesters below sang "We Shall Overcome," read from the Book of Jeremiah and lay on the cold floor as police filed in with plastic handcuffs.

High Court Will Examine Role Of Credit Ratings In Insurance (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court agreed to decide whether insurance companies must tell consumers that their low credit scores resulted in higher rates for coverage.

Insurance companies have faced a wave of class-action lawsuits alleging they violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act by not telling consumers that their low credit scores resulted in higher quotes for insurance coverage. The insurance industry often reviews credit scores in setting coverage rates.

The appeal, filed by Safeco Corp.'s Safeco Insurance Co. of America unit, Berkshire Hathaway Inc.'s Geico General Insurance Co. unit and other insurers, was one of nine that the court yesterday added to its workload before its term starts Monday. The companies are challenging a decision by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco that said companies must tell consumers when credit scores result in higher insurance rates. The lower court also said companies can be found liable for violating federal credit laws even without meeting a tougher "willful" legal standard that requires the companies know they were breaking the law. Companies face up to $1,000 in actual damages plus punitive damages for violation of the federal law.

Safeco Insurance v. Burr and Geico General Insurance v. Edo

The high court also said it will decide whether county municipalities can force trash haulers to bring waste to publicly owned facilities for processing. The case involves challenges by six trash-hauling companies that challenged the solid-waste flow-control laws of Oneida and Herkimer counties in upstate New York. The two counties had passed laws requiring haulers operating in the area to bring trash to waste facilities the municipalities owned.

The Supreme Court already ruled in a 1994 decision that municipalities can't direct solid-waste disposal to private waste-disposal companies that hold government contracts. But lower courts in this case decided it was fine for county governments to mandate trash business for facilities they own.

United Haulers Association v. Oneida-Herkimer Solid Waste Management Authority

The court also agreed to hear a case on whether public-employee unions must get special permission before spending some workers' dues on political causes. The case, from Washington state, involves fees paid to the Washington Education Association by teachers who decline to join the union.

Those workers still can be charged union dues to help pay for labor negotiations that affect them. But they can't be forced to pay for the union's political activities, under a string of Supreme Court rulings that reach back nearly 30 years.

At issue is whether the union needs teachers to say "yes" before the fees can be used for political causes or whether teachers must specifically object to having a portion of their fees spent for that purpose.

The court will hear arguments in the case, as well as a related lawsuit by five teachers to recover their fees, early next year.

Health-Care Premiums Rise 7.7%, Outpacing Wages And Inflation (WSJ)

By Vanessa Fuhrmans

The health-care premiums of employers and their workers have climbed twice as fast as wages and inflation in 2006 -- to nearly double their cost in 2000 -- and they look to rise at a similar clip next year, two nationwide surveys show. That said, the pace of increase is about half what it was just a few years ago.

The average family premium rose 7.7% in 2006. That compared with a 3.8% rise in wages and inflation of around 3.5%. Even so, the 7.7% increase marks the third year that employer health-care cost increases have decelerated since soaring nearly 14% in 2003, according to a 2,122-employer survey by the Kaiser Family Foundation, and by the Health Research and Educational Trust. (See the survey's findings1.)

The cost for family coverage under an employer health plan is now $11,480, well over what a minimum-wage worker would earn in a year and beyond what many companies and their workers can afford. While 98% of companies with more than 200 workers still provide some sort of employee health benefits, only 60% of smaller businesses do. That's little changed from last year but down from 68% in 2000.

"A modest reduction in an already high rate of increase hardly looks like salvation for employers and workers who've been getting hammered by high health-care costs year after year," said Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonprofit health-policy research group in Menlo Park, Calif.

Even when employers do offer health insurance, not all workers get it or can afford it. On average, only 78% of employees are eligible at these companies, either because they don't work full-time or fail to meet other eligibility requirements. And given that employers require workers to pay an average 27% of the total premium -- or $2,973 for family coverage -- many employees can't afford to accept the coverage. Indeed, the share of workers covered by health insurance through their own employer has slipped to 59%, down from 60% last year and 63% in 2000, according to the Kaiser survey.

Most people falling out of the employer-sponsored health insurance system are lower-income workers, but they tend to be healthier workers more willing to risk going without coverage, which raises the costs for the remaining, sicker pool of employees. And ultimately employers pay more as uninsured employees forgo preventive care and wind up in emergency rooms when they do get sick, says David Guilmette, managing director of Towers Perrin's health-benefits group.

The employee-benefits consultancy's own survey of 167 companies finds that larger employers expect their increases in health-care costs to slow again in 2007 to 6%, from the 7% increase they reported last year. A large-employer survey published earlier this month by Mercer Health & Benefits LLC, a rival firm, projected similar increases next year. It added that the more-moderate increase will result from increasing employees' deductibles and other cost-sharing measures.

More of the larger firms also say they're adding "consumer-directed" plans, which combine deductibles of typically more than $1,000 and some sort of tax-saving account to make employees have a more financial stake in their health-care spending.

Overall, however, relatively few companies plan to enroll in these plans next year, the Kaiser study says. Only 2.7 million people are enrolled in one through an employer, about 4% of covered workers.

High-deductible Health Policies Don't See Growth (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, September 27, 2006

High-deductible health insurance policies coupled with savings accounts — touted by proponents as an answer to rising medical costs — did not grow in popularity among employers this year, even as premiums for insurance continued to rise.

The Kaiser Family Foundation annual employer survey reported Tuesday that what employers paid for health insurance premiums rose 7.7% this year among all types of health insurance, the smallest increase since 1999, but more than twice general inflation.

Employers did not substantially raise deductibles or co-payments made by employees, or the employees' share of premiums. Still, workers are paying more because the overall premiums rose.

"Working people are still feeling the pain," says Drew Altman, president of the non-profit research group in Menlo Park, Calif.

The most common type of insurance, a preferred provider organization plan, averaged $11,765 for a family and $4,385 for single employees.

While high-deductible policies have always been sold, the new twist in the market came when Congress in late 2003 allowed certain policies to be coupled with tax-free "health savings accounts." Money not used for deductibles and other medical care can roll over and be used in future years for medical care.

Despite those policies being the biggest buzz among benefit consultants, Kaiser's annual employment survey found that only 7% of employers offered them this year, a percentage statistically unchanged since 2005.

The Kaiser survey found that the average annual deductible for health savings account plans offered by employers was $2,011 for singles and $4,008 for families. Sixty-three percent of employers contribute something toward the savings account.

While such accounts have lower premiums, the Kaiser survey found that most employers don't save money on them compared with other types of insurance, once employer contributions to those savings accounts are added to premium costs.

Asset Resources in Minneapolis, a 10-employee debt collection firm, switched to a high-deductible plan after facing several years of 17% increases in its health insurance premiums.

"The broker said we might be able to cut some costs and afford some employees an opportunity from a tax point of view," says Mark Wallerius, vice president. "It seemed a win-win at the time."

Instead of a $500 annual deductible and a $15 co-pay at the doctor's office, the new policies had an annual deductible of $1,250. For most office visits, employees had to pay the full cost of the visit until they reached the deductible.

"They were pretty disgruntled," says Wallerius, who said the employees voted to go back to a lower-deductible plan this year.

Health Premiums Rise More Slowly (WP)

By Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Increases in health insurance premiums for working families slowed for the third straight year in 2006 but still rose at a rate more than double that of inflation and growth in workers' pay, an annual nationwide survey by the Kaiser Family Foundation shows.

Premiums for workers rose 7.7 percent this year -- the lowest increase since 2000 -- down from 9.2 percent in 2005 and almost half the recent peak of 13.9 percent in 2003, according to an in-depth survey released yesterday of about 2,100 companies with three or more workers. At the end of April, when the survey was completed, wages had increased 3.8 percent from a year earlier, and the rate of inflation had increased 3.5 percent.

"Nobody's celebrating, and nobody should be celebrating," said Drew E. Altman, head of the foundation, a nonprofit organization that studies health-care issues. "A modest reduction in an already high rate of increase hardly looks like salvation to working people and businesses, who have been getting hammered by high health-care costs year after year."

Since 2000, workers' health insurance premiums have risen 84 percent, while their wages have increased 20 percent and inflation has risen 18 percent, according to the study, which was conducted with the Health Research and Educational Trust, a nonprofit research affiliate of the American Hospital Association. Kaiser and HRET have done the study since 1999.

Annual health insurance premiums for a family of four average $11,480 this year, with workers paying $2,973 of that amount, $1,354 more than six years ago, the study finds. For individuals, premiums average $4,242, with the employee having to pay $627.

About 61 percent of companies questioned offer health-care coverage to at least some employees, about the same as last year. And workers at bigger companies continued to fare better: The study found that while nearly all companies with 200 or more workers offered coverage, fewer than half of the smallest companies surveyed did, those with from three to nine workers.

Employees with health coverage at companies with up to 199 workers tend to pay more out of pocket for premiums -- $3,550 on average for family coverage -- than workers at larger firms, who pay $2,658 on average for family coverage.

Health care has been a trouble spot for U.S. companies and workers for nearly two decades, as escalating costs have forced many firms to choose between layoffs or cuts in benefits to stay competitive. As costs have risen, so have the number of uninsured Americans under the age of 65: at least 46 million in 2005, up by 6 million from 2000. About 81 percent, or 37 million, are uninsured workers and their families, said Diane Rowland, the Kaiser Family Foundation's expert on the uninsured.

Uninsured people often cost the health-care system more than their insured counterparts because they tend to wait until they are sick before seeking help, requiring more expensive intervention than they might have needed if they had been treated earlier or been given preventive care. That helps drive up health-care costs for everyone, Rowland said.

"Insurance is simply becoming less and less affordable," said Gary Claxton, one of the study's authors. "What happens to people who can't afford it, it's hard to say, but we do see a continued march upward of the number of uninsured."

The survey also found that employers and employees have not embraced what the health-care community calls "consumer-driven" plans. These are health programs with high deductibles that give a tax break to workers who save specifically for medical expenses. Only 7 percent of employers offered them this year, and only 4 percent of workers signed up for them.

Two other studies on health insurance costs were also released this week. The benefits consulting firm Towers Perrin, whose clients include the largest U.S. employers, released a study yesterday estimating that the trend in rising premiums will continue, running at 6 percent next year. While that would be the fourth year of consecutive declines in the rate of growth in premium costs, the study concluded that the cumulative increase in all health care costs, which it estimated at 60 percent in the past five years, means more employees cannot afford to pay the portion their employer doesn't.

Towers Perrin also found variations in costs of as much as several thousand dollars per employee among similarly sized firms, largely because some firms are more aggressive at measuring costs and bargaining with providers while giving employees incentives to cut costs, such as large co-payments for prescription drugs.

It found that these companies are not lowering costs by shifting them to workers. Instead, their employees often pay lower premiums than do those at similarly sized, but less-aggressive, firms.

America's Health Insurance Plans, an insurance-industry trade group, on Monday released its first study on health insurance costs for small employers, defined as companies with 50 or fewer workers and including self-employed individuals. It found that premiums ranged widely from state to state, with higher prices often attributable to more mandates -- such as requiring that certain drugs or procedures be covered -- that put the price of insurance out of reach for many smaller employers, said Karen Ignagni, chief executive of AHIP.

Health Care Costs Rise Twice As Much As Inflation (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The cost of living keeps going up, but the cost of healthy living is going up even faster.

A widely followed national survey reported yesterday that the cost of employee health care coverage rose 7.7 percent this year, more than double the overall inflation rate and well ahead of the increase in the incomes of workers.

The 7.7 percent increase was the lowest since 1999. But the average cost to employees continued an upward trend, reaching $2,973 annually for family coverage out of a total cost of $11,481.

Since 2000, the cost of family coverage has risen 87 percent while consumer prices are up 18 percent and the pay of workers has increased 20 percent, the survey noted. That is without counting the cost of deductibles and other out-of-pocket payments, which have also been rising.

"The cost trend is moderating but nobody is celebrating," said Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, which sponsored the survey with the Health Research and Educational Trust. "Businesses and workers are still being slammed year after year by rising health costs."

Despite the increasing costs, about 6 out of 10 employers still offer health coverage to attract and retain workers. But the growth in premiums is making it harder and harder for companies to raise wages and salaries.

The telephone survey of 3,159 randomly selected employers, ranging in size from three to more than 300,000 employees, was completed last May.

The continuing rise in the cost of benefits has slowed since the annual double-digit increases that peaked at nearly 14 percent in 2003. Last year's increase was 9.2 percent, the Kaiser survey said.

"It's slightly good news," said Helen Darling, president of the National Business Group on Health, a large employers' research and trade group in Washington. "It could have been worse but we certainly haven't solved all the problems."

She added, "The workers of the United States continue to give their pay raises to the health system."

Some business leaders took a more upbeat view of the survey results. "It's a very positive sign that the increases were lower than the previous year," said Katie Mahoney, health policy director of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Smaller employers, with fewer than 200 workers, faced larger increases than big companies, the survey said.

"We were looking at an increase of about 18 percent for 2006," said Mitch Flinchman, controller of Triangle Grading & Paving, a construction company with 100 employees in Burlington, N.C. The company switched to a different insurer but "still ended up with about an 8 percent increase, and it will probably go up more next year," he said.

The national cost trend would probably have been higher, analysts said, but regulators in a number of states were able to push nonprofit Blue Cross plans that are prosperous to hold down their increases, at least for a while.

In fact, the nonprofit Blue Cross plans actually had a 27 percent decline in operating profits in the first half of the year, compared with the period in 2005, said Matthew Borsch, a health care analyst at Goldman Sachs.

Tom Zimmerman said his family-owned business in Livonia, Mich., had been paying double-digit increases every year to Michigan Blue Cross and Blue Shield, until this year, when premiums rose only 2 percent. Even so, his company, Spectrum Automation, is spending $250,000 this year to cover 20 employees, he said.

Employees pay about 16 percent of premiums, or about $3,497 of an average total of $11,793, for smaller companies with fewer than 200 workers in preferred provider networks, the most common type of health plan. Workers in larger companies contributed less to premiums: $2,628, and employers put in $9,124 for a total of $11,752.

The lowest premiums were for high-deductible health plans, sometimes tied to pretax savings accounts. The White House has been pushing these plans as a way to slow costs by giving consumers more say over their medical treatments. Business groups and health care consultants support the plans.

The workers' share of premiums for family coverage in these plans was $2,247, on average. The high-deductible plans covered 2.7 million workers, including 1.4 million in the newer health savings account plans.

Mr. Altman said that despite "all the talk and debate about these plans, only a very modest number of workers are in these consumer-driven arrangements. It is still early," he added. "They are likely to grow, but how fast and how much is still very much an open question."

Douglass Community Services, a nonprofit agency with 120 employees that manages the Head Start early childhood learning program in northeast Missouri, switched to a high-deductible plan this year, rather than face a 20 percent increase in premiums for its preferred provider organization.

Janeane Reis, human resources director of the agency in Hannibal, Mo., said its premiums increased by 10 percent, even with the high deductible plan. Employees pay all of their costs up to $1,000. Then, the agency covers them for the next $1,500, she said. Above that, they are covered for 80 percent of medical fees in a preferred provider network and 50 percent if they go to doctors outside the network.

"We will probably stay with this at least another year," she said. "It's tough being in a rural area. We don't have many choices and being a not-for-profit, we work on a very slim margin."

It can be even more difficult for individuals with health problems.

Billy Lassiter, an independent inspector of oil rigs in the Gulf of Mexico, had to give up his coverage for a year after his insurer raised the premiums to $1,800 a month and refused to pay about $5,000 in medical bills, according to Faye Lassiter, who keeps the accounts for her husband, who has overcome several bouts with lung cancer.

"They wouldn't hardly pay anything," she said. The couple were not able to find a new insurer until they persuaded their son Shannon, a railroad conductor, to join them. As a three-person business in Atmore, Ala., they were able to obtain coverage from Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Alabama, she said.

Premiums were $800 a month last year and increased $100, or 12.5 percent for 2006. She said Mr. Lassiter had to skip his annual CT scan last fall while he waited a year before the new coverage kicked in. "We couldn't afford the cost of the scan," Mrs. Lassiter said.

Passing The Buck To Mom And Dad (NYT)

Many middle-class young adults are staying on their parents' health insurance long after college these days. It's an interesting trend. But in no way is it a solution to the growing problem of the uninsured. If anything, it is a stopgap measure that helps the more fortunate while sapping the political will for sweeping change.

With 47 million Americans uninsured, the nation's health system is in crisis. More and more people are seeking treatment in emergency rooms because they have nowhere else to go. By one estimate, unpaid hospital bills have reached $45 billion annually, raising the cost of health insurance by 8.5 percent for those who are insured.

Among the uninsured are more than a quarter of adults between ages 18 and 34. As Jennifer Lee reported recently in The Times, states are responding to the problem with legislation to allow children to stay on their parents' health insurance longer. New Jersey is one of eight states that have passed such a "piggyback" statute just since 2003.

College graduates in fields like media and computer technology are at the leading edge of the changing American economy, where the individual carries the bulk of the risk. For young American workers, benefits have become negotiable rather than part of the social contract. Many end up opting out of health insurance entirely, choosing to wager on their relative good health to avoid spending the hundreds of dollars a month that self-insuring can cost.

But the troubled American health-insurance system finds itself in a vicious circle as a result. The higher premiums climb (twice as fast as wages this year, according to a new study), the less likely the young and healthy are to participate. That, in turn, skews the pool of the insured even older and more infirm, making coverage still more expensive and less appealing to those who bet they can do without.

The families that can best afford to take advantage of the piggyback laws are those that could already pay for separate coverage anyway. And these laws, by making life easier for those who have the most political influence and resources, reduce elected officials' incentive to do what is really needed and find a more comprehensive national solution.

Change Comes To A Carolina (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

South Carolina civil-rights advocate Dewey Tullis explained to reporters a few weeks ago why he's supporting a Republican running for the state's top education job, Karen Floyd: "Frankly, I'm tired of seeing our young black men graduate high school without knowing how to read and write."

Mr. Tullis is joining more than a dozen African-American Democrats in the effort. Also crossing party lines to support Ms. Floyd is State Representative Harold Mitchell Jr., from urban Spartanburg. Referring to a documentary made about the state's failing schools along the interstate, Representative Mitchell tells us, "It really is a 'corridor of shame.'"

What's going on here? Fed-up South Carolina Democrats are blowing the whistle on the state's public-school system, one of the nation's worst. A recent study published by Education Week found that South Carolina has the highest drop-out rate of any state; half of its students fail to graduate from high school in four years. The state ranks 49th in both SAT and ACT scores. State achievement tests released this month show that fewer than 30% of eighth graders are proficient in English, math, science or social studies. Among African-American eighth graders, only 13% were proficient in English and less than 9% in math. These kids aren't being left behind; they're never making it to the starting line.

The state's return on educational investment is appalling. Over two decades it has increased education spending 137% -- the third largest increase in the nation -- and now spends more than $10,000 per student (including capital costs). It's of little comfort to parents that the state masks its underperformance by claiming that nearly 73% of eighth graders meet what it considers a "basic standard" in English. The state only reaches that inflated number by defining its standard as something less than "proficient."

The good news is that the Palmetto State may be reaching a tipping point that could upend the public education establishment. Reform advocates have been building grassroots support for vouchers, tax credits, charter schools -- almost anything that will give parents more options on where to send their children. Governor Mark Sanford, a Republican, is already a supporter of broad-based school choice. The problem has been the Republican-controlled legislature. A handful of GOP members (many from districts with good schools) have lined up with Democrats to oppose anything that might empower parents over the system's bureaucrats.

That is starting to change. Under intense pressure, the legislature this year passed two school-choice bills. One made it easier to open charter schools. The other created vouchers for a new early-kindergarten pilot program to allow some low-income parents to send their four-year-old children to almost any public or private school. That's left parents wondering why they don't have the same options for primary and secondary education.

The state's reformist residents are also sending a message in the one way pols can't duck -- at the ballot box. In June, three incumbent state legislators were defeated in primaries for opposing school choice. Several other incumbents, including House Education Committee Chairman Ronny Townsend, decided to retire rather than risk being turned out of office. South Carolinians for Responsible Government, a non-profit advocacy group in Columbia, estimates that in November reformers could pick up the seats they need in the house to pass education scholarships and tax credits for parents with kids in failing schools. These reforms failed this year by seven votes.

It's a long way to November. Representative Mitchell, for one, is now distancing himself from school choice, but remains undeterred in his support for Ms. Floyd. He waves off the swipes he's taken from fellow Democrats and the write-in challenger he's drawn since announcing his school-reform endorsement. "Some people really don't know the issues, or they just don't care." In South Carolina, that may finally be changing.

By AP

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

MOSCOW, Sept. 26 — Russia will ship fuel to a nuclear power plant it is building in Iran by March under an agreement signed by the two countries on Tuesday, Russian news agencies reported.

The agreement, signed by senior Russian and Iranian nuclear officials, represents a small victory for Iran, but seems certain to inflame Western anxiety over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Iran says it needs the fuel for a peaceful nuclear program to generate electricity.

But the fuel could also be enriched to create weapons-grade material, and the United States and other nations have accused Iran of using its nuclear program to develop atomic weapons.

The European Union's foreign policy chief is scheduled to meet Iran's top nuclear negotiator soon for talks on a package of incentives that Britain, France, Germany, the United States, China and Russia are hoping will encourage Iran to suspend uranium enrichment and enter negotiations.

If it does not, the United States would like to push for sanctions against Iran, though there is not full agreement with the other nations on such a course.

Iran has already missed an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend its uranium enrichment activities.

Russian news agencies reported that the deal on Tuesday had been signed by Sergei Shmatko, head of Russia's state-run company Atomstroiexport, and Mahmoud Hanatian, vice president of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization.

An additional protocol sets out a time frame for starting up an $800 million plant in Bushehr, which will be Iran's first.

"The document provides for supplying Russian fuel for the atomic energy plant in March, physical start-up in September 2007 and electric generation by November 2007," Mr. Hanatian said, according to Itar-Tass.

Mr. Shmatko said about 80 tons of fuel would be supplied, according to Interfax and Itar-Tass.

Western nations fear that Tehran could try to divert nuclear fuel used at the Bushehr plant and seek to enrich it further for potential use in a weapon.

To try to ease Western concerns over Bushehr, Russia has agreed with Iran that Tehran will ship spent fuel back to Russia.

However, Iran has resisted Russia's proposal to conduct all of Iran's uranium enrichment on Russian soil.

Tehran Denies Secret Nuke Deal (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Iran yesterday said it is not negotiating a secret temporary shutdown of its uranium-enrichment program as part of ongoing talks with the European Union, rebutting Bush administration sources who told The Washington Times that such a deal is being discussed.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, when asked about the report in The Times, said chief Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani and chief European Union negotiator Javier Solana will discuss what has been proposed already.

"These are not the issues to be discussed in the future negotiations, and as Mr. Larijani has said before, the P5+1 proposal will be the basis of the future negotiations with the representatives of the P5+1," Mr. Saeedi said.

"The P5+1" is shorthand for the group of the United States, France, Russia, China and Britain, all permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany. The nations have offered Iran a series of concessions if Iran agrees to stop developing its uranium-enrichment program.

The Times reported yesterday that Bush administration officials say Mr. Solana has been negotiating a deal with Mr. Larijani that calls for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment for 90 days and to keep it secret, so additional talks could be held with several European nations.

The officials oppose such an agreement as a further concession to Iran, which continues to defy a United Nations' call for a halt to uranium enrichment, an essential step in developing nuclear weapons.

A Security Council resolution had given Iran until Aug. 31 to stop its enrichment program or face the imposition of international sanctions. Tehran ignored the deadline, but diplomacy has continued.

John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said Mr. Solana will hold talks on the Iran nuclear issue as early as today, but Mr. Solana has not reported back on the latest discussions.

"He will be meeting shortly with Larijani, and I think we'll hear from him at that point," Mr. Bolton told reporters in New York.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Solana declined to comment on the report in The Times. Diplomatic sources said Mr. Solana and Mr. Larijani likely would meet today in Brussels.

The group of nations has demanded that Iran suspend all enrichment before new talks on the incentives can be held.

The Iranians say the enrichment is for nuclear-powered electricity-generating stations, but the United States and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) suspect Iran is working on making nuclear weapons.

The White House said the U.S. is not negotiating a secret suspension of Iranian nuclear activity. The administration has called for a verifiable suspension, which it says must therefore be public.

"What the United States has asked for repeatedly and in every instance when we talked about this is a verifiable suspension of enrichment," said Frederick Jones, spokesman for the National Security Council.

EU spokeswoman Cristina Gallach said senior EU official Robert Cooper and Iranian official Javad Vaeedi held talks in Paris on Monday.

"We are working on the meeting with Larijani, but I will not say when nor where until it really happens," she said. "We continue to engage with the Iranians in order to create the conditions for these negotiations."

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack said the administration hopes Iran will agree to suspend enrichment when Mr. Larijani meets with Mr. Solona, but he said "the United States will not be at the table for any negotiations absent a suspension as outlined by the IAEA and the Security Council."

"That means there has to be a verifiable suspension, and suspension means suspension means suspension," he said.

Asked about the deal for Iran to conduct a 90-day halt, Mr. McCormack said the answer would require having "clear and accurate insight" into Iranian decision-making, something the administration lacks.

"We'll see. We can only judge them on what it is that they do," he said.

"We certainly hope that the answer is: 'Yes, we will suspend, we will verifiably suspend in order to get to negotiations.' That's what we want. ... But we are fully prepared, along with the other members of the P5+1, to go down the track of sanctions, if that, in fact, is not the answer."

The State Department is consulting with allies on imposing sanctions on Iran if Tehran fails to stop the enrichment, he said.

Mr. McCormack said it would be "very tricky" for international inspectors to conduct inspections in Iran in secret and that the press would likely discover the inspection.

Iran may want to call a suspension "something else," but for the United States to rejoin talks, it would have to be a fully verifiable halt, he said. The Bush administration is convinced that Iran is deceiving the world about its intentions to develop uranium enrichment for electrical power generation and believes the effort is to develop nuclear weapons, specifically warheads for Iran's medium-range missiles.

Iranian Ex-Lawmaker Alleges Torture (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Ali Akbar Mousavi Khoini, a former Iranian lawmaker who has been jailed without charges in Tehran for more than 100 days, was briefly released from detention last Thursday to attend a memorial service, where he shouted out allegations of torture and other harsh treatment, according to his lawyers and other witnesses quoted by a human rights organization.

"For the past 20 days, prison officials have chained my hands and feet. I am being tortured," Khoini loudly announced to bystanders at the memorial service for Khoini's father, according to several people at the event who relayed the incident to New York-based Human Rights Watch.

"I am held in solitary confinement and interrogated four times a day," Khoini reportedly shouted. "They wake me up in the middle of the night to interrogate me. They are trying to turn me to a mental patient." Referring to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, he added, "They are forcing me to denounce my beliefs, to repent for my activities, and to ask forgiveness from Khamenei."

Calls to the Iranian mission to the United Nations in New York, seeking comment, were not returned.

Khoini, the son of a cleric and a member of Iran's reformist bloc, had long challenged Iran's judiciary and intelligence services for human rights abuses during his tenure as a legislator from 2000 to 2004. He made frequent visits to prisons and publicly searched for secret detention centers in his efforts to expose what he called inhumane practices. He was disqualified by conservative clerics from seeking reelection.

He was arrested at a rally June 12 and has been held at Tehran's Evin prison with no access to lawyers, according to Human Rights Watch officials and attorneys working for his release.

Iranian news reports said Khoini's wife, Zohreh Islamian, has not been allowed to see him for the past month and only once has been able to speak to him by telephone. At the memorial service, held to mark the 40th day after his father's death, security guards prevented Khoini from seeing his wife when he arrived, according to witnesses cited by Human Rights Watch. One of Khoini's lawyers, Mohammad Sharif, told [a] news agency in Tehran that "Khoini's wife had noticed signs of physical impact, especially on his head."

[That news agency] also quoted Sharif as saying Khoini was under pressure to write a letter requesting a pardon.

Human Rights Watch called on Khamenei to order the immediate and unconditional release of Khoini. "Iran's leaders have held Mousavi Khoini for more than 100 days without charge," according to Joe Stork, the group's deputy Middle East director. "Iran has a notorious record when it comes to getting political prisoners to 'repent' under torture," he added.

"The same intelligence apparatus that he tried to hold accountable is subjecting him to torture," Stork said. "The authorities should end this vendetta immediately and release him."

Since July 30, two prisoners incarcerated for what the Iranian government considers subversive political beliefs have died under suspicious conditions in Iranian jails, according to Human Rights Watch.

Hadi Ghaemi, another official with the group, interviewed by telephone in New York, said, "The Tehran government was looking for the opportune moment to seize him when he was spotted at a women's rally on June 12 and carried away."

Ali Afshari, a former Iranian student leader, said he was greatly pained by the report of Khoini's treatment.

Afshari, 33, who came to the United States 10 months ago and is working with the Washington-based National Endowment for Democracy, had himself served several prison terms over three years in Iran, including 400 days of solitary confinement.

"This is all very bitter," he said. "When I heard of Ali Akbar's torture, my own experience came to life. I can feel what he is going through." He and Khoini, 36, had come together 10 years ago as central committee members in the Islamic Student Association, which grouped university student activists.

The Islamic Student Association was one of the organizations created by supporters of the late Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, leader of the Islamic republic, and the group later became a vehicle for reformists, like Khoini and Afshari, to challenge what they considered heavy-handed tactics by the Iranian authorities.

An online journal called Gozaar, meaning Transition, devoted to the discussion of democracy and human rights in Iran, and launched this month in Persian and English, will feature an interview with Khoini's wife and the wives of other detained political activists, according to Mariam Memarsadeghi of the group Freedom House.

Rice Gives North Korea Nuclear Talks Effort Six Weeks To Resume (AFP)

AFP, September 27, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she would travel to Asia in the next six weeks to see whether to make "one last push" to convince North Korea to return to multilateral negotiations on ending its nuclear weapons program.

North Korea agreed to join the negotiations with China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the United States a year ago but began boycotting the talks two months later.

Amid reports the reclusive regime could be planning its first test of a nuclear bomb, Rice said in an interview released Monday that time was running out to bring North Korea back to the negotiating table.

"This current situation isn't really acceptable," she said in the interview with The Wall Street Journal, a transcript of which was released by the State Department.

She said a UN Security Council resolution adopted unanimously after North Korea carried out a series of missile tests in July "sent some shockwaves through the North."

The resolution demanded that Pyongyang stop missile-related activities, confirm its moratorium on missile launches and return unconditionally to the six-way talks.

Rice said in light of North Korea's continued refusal to return to the negotiating table, further action was needed.

"We are in discussions now with South Korea, Japan, and I suspect I'll go to Asia sometime in the next month to six weeks, probably next six weeks or so, to take stock and see whether or not one last push to get the six-party talks back on can be made," she said.

North Korea said its boycott of the six-party talks was a reaction to financial sanctions imposed by the United States on a Macau bank allegedly used to launder money and finance illicit North Korean activities.

Since July's UN resolution, Japan and Australia have also imposed sanctions on firms suspected of involvement in North Korean weapons programs.

Pyongyang has also demanded that Washington engage it in direct negotiations, rather than deal only through the six-party forum.

While Washington has rejected direct negotiations, Rice said her top envoy on the North Korea issue, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, has met with his North Korean counterpart on the sidelines of previous six-party meetings.

"We've had situations where the night before the six-party talks, a couple nights before, Chris Hill sat with his North Korean counterpart and talked," she said.

"There's no absence of an opportunity to talk, it's that the North Koreans haven't been willing to show up at the forum in which to talk," she said.

Rice said that in the meantime, Washington would continue its financial measures "because they do relate to illicit North Korean activities."

Rice also sought to counter suggestions of a growing rift between the United States and South Korea over how to approach the crisis, with Seoul seen as favoring more diplomacy rather than threats of sanctions against its volatile neighbor.

"South Korea has been more helpful than you might think," she said.

She said South Korea had told allies during meetings on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly here last week of efforts it was making to put pressure on the North, including cutting back badly needed food assistance and fertilizer supplies.

She said those measures could be intensified and threaten overall North-South economic ties if North Korea goes ahead with the rumored nuclear weapons test.

"The South Koreans have been very clear, if the North were somehow to have a nuclear test, to have a missile test, that would put a lot at risk in their relationship," she said.

Israel Sets Goal Of Pulling Troops Out Of Lebanon By Sunday (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

TEL AVIV, Sept. 26 — Israeli troops are expected to be out of Lebanon before the Jewish holy day of Yom Kippur begins on Sunday night, according to Israeli officials and the United Nations after a meeting in Naqura, Lebanon, on Tuesday.

“It is my belief that with the necessary cooperation by both parties we should see the I.D.F. leave south Lebanon by the end of this month,” Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini, commander of the United Nations forces in Lebanon, said of the Israeli Defense Forces.

In Jerusalem, the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, told Parliament that Israel hoped to complete its withdrawal from Lebanon under a United Nations resolution “during this week or at the latest several days later.”

Mr. Peretz said Israel wanted reassurances about the rules of engagement for both the United Nations and Israel in the case of cease-fire violations by the Shiite militia group Hezbollah.

Later Tuesday, however, Israeli officials suggested that some of those issues remained unresolved, including how to deal with protests along the border and whether the United Nations forces would act against Hezbollah if necessary or simply inform the Lebanese Army about violations.

The resolution, passed some six weeks ago, put an end to 34 days of fighting between Hezbollah and Israel that included bombings of southern Beirut and some 4,000 Hezbollah rockets fired on the cities of northern Israel.

Israel had said it wanted to leave Lebanon by the end of last week, before the Jewish New Year, but delayed, saying the United Nations forces, which are supposed to reinforce the Lebanese Army, were not up to strength. They number barely more than 5,000 now, only about 3,000 more than when the war ended and far short of the 15,000 called for under the resolution.

But the Israeli Army also did not want to pull out of Lebanon before a big Hezbollah rally last Friday, when its leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, appeared in public for the first time to declare a divine victory.

Israel also said it would continue aerial surveillance over Lebanon to prevent the resupply of weapons to Hezbollah until the resolution was fully carried out. That includes the release of two captured Israeli soldiers and the monitoring of the largely unmarked border between Lebanon and Syria, which helped to supply Hezbollah with sophisticated arms from Iran and Syria itself.

Israeli forces have now left approximately 90 percent of the buffer zone in southern Lebanon captured during the war, handing over areas to the Lebanese Army and the United Nations force.

But Israel has also left behind what United Nations officials said could be as many as a million unexploded bomblets from cluster bombs fired by artillery during the last days of the war, the United Nations said.

On Tuesday, Arjun Jain of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees said in Beirut that 200,000 Lebanese displaced by the Israel-Hezbollah war were being delayed from returning home because of the unexploded bomblets.

"Displacement is going to continue for many months to come," Mr. Jain said.

Since the cease-fire, 14 Lebanese have been killed and 90 injured by the bomblets, the United Nations said, while about 40,000 of the bomblets have been cleared. The officials estimate that about 40 percent of the cluster bombs failed to explode.

In one of a series of New Year interviews, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has again dismissed the idea of peace talks with Syria. "As long as I serve as prime minister, the Golan Heights will remain in our hands because it is an integral part of the state of Israel," Mr. Olmert said.

Israel captured the strategic plateau in the 1967 war and unilaterally annexed it in 1981. Some Israelis have suggested that given the threat from Iran, Israel should accept a Syrian offer for peace talks to try to wean Syria, a Sunni country, away from its alliance with Tehran.

In an attack on Tuesday, Palestinians fired rockets into Sderot, wounding a soldier. [(A news organization) reported that hospital officials said Israeli forces bombed a house in Rafah in the Gaza Strip on Wednesday, killing a teenage Palestinian girl in a nearby building and wounding 10 others.]

In Gaza, hopes for a unity government including Hamas and Fatah dimmed a bit more when a prominent Hamas leader, Mahmoud Zahar, said, "We won't recognize Israel and the previous signed agreements."

He added, "Such agreements have been a burden to Palestinian daily lives, and the government won't let Israel's hand strike against us in all directions while we depend on unfruitful negotiations."

The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, is expected to travel to Cairo for talks with the Egyptians.

Bush Signs US-Oman Trade Pact (AFP)

AFP, September 27, 2006

US President George W. Bush signed the US-Oman Free Trade Agreement, the fifth such extensive trade pact with a Middle Eastern country since he took office.

DOJ_NMG_0069941

US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said in a statement that the accord was "good news for the United States, Oman, and our efforts to promote economic opportunity in the Middle East."

"The agreement also marks a milestone in strengthening ties and promoting freedom in the Middle East," she said after Bush signed the accord into law.

The FTA with Oman is part of an effort by Washington to create a Middle East Free Trade Area (MEFTA) by 2013, building on existing agreements with Israel, Jordan, Morocco and Bahrain.

Bush has said he wants greater trade with the Middle East not just for the commercial benefits to US companies but for the political openness he believes could result in one of the world's most restive regions.

Critics led by Democratic opponents in Congress have argued the Oman trade pact would erode labor rights both in the United States and in other countries.

Korean Leads Race To Succeed Annan (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- The race for United Nations secretary-general is moving into its final weeks with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon well in front, but the late entry of Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, who would be the first woman in the post, muddles the odds.

Seven declared candidates are now in the running to succeed Kofi Annan in January, and more could enter. They include a U.N. official who writes novels, the deputy prime minister of a recently deposed government, an ambassador with a passion for disarmament, a prince with peacekeeping experience, and a former World Bank executive from a shattered nation.

All the declared candidates are from Asia -- which under an informal rotation system expects to field the next secretary-general -- except Mrs. Vike-Freiberga, whose candidacy could sink on the geographic considerations despite the fact that several nations would like to see a woman in the post.

China, a veto-wielding permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, signaled early that it would not accept a candidate from a country outside Asia.

Singapore's ambassador to the United States, Heng Chee Chan, has been widely mentioned as a highly qualified Asian woman who could satisfy nearly everyone. She is well- thought-of by Washington, and regarded as particularly strong in trade and economic issues, and familiar with the United Nations, having been the Singaporean ambassador to the world body before she came to Washington a decade ago. But she and her government insist that she is not a candidate.

Mrs. Vike-Freiberga's prospects will become clearer after a straw poll among Security Council members tomorrow. Mr. Ban topped two previous polls.

The Asian and African groups agree that the next secretary-general must be from Asia. Washington appears to have accepted that it cannot win approval for someone outside Asia, however qualified, without a bruising fight.

New candidates can still come forward until the Security Council members make their selection, something they hope to do in the next three weeks. Under U.N. rules, the council chooses a single candidate whose selection must be ratified by the General Assembly.

Mr. Annan steps down at the end of the year after a decade in a job that frustrates description. The U.N. secretary-general is both an administrator and mediator, a global conscience and a figurehead.

The job pays approximately $275,000 a year, with a mansion overlooking the East River in Manhattan. Unless one of the five permanent members of the Security Council wants the secretary-general out, the successful candidate can expect to serve a second five-year term.

The Americans have made clear that they want someone who will be more "secretary" than "general," with excellent management skills and a commitment to transparency and fiscal reform. "A decaffeinated Kofi Annan," as some have put it.

Based on their resumes and public statements, candidates who fill that description include the front-running Mr. Ban, a soft-spoken South Korean who has promised to heal rifts between member states and pursue efforts to streamline the 61-year-old international organization.

His public persona is more soothing than passionate, leading some private organizations to worry that he would not challenge governments on human rights and other internal issues. He is increasingly seen as the candidate the five veto-bearing permanent members can live with, rather than anyone's first choice.

Ashraf Ghani, 57, a new entrant who was Afghan finance minister during the post-Taliban period, also may have some traction. He drafted a reconstruction plan that raised nearly $30 billion in 2001, and is well-known to State Department and White House officials. American educated, he also has had a global career at the World Bank.

But he is not nearly as well known as Shashi Tharoor, the telegenic Indian author and U.N. communications czar who placed second in the last straw poll. Mr. Tharoor, 50, has been campaigning vigorously, courting foreign officials, American Jewish groups and worldwide popular opinion.

Mr. Tharoor's dedication to the United Nations the past 25 years may work against him, because U.S. and British diplomats say a career officer may not be the best person to reform the organization.

Surakiart Sathirathai, 48, the former deputy prime minister of Thailand, has been lining up support for almost two years, a campaign that was derailed by a coup in his homeland last week.

His formal support from the Association of Southeast Asian Nations has effectively shut out candidates from nine other nations, including Singapore's Mrs. Chan. Nonetheless, council ambassadors want more candidates to come forward to give them a wider choice.

After Annan, What Kind Of UN Leader? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

As Kofi Annan prepares to wrap up 10 years at the helm of the United Nations, admirers say the soft-spoken Ghanaian has overseen an expansion of the secretary-general's role into "the world's top diplomat."

Critics are more apt to point to the deteriorating esteem that much of the world holds for its largest international organization, or to the scandals that have rocked its walls, and conclude that a truer moniker might be "world's worst manager."

Now, as Mr. Annan approaches the end of his second five-year term in December, his accomplishments and shortcomings are defining the search for his successor, who could be selected as early as next month. Does the world need most a globe-trotting arbiter and executive - or someone who will put the house in order?

Two schools of thought have opened up on what the next secretary-general should be, says Edward Luck, a UN expert who teaches at Columbia University in New York: "a spokesman for the world, a kind of secular pope," or "someone who learns the lesson of Kofi's legacy and is careful not to overstretch the bounds of the office - but focuses instead on managing and leading the institution."

While candidates are already campaigning for the post, no consensus has formed around any one of them - in part because UN members, in particular on the powerful Security Council, have different views of what is most needed for the job.

Almost no one challenges the notion that Annan has presided over the UN during a decade of deep global change, or that an institution gathering 192 nations under its umbrella has evolved from the world's biggest convener of conferences to much more of a "doer" organization - managing more peacekeepers than ever, spearheading development efforts, fighting AIDS.

"The UN under Kofi Annan has begun to adapt to a very different world and a very different mission" than that of the world body's first half century, says Lee Feinstein, a UN expert at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "It's much less a talk shop, much more a place that does things."

But the UN's reputation is also badly tarnished in the wake of the oil-for-food probe and other scandals. Some critics believe the UN under Annan has aligned itself too closely with American foreign policy, while others, notably among US conservatives, say Annan has presided over the transformation of the UN into a den of inefficiency, corruption, and anti-Western thinking. President Bush recently noted that support for the UN among Americans is at it lowest level ever.

Annan has not shied away from addressing previously "taboo" topics for the secretary-general, such as the promotion of democracy, individual rights versus those of government, the individual's right to protection, inequitable wealth distribution, and genocide, Mr. Feinstein says.

Yet despite that, the UN has suffered from failing to operate effectively or efficiently as it has expanded its workload, he adds. "And part of that is because Kofi Annan has not been an effective and efficient manager," he says.

That view, widely held among Annan admirers and detractors alike, has led many analysts to conclude that what the UN needs most now is not so much the "world's top diplomat" as a manager with a laser focus on internal operations who will make the organization work better.

"Yes, you need the well-respected international figure, but beyond that, what is needed as secretary-general is someone who is tremendously focused on reforming a highly flawed institution," says Nile Gardiner, an expert in international institutions at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

"You need someone who won't just preside over a deep well of corruption but will dig in and do something about it," he adds, "someone who will challenge time-honored practices like hiring and promotion rules that too often yield the lowest common denominator."

Annan did launch a major reform effort in March 2005 that was to be the capstone of his tenure. But to some observers, it was fanciful to think that an ambitious overhaul including broad management reforms, expansion of the Security Council, and the addition of new tasks could be accomplished in the wary and distrustful atmosphere of the post-Iraq-invasion period.

"No one thought it was a propitious moment for such a wide-ranging undertaking," says Professor Luck of Annan's reform agenda. "When oil-for-food hit, he should have pared it down to focus on management," he says, adding, "Kofi is a decent man with many talents, but managing people isn't one of them. He seems to want everyone to like him."

Though it was hardly the sole responsibility of Annan, management reform stalled last year and is unlikely to go anywhere by December - and that means it will fall on the plate of whoever replaces Annan.

"Fiscal management, patronage within the UN system: Those are issues that Kofi Annan tried to address but that the next secretary-general will have to pick up," says Karl Inderfurth, a former State Department official who now teaches international relations at George Washington University in Washington.

While he agrees that management will have to be fixed if the UN is to succeed at its many and multiplying tasks, he says the next secretary-general will have to be mindful as well of the world's greater expectations of the UN in global security.

"Especially in the years of Kofi Annan, the world has come to look at the UN as the global 911," Mr. Inderfurth says, "So the new secretary-general will come in having to deal with those expectations."

That will mean tackling the thorny issue of Security Council reform, something Annan attempted but got nowhere with fast. For starters, says Inderfurth, who is a former US undersecretary for South Asian affairs, that will mean adding two new Asian members, Japan and India, to the Council's five permanent members, with other members likely to be added.

Annan "didn't get the updating of the Security Council that he wanted," Inderfurth says, "but it's something his successor will have to accomplish if the UN is to reflect not the world of the cold war but the world of the 21st century." Who's who in the race to be next UN chief

As the hunt for the next secretary-general at the United Nations heats up, the latest question to dominate the deliberations is this: Does it hurt a candidate if his country has just undergone a military coup?

Surakiart Sathirathai, Thailand's ousted deputy prime minister and one of seven announced candidates to succeed Kofi Annan, should know the answer this Thursday, when the 15-member Security Council takes another in a series of straw polls on the secretary-general's race.

In the last informal vote earlier this month, Mr. Surakiart came in third - but that was before military leaders overthrew Thailand's elected government, including him. Since then, the military leaders have said they support Surakiart's candidacy. But China - a veto-wielding member of the Security Council - has said the coup "complicates" the Thai's campaign to lead the UN.

If Surakiart is down, then it would seem to follow that other candidates are up. They include South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-Moon, generally considered the leading contender; Shashi Tharoor of India, a longtime UN diplomat and currently the UN undersecretary-general for public information, who came in second in the last straw poll; Jordan's UN Ambassador Prince

Zeid Raad Zeid al-Hussein, who played a key role in establishing the International Criminal Court; and Jayantha Dhanapala of Sri Lanka, a former UN undersecretary-general for disarmament affairs.

Two candidates have emerged since the last straw poll on Sept. 14: Afghanistan's former finance minister, Ashraf Ghani; and Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga.

Some countries say the eventual winner may not have even emerged yet - though UN ambassadors hope to settle on a candidate in October and avoid a repeat of the down-to-the-wire election of Mr. Annan in 1995. He vacates his post at the end of the year.

Attention in the selection is focused on the 15-member Security Council, because the Council sends its nominee to the 192-member General Assembly for an up-or-down vote.

All the announced candidates to date are from the Asia region, except Ms. Vike-Freiberga. That is in line with a UN tradition of rotating the regions represented in the secretary-general's office - a rotation that would dictate an Asian holding the next five-year term.

China is known in the halls of the UN headquarters in New York to be pressing strongly for the tradition to be followed - and many outsiders agree, saying the economic and political rise of Asia warrants an Asian holding the job. On the other hand, the United States, which has not yet made any preference known, has said the best candidate should hold the job regardless of regional origin.

One thing seems certain, however: The next "SG," as UN regulars refer to the organization's chief, won't be Bill Clinton.

Rumors flew a year ago that the globally popular former American president was a top contender for the post, but since then, Mr. Clinton has poured cold water on the idea.

Japan Vows To Step Up Bid For Security Council Expansion (AFP)

AFP, September 27, 2006

Japan has vowed to pursue its campaign for reform of the UN Security Council from which it hopes to secure a permanent seat on the key body despite opposition from some of its neighbours.

Giving Japan's speech to the UN General Assembly, the country's UN envoy Kenzo Oshima said the Security Council risked seeing its credibility further damaged if it did not change.

"Perhaps a limited few might find it in their interest to leave the Security Council configured in the way it was in 1945," Oshima said.

"It is clear, however, that no-one stands to gain from the waning credibility of the council that failure to reform it could entail."

The current council has five permanent members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- each of which can veto any resolution passed by the body.

Japan, Germany, India and Brazil have pressed to become permanent members but opposition has come from the United States and China.

"The need for a more effective, representative and transparent Security Council that can live up to the demands of the new century is not a mere rhetoric but is real and urgent," said Oshima.

He added that most countries wanted change "with a sense of urgency" and "Japan is determined to continue to take the initiative in this critical endeavour."

The United States has said it favours Japan's permanent membership of the council but China has expressed opposition, because of Japan's wartime past.

North Korea spoke strongly at the assembly against Japan becoming a permanent member.

The North's Deputy Foreign Minister Choe Su Hon said Tuesday: "With regard to the expansion of permanent membership, a country like Japan, the war criminal which invaded Asian countries and committed a massacre of innocent people, but has been distorting its aggressive history instead of liquidating it, should never be allowed to become a permanent member."

DOJ_NMG_0069945

By Martin Fackler

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

TOKYO, Sept. 26 — In his first act after being installed as prime minister, Shinzo Abe, a popular nationalist who has vowed to make Japan more assertive globally, appointed a cabinet on Tuesday packed with social conservatives and foreign-policy hawks.

Mr. Abe, 52, bowed deeply in front of lawmakers after winning 339 votes in the 476-member lower house, which selects the prime minister.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Abe's predecessor and political mentor, Junichiro Koizumi, vacated the prime minister's residence in central Tokyo after nearly five and a half years. Mr. Abe had been virtually guaranteed to succeed Mr. Koizumi, 64, since winning last week's leadership election in the Liberal Democratic Party, which has governed Japan for most of the past half-century.

Mr. Abe is Japan's youngest prime minister since World War II and the first to be born after the war. His ascension appears to be a changing of the guard in a country that has kept a low profile in international affairs since its defeat in 1945. He enters office riding a crest of popularity, as his message of renewed national pride has found followers amid the resurgence of Japan's long dormant economy.

"Japan must be a country that shows leadership and that is respected and loved by the countries of the world," Mr. Abe said Tuesday in his first news conference as prime minister. "I want to make Japan a country that shows its identity to the world."

At the same time, Mr. Abe (pronounced AH-bay) said he wanted to improve relations with South Korea and China, which soured after Mr. Koizumi paid visits to a Shinto shrine honoring Japan's war dead.

Mr. Abe called on the leaders of South Korea and China to meet with him, something both countries refused to do with Mr. Koizumi. So far, Mr. Abe has been vague about whether he will visit the shrine.

He told reporters that one goal of his administration was to revise Japan's pacifist Constitution, written after World War II by American occupation forces, to permit a full-fledged military. He also indicated that he favored closer military cooperation with Washington. These goals have alarmed many here who worry that any upgrading of the status of the armed forces could damage ties with Asian neighbors, which fear a revival of Japanese militarism.

After winning leadership of the governing party last week, Mr. Abe reportedly spent several days holed up in his country retreat near Mount Fuji, drawing up his cabinet. His choices, said Tomoaki Iwai, a professor of politics at Nihon University, and others, gave a decidedly hawkish bent to the new administration.

Mr. Abe increased the number of advisers to the prime minister, adding new posts for national security, education and the issue of Japanese citizens kidnapped by North Korea. Many of his appointees are in their 50's, a decade younger than most cabinet ministers in the past.

One of the most watched appointments was to the new job of national security adviser, which went to Yuriko Koike, 54, a former television reporter. Ms. Koike has been a vocal supporter of the economic sanctions on North Korea linked to its refusal to provide more information on the fate of Japanese citizens kidnapped two decades ago.

Another was the education adviser, Eriko Yamatani, 56, a critic of sex education and the teaching of "excessive" equality of the sexes in schools.

The new state minister in charge of sex equality, Sanae Takaichi, 45, has opposed allowing women to have different legal family names from their husbands, a freedom women sued to win in the late 1980's.

The defense agency chief, Fumio Kyuma, a 65-year-old party veteran and a friend of Mr. Abe's, and the foreign minister, Taro Aso, 66, who ran against Mr. Abe in last week's leadership vote, retained their positions.

There are few political heavyweights in top economic posts, reflecting what some economists and political scientists said was a shift in priorities toward foreign policy and national security. Mr. Koizumi, in contrast, filled economic posts with prominent reformers like Heizo Takenaka, a former economics professor credited with fixing Japan's debt-ridden banking system.

Mr. Abe said he wanted to continue Mr. Koizumi's market-oriented reforms but also pledged to fight the growing discrepancies in incomes and opportunities that they have helped create. Mr. Koizumi's critics blasted him for turning egalitarian Japan into an American-style society of winners and losers.

But Mr. Abe seemed to speak most forcefully on security issues, and on the need for Japan to have a larger voice in global affairs. One of his goals, he said, will be getting Japan a permanent seat on the United Nations Security Council.

Japan PM Vows To Speed Up Reforms (FT)

By David Pilling

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

Shinzo Abe, Japan's new prime minister, named a cabinet of mainly like-minded conservatives on Tuesday. The line-up reflects the priorities of his ruling Liberal Democratic party as well as his own desire to surround himself with ideological friends.

Analysts said the cabinet of Mr Abe, who was sworn in by parliament on Tuesday, reflected an independent streak, though not as much as his predecessor Junichiro Koizumi, who revelled in ignoring party protocol and bringing in outsiders.

Mr Abe named 11 freshmen to his cabinet, signalling a generational shift. At 52, he is the first prime minister born since the war and the youngest in 65 years.

Youngsters – by Japanese standards – in the cabinet and among senior party officials include Yasuhisa Shiozaki, 55, chief cabinet secretary, Shoichi Nakagawa, 53, LDP policy chief, and Nobuteru Ishihara, 49, deputy secretary-general.

Mr Nakagawa, in particular, is considered close to Mr Abe, sharing views that Japan needs to defend its national interest more vigorously, rewrite its US-written pacifist constitution and make education more patriotic.

Mr Shiozaki, another close friend, will also have special responsibility for people kidnapped by North Korea, an emotive issue that helped propel Mr Abe to the top slot.

On the economy, Mr Abe balanced youth with experience, nominating Koji Omi, 73, a former trade ministry bureaucrat, as finance minister. Mr Omi, who rallied older parliamentarian support for Mr Abe, will be expected to seek spending cuts in line with the premier's pledge to trim bureaucratic fat before considering tax increases.

Kaoru Yosano, the economy and financial services minister tipped for a top cabinet post, was passed over, possibly because his reputation as a fiscal hawk conflicted with Mr Abe's emphasis on promoting growth, analysts said.

Takao Toshikawa, a political commentator, said the cabinet was largely in Mr Abe's image and not unduly influenced by LDP backroom dealing – the way cabinets were formed before Mr Koizumi. It was stacked with people who might be seen as "neo-cons or rightwingers", Mr Toshikawa said, but he stressed that Mr Abe's conviction politics were tempered by a strong streak of pragmatism.

The new prime minister, for example, had sent strong signals to China about getting relations back on track. No summits between the leaders of Asia's two biggest economies took place during Mr Koizumi's 5½ year tenure, largely over the issue of Mr Koizumi's visits to a controversial war memorial.

As foreign minister Mr Abe stuck with Taro Aso, the incumbent, who ran against him for the premiership. Mr Aso is considered a hawk not obviously suited to the role of improving relations with China, but he has emphasised his willingness to meet Chinese leaders without conditions.

Mr Aso has also floated what he says are long-term solutions to the diplomatic controversy over the Yasukuni shrine.

New Prime Minister Vows to Concentrate On Economy, China

TOKYO -- Shinzo Abe was elected prime minister of Japan yesterday and announced a cabinet lineup that indicated he would follow many of the policies of his predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi.

Mr. Koizumi's five years in power were defined by moves to reduce the size of the government -- through spending cuts and privatization programs -- and to give Japan a more-assertive foreign policy. Yesterday, Mr. Abe pledged to speed up these fiscal overhauls to keep the country's economic recovery on track, and to improve ties with China.

The new prime minister appointed some old hands for foreign and defense posts, but he made some unexpected choices for important economic positions. The economy minister will be Hiroko Ota, who sat on the Council on Economic and Fiscal Policy during Mr. Koizumi's term, when the committee decided major economic policies. She also has close ties to Heizo Takanaka, who was the architect of Mr. Koizumi's economic policies but is leaving politics.

Mr. Abe's finance minister will be Koji Omi, 73 years old, a long-serving politician who has held various economic jobs in the government in the past, though not for several years. As economy-planning minister in 1997, Mr. Omi wrongly predicted that Japan's economy would recover "around the time cherry blossoms bloom" in the spring. Japan's economy continued to deteriorate for years.

"Most of these names will be unknown to a foreign audience," wrote Richard Jerram, an economist for Macquarie Securities, in a report. He speculated that the appointments could indicate that economic policies "will not be an important focus for the new administration."

Mr. Abe reappointed Taro Aso as foreign minister. Mr. Aso, who was one of Mr. Abe's contenders for the premiership, will assist the new prime minister as he strives to repair relations with China and South Korea. These ties soured under Mr. Koizumi's rule partly because he paid annual visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni war shrine, which honors war criminals as wells as conscripted soldiers.

Mr. Abe is a supporter of the shrine and has paid his respects there in the past, but he hasn't said whether he will visit as prime minister.

Mr. Aso, who also has visited Yasukuni in the past, has suggested bringing the shrine under government control, a move that might help defuse the controversy surrounding it.

Mr. Abe is also an advocate of close military ties with the U.S. and a bigger military role for Japan -- both policies that Mr. Koizumi promoted. Fumio Kyuma, who served as defense minister from 1996 and 1998, was appointed to that post for a second time.

Mr. Abe had been voted leader of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party last week, and yesterday, both houses of Parliament elected him prime minister. At 52, Mr. Abe is set to be the nation's youngest prime minister since World War II.

After being voted LDP president last week, he pledged to continue with Mr. Koizumi's economic policies of reining in public spending while generating higher tax revenues through strong economic growth.

Yesterday, Mr. Abe took the symbolic step of cutting his own pay by 30% to help trim the budget.

In Valedictory Speech, Blair Declines To Name Departure Date (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

MANCHESTER, England, Sept. 26 — With some wisecracks and familiar rhetorical flourishes, Prime Minister Tony Blair delivered his final speech as Labor leader to the party's annual conference on Tuesday, saying it was "hard to let go" but "right to let go."

He offered no formal endorsement of his presumptive heir, Gordon Brown, however, and did not set a date for his own departure, suggesting that he would pursue a Middle East peace initiative and other projects for "months" to come.

Mr. Blair's appearance was his first major address since he bowed three weeks ago to a sustained campaign by Mr. Brown's supporters to force him to step down. At that time, he said he would leave office within a year. The power struggle left both men politically bruised.

The speech was closely watched for signs that they had reached some kind of peace, particularly since Mr. Brown offered Mr. Blair fulsome praise in a similarly scrutinized speech on Monday.

Mr. Blair described Mr. Brown, his longtime rival, partner and would-be successor, as "a remarkable man. A remarkable servant to this country."

"I know New Labor would never have happened, and three election victories would never have been secured, without Gordon Brown," he said as Mr. Brown, the chancellor of the exchequer, sat close by against a flame-red backdrop. The two men did not shake hands after the speech, suggesting there was little warmth between them.

Some delegates leaving the hall said Mr. Blair had been less than generous to his finance minister, who has presided over sustained economic growth. "Gordon gave more to Tony than Tony gave to Gordon," said one delegate, Peter Riddle, from the northwestern city of Carlisle.

Others said Mr. Blair had delivered a fitting farewell for loyalists, like Maurice Epstein, a Labor activist from Brighton, who called Mr. Blair "my God, the greatest prime minister." He added, "I'm heartbroken that he's going."

For many Laborites the valedictory address — choreographed as much as a victory rally as an adieu — offered the beginnings of a transition after almost a decade in power, during which Mr. Blair alienated voters because of his support of the White House in Iraq, Afghanistan and the campaign against terrorism. Some said Mr. Blair should announce a date to leave soon.

"Gordon Brown needs no acclaim from Tony Blair because he's the leader in waiting," said Steve Barber, a Labor Party member from Nottingham, in the English Midlands. "It would be better if Tony Blair named a date, sooner rather than later. His one failing was Iraq, and it was an error that I still hold against him."

British newspapers on Tuesday trumpeted an episode on Monday when, according to the Bloomberg news agency, Cherie Booth, the wife of the prime minister, was overheard remarking that Mr. Brown was a liar for saying it had been a privilege to work under Mr. Blair.

Bloomberg said it stood by the article. British officials denied it, but the episode illustrated what even Mr. Blair indicated Tuesday was a rocky relationship between Ms. Booth and Mr. Brown, whose office is next door to the Blairs' on Downing Street. "At least," Mr. Blair said in his speech, "I don't have to worry about her running off with the bloke next door."

Mr. Blair's speech drew longer and more passionate applause than Mr. Brown's address on Monday, emboldening some of the prime minister's followers to say that he should not be hurried out of office, as Mr. Brown's supporters had been seeking. "I don't really see why he should go before the next conference," said Marsha Healy, a Labor party member from Manchester.

Mr. Blair's deft handling of the Labor crowd — drawn from a party that supposedly wants to be rid of him — showed the extent to which Labor has relied on his oratory as a vote winner. Supporters held up placards with slogans like "Too young to retire," and ''Things got better."

Mr. Blair used his speech to try to energize the faithful to fight and win a fourth election, possibly in 2009. "The scale of the challenges now dwarf what we faced in 1997," he said, referring to the year Labor came to power. "In 1997, the challenges we faced were essentially British. Today, they are essentially global."

Mr. Blair dwelt on the campaign against terrorism, saying, "We will not win until we shake ourselves free of the wretched capitulation to the propaganda of the enemy, that somehow we are the ones responsible. This terrorism isn't our fault. We didn't cause it."

He also defended actions by Britain as an ally of the United States in Afghanistan and Iraq. "If we retreat now, hand Iraq over to Al Qaeda and sectarian death squads and Afghanistan back to Al Qaeda and the Taliban, we won't be safer. We will be committing a craven act of surrender that will put our future security in the deepest peril."

Blair In Tough And Tender Farewell (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

Tony Blair on Tuesday bade farewell to the Labour conference with a tough but tender speech, declaring he loved his party – but that it must not retreat into a leftwing "comfort zone" of politics after he is gone.

In a dazzling final address to the Labour conference that left many delegates in tears, the prime minister said he wanted to heal the divisions with Gordon Brown, the chancellor, whom he praised as "a remarkable man, a remarkable servant to this country".

In spite of accusations that Mr Blair has been forced out in a coup orchestrated by the chancellor's allies, the prime minister told the conference: "Of course it is hard to go. But it is also right to go – for the country and for you, the party."

However, Mr Blair – as expected – stopped short of endorsing Mr Brown as his successor.

He also declared that he wanted to stay at Downing Street into next year, saying his energies "over the coming months" would be focused on trying to boost the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

Mr Blair's main goal in the hour-long speech was to advise Labour on how it must set about winning the next general election – something that he described as the "only legacy that has ever mattered to me".

Mr Blair said that after a decade in power Britain was "a changed country", that the party had "changed the terms of the political debate".

But he said Britain still needed to meet the challenge of globalisation. "The British people are reluctant global citizens," he said. "We must make them confident ones."

Meeting this challenge meant his successor would have to be courageous. "A governing party has confidence, self-belief. It sees the tough decision and thinks it should be taking it."

Mr Blair outlined a string of tasks for the party in the years ahead.

On the reform of health and education sectors, he said the issue at the next election would be which party would put "the patient and the parent" first.

On foreign policy, he also insisted Labour must have the right outlook internationally. "Nothing we strive for . . . can be solved without America or without Europe," Mr Blair said.

He said that to give up these alliances would significantly reduce Britain's "power, weight and influence".

One of Mr Blair's main aims was to reject claims that he had always been a "closet Tory".

He said: "They say I hate the party and its traditions. I don't. I love this party. There's only one tradition I ever hated: it was losing."

But he drew the loudest applause when he made a quip about how his wife Cherie had reportedly expressed disgust in the middle of Mr Brown's speech on Monday: "At least I don't have to worry about her running off with the bloke next door."

Peter Mandelson, the European commissioner, said after the speech: "Once again he has shown himself to be the best politician by a mile in this country – and he always will be."

Blair: Strong Ties With U.S. Essential (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 27, 2006

MANCHESTER, England — Prime Minister Tony Blair, in his final address to his governing Labor Party, said Tuesday that being the United States' strongest ally can be difficult, but it is crucial to stay close to the United States in the war on terrorism.

During his turbulent 12 years as prime minister, British troops were sent into battle in Iraq and Afghanistan and suicide terrorists attacked on British soil.

"Yes, it's hard sometimes to be America's strongest ally," he said. "At the moment, I know people only see the price of these alliances. Give them up and the cost in terms of power, weight and influence for Britain would be infinitely greater. Distance this country, and you may find it's a long way back."

The speech, his last at a Labor Party annual conference as party leader, was a chance for Blair to remind detractors of his accomplishments and urge his party to stay on course when he leaves office in the next year.

Under his leadership, Labor swept into power in 1997 for the first time in 18 years. He forced the left-leaning party into the center and emphasized such issues as health care, fiscal discipline and crime fighting. Blair, 53, and Labor were re-elected in 2001.

He noted Tuesday that the domestic issues that once dominated the agenda had been replaced by global challenges such as climate change, organized crime and religious extremism.

"We used to feel we could shut our front doors on the problems and conflicts of the wider world. Not anymore. The British people today are reluctant global citizens. We have to make them confident ones."

Blair's Farewell Stresses Alliance (WT/AP)

By Jennifer Quinn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069950

MANCHESTER, England -- Tony Blair gave his last address to his Labor Party as prime minister yesterday, saying it is important to stay close to Washington in the fight against terrorism even though it can be hard to be the United States' strongest ally.

The 53-year-old leader acknowledged it would be difficult for him to leave office, but that it was the right thing to do.

In a wistful but forward-looking speech, Mr. Blair told the party it must remain bold if it is to hold onto power and said the only legacy he cared about was his Labor Party winning a fourth term.

Delegates, grateful for the three straight election victories to which Mr. Blair led their party, listened raptly as he spoke and frequently interrupted him with cheers. Many waved supportive placards reading "Too young to retire" and "Tony, you made Britain better."

Mr. Blair fondly recalled his start in politics as a young parliamentary candidate in 1983, and said Labor had changed the terms of debate in British politics during his time as leader.

"The truth is, you can't go on forever," he said. "That's why it is right that this is my last conference as leader."

Although Mr. Blair has long had a love-hate relationship with a party he has remade since taking its helm in 1994, he said he would always watch Labor's achievements with pride -- whether or not it took his parting advice.

Mr. Blair said fighting terrorism would remain a tough challenge for Britain in the years after he leaves office, but that it was crucial to stay close to the United States -- despite the severe political damage he suffered for his tight relationship with President Bush and his support for the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

"Yes, it's hard sometimes to be America's strongest ally," he said, adding that close involvement in the European Union could also be difficult. "At the moment, I know people only see the price of these alliances. Give them up and the cost in terms of power, weight and influence for Britain would be infinitely greater.

"Distance this country and you may find it's a long way back," he said.

Mr. Blair gave in to a fierce rebellion in the party to announce on Sept. 7 that he would step down within a year, although he has not set a date.

He offered warm praise for Treasury chief Gordon Brown, the man expected to succeed him, but stopped short of making an endorsement. Mr. Blair said Labor would never have won its three terms without Mr. Brown's contributions, but acknowledged their relationship had been strained at times.

"In no relationship at the top of any walk of life is it always easy, least of all in politics," he said. "[Mr. Brown] is a remarkable man, a remarkable servant to this country. And that is the truth."

Labor, he said, had so succeeded in remaking British politics that the opposition Conservative Party has moved away from the right and toward the center in response.

The address came a day after Mr. Brown strengthened his claim to the top job with a self-confident speech setting out a centrist vision for the party.

Blair Bids Fellow Laborites Farewell (LAT)

By Janet Stobart

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

LONDON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair took an emotional leave of his Labor Party on Tuesday with a speech that defended his transatlantic alliance with President Bush and touted his government's achievements at home.

In an address that was frequently interrupted by applause and followed by a standing ovation, Blair acknowledged recent criticisms of his foreign policy. But he told delegates at the party's annual conference in Manchester that battling terrorism meant entering into partnerships that were not easy "for a sovereign nation like Britain."

"It's hard sometimes to be America's strongest ally. Europe can be a political headache," he said in the televised remarks. "But there are not halfhearted allies of America today and no semidetached partners in Europe. And the truth is that nothing we strive for, from the world trade talks to global warming, to terrorism and Palestine, can be solved without America, or without Europe."

Blair, 53, who announced this month that he would step down as party leader and prime minister before the next party conference in September 2007, began his address by offering thanks to "the Labor Party for giving me the extraordinary privilege of leading you these past 12 years."

He also thanked his family, particularly his wife, Cherie, using humor in an attempt to ease controversy over a comment attributed to her. Bloomberg News quoted her Monday as muttering "that's a lie" during an address by treasury chief Gordon Brown, Blair's likely political heir, as Brown spoke of his warm ties with the prime minister.

"At least I won't have to worry about her running off with the bloke next door," Blair quipped. The Brown family lives in No. 11 Downing Street, next door to the prime minister's official residence.

In a brief tribute, Blair said the party's victories in the three last national elections "would never have been secured without Gordon Brown. He is a remarkable man, a remarkable servant of the people."

"Leaders lead, but in the end it's people who deliver," contributing to his government's achievements since Labor seized power from the Conservatives in 1997, he said. It was people and not politics, he said, whose efforts had created new hospitals, schools, cities and businesses.

Long applause greeted his vow that Labor would achieve a fourth term in power in national elections to be held by 2009. Before then, Brown is expected to succeed Blair as party leader and prime minister.

Compared with 1997, Blair noted, Britain's future had become more tightly bound to international politics, and that has brought new insecurities.

"Ten years ago, immigration was hardly raised and terrorism meant the IRA," he said, referring to the Irish Republican Army. "Not anymore.

"Globalization, climate change, organized crime, suicide bombers born and bred in Britain who bring carnage to the streets of London in the name of religion" are just some of the issues he said are now facing Britons.

"The British people today are reluctant global citizens; I want them to be confident ones," he said.

Britain could be still more competitive in areas such as technology, financial services and bio-science. "America does not want stem cell research. We do, we welcome it here," he said.

The war on terrorism "is a struggle that I believe will last a generation or more," he said, while rejecting the criticism that the U.S. and British military presence in Iraq and Afghanistan was encouraging Islamic militancy.

"This is not our war against Islam," he added, "this is a war fought by extremists who pervert the true faith of Islam. It is not British soldiers who are sending car bombs into Baghdad or Kabul to slaughter the innocents."

The Anglo-American alliance, and particularly Blair's strong personal relationship with Bush, is still a stumbling block for the prime minister's legacy, said Michael Cox, professor of international relations at the London School of Economics.

"For the first time since the Suez crisis of the '50s, foreign policy is a major issue behind the fall in a prime minister's popularity," Cox said. "It is a major cause of unease in the Muslim world."

Yet there was little criticism offered by the party faithful Tuesday, despite recent complaints over both Blair's foreign policy and his unwillingness to commit to a date for stepping down as prime minister.

Blair's farewell was "highly emotional but not remotely sentimental," said Charles Falconer, the lord chancellor. "He constantly challenged the party to move forward and face challenges like Middle East peace, the war on terror. We have all got to move to respond to these challenges."

In Parting Words, Advice For Labor (WP)

Blair Urges Perseverance In Fight Against Terrorism

MANCHESTER, England, Sept. 26 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair, addressing his Labor Party's annual conference for the last time, warned Britain that if it retreats from Iraq and Afghanistan after he leaves office, "we will be committing a craven act of surrender."

DOJ_NMG_0069952

In an emotional hour-long address, Blair spoke of a continued need for a strong alliance with the United States and for British commitment to a global fight against terrorism that "will last a generation and more."

Blair, 53, recently said he would resign within a year. Pressure in his own party has been building for him to make way for a new leader. Since he became prime minister in 1997, his sky-high popularity ratings have plummeted because of domestic scandals, fatigue with a third-term government, his backing of the Iraq war and his closeness to President Bush.

But Blair won a sustained standing ovation after a televised address that seemed like the beginning of the country's goodbye to him. "Of course, it's hard to let go," he said. Many in the audience dabbed tears. One held a handwritten sign that said "Too Young to Retire."

In what some interpreted as a reference to his much-criticized decision to go to war in Iraq, Blair said: "The British people will, sometimes, forgive a wrong decision. But you know something, they won't forgive not deciding. They know the choices are hard."

"Yes, it's hard sometimes to be America's strongest ally," Blair said. "But believe me, there are no halfhearted allies of America today." He said strong ties are needed with Europe and the United States, though "at the moment I know people only see the price of these alliances."

"Nothing we strive for, from the world trade talks to global warming to terrorism and Palestine can be solved without America or without Europe," he said. Give up these alliances, he said "and the cost in terms of power, weight and influence for Britain would be infinitely greater."

"It's sad to see him go," said Wendy Nichols, 48, a party supporter from Yorkshire.

But others at the convention of 20,000 Labor party members, journalists and guests in Manchester's city center were not won over by Blair's eloquence. "He has made a lot of mistakes," said Mary Clarkson, a city councilwoman from Oxford. "I think the time has come" for his resignation. She said she would be very happy if Gordon Brown, the finance minister and leading candidate to succeed Blair, took over.

Blair praised Brown, though the relationship between the two men has soured recently amid reports that Brown may have directed -- or at least not stopped -- his loyalists from campaigning for Blair's resignation.

On Monday, a reporter wrote that she overheard Blair's wife, Cherie, saying, "Well, that's a lie," when Brown spoke of what a privilege it has been to work with Blair. Although she denied saying those words, they became front-page headlines, reviving talk about a feud between the two men, who live beside each other in London at 10 and 11 Downing Street.

Blair brought down the house when he joked: "At least I don't have to worry about her running off with the bloke next door."

Recapping achievements of his tenure, including enacting new rights for gay couples, shepherding economic growth, reducing poverty and banning fox hunting, Blair offered what he called his "advice" to the party.

He said it needed to resist any urge to move back to the left and should keep the center ground. And, he said, it needed to be fully aware that the world had changed: "We used to feel we could shut our front door on the problems and conflicts of the wider world. Not anymore. Not when suicide bombers born and bred in Britain bring carnage to the streets of London in the name of religion."

He went on: "If we retreat now, hand Iraq over to al-Qaeda and sectarian death squads, and Afghanistan back to al-Qaeda and the Taliban, we won't be safer. We will be committing a craven act of surrender that will put our future security in the deepest peril."

He said he would "dedicate" his waning days as prime minister to trying to broker peace between Israelis and Palestinians. In a distancing from Bush administration policy, he said Britain should strive to lead in bioscience: "If America does not want stem cell research -- we do."

"He is the political phenomenon of our age," Michael Smyth, a partner at a London-based law firm, said after Blair left the stage. To many, a feeling hung in the hall that an era was ending.

The Rebranding Of British Conservatives (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069953

LONDON -- Since David Cameron became leader of Britain's Conservative Party late last year, he has been on a marketing blitz worthy of the public-relations executive he once was.

Traveling on dog sleds, he visited a Norwegian glacier in April to demonstrate his concern about global warming. This month, he toured impoverished areas of India. He has created an "A-list" of 160 political candidates, including an openly gay soap-opera actor, whom he is pushing for seats in Parliament's House of Commons, saying Conservatives need more diversity among its representatives. The party's new logo is an oak tree, symbolizing strength and endurance.

By concentrating on social and environmental issues, Mr. Cameron hopes to shed the image of Conservatives as right-wingers determined to lower taxes for the wealthy and cut welfare. He reasons that by shifting the party to the center of the political spectrum, he will pick up swing voters who previously supported Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labour Party.

While elections are as long as three years away, it looks like Mr. Cameron, 39 years old, has the best chance in a decade to put the party of Margaret Thatcher back in government.

Mr. Blair, after nine years in office, outlasting four Conservative Party leaders, has said he will step down early next year. That will set the stage for Mr. Cameron and Mr. Blair's successor -- most likely Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown -- to go head to head in the next general election, which must be held by early 2010.

Mr. Cameron's decision to rework the Conservative Party's image came in response to surveys showing the party was seen as out of touch. Last year, polling company Populus U.K. Ltd. asked 1,509 people if they agreed with a plan to tighten immigration controls. One group was told the idea came from the Conservative Party. Another group wasn't. The latter group liked the policy more.

The findings, along with other research, helped persuade Mr. Cameron he needed to change the Conservative Party's image, or "brand," says Michael Moszynski, a director at the M&C Saatchi advertising agency who supervised the party's ads in the last election.

"When other people have said, 'We just have to work our way through our policies,' he realizes that won't be enough," Mr. Moszynski says. "His objective is to change the way people feel about the Conservative Party. That has to come before the policies." Mr. Cameron declined to be interviewed for this article.

Mr. Cameron's main policy document -- an 11-page "statement of values" -- is so generic it is impossible to know how his rhetorical shift will shape the Conservative Party's position on issues like adoption of the euro, nuclear power and health spending. The document includes the sentence: "We believe that there is more to life than money."

Mr. Cameron's efforts with British voters are paying dividends, putting his party consistently ahead of Labour in opinion polls for the first time in more than a decade. Mr. Blair, in an emotional farewell speech to Labour's annual party conference yesterday, warned the party it would lose the next national elections if it slipped leftward to satisfy its core voters instead of fighting Mr. Cameron for the center.

"David Cameron's Tories? My advice: Get after them," he said, before painting Mr. Cameron as a policy lightweight. Mr. Blair attacked Mr. Cameron for "pandering to anti-Americanism" and his professed dislike of the European Union, hesitating over whether to end Britain's moratorium on building nuclear-power stations, and promising to cut taxes as well as increase government spending.

"The Tories haven't thought it through. They think it's all about image," Mr. Blair said. "If we can't take this lot apart in the next few years, we shouldn't be in the business of politics at all."

Labour has reason to be concerned. In local government elections in May, the Conservative Party received more votes than it had in 14 years. Polls show Mr. Cameron is more popular than Mr. Blair. In a Guardian newspaper poll last week, when respondents were asked which party they would vote for with Mr. Brown as Labour leader versus Mr. Cameron's Conservatives, 31% said Labour and 37% said Conservative.

While Mr. Cameron, a former head of corporate affairs at a British television network, Carlton Communications PLC, had a privileged upbringing -- he attended Eton, then Oxford, and is part a group of Conservatives known as the Notting Hill set for the tony London district where many of them live -- his message is pitched at middle-class voters. In speeches, Mr. Cameron often concentrates on education, environmental issues and social justice. He has dropped the Conservative Party's rhetoric on immigration, taxes and crime. He has distanced himself from the administration of President Bush, saying arguments for the war on terrorism are "unrealistic and simplistic," a big step for a party that has long been closely aligned with U.S. Republicans.

Mr. Cameron frequently bikes to work and is installing a wind turbine, solar panels and rainwater tank at his family's London home where he lives with his wife, Samantha, creative director of a luxury stationery and leather-goods shop, Smythson of Bond Street. And, in a country where health care is a huge political issue, he speaks often about his experiences in public hospitals looking after his 5-year-old son, who has cerebral palsy.

Jill Diver, a 49-year-old television engineer from North London, says she is considering voting for Mr. Cameron, ending her lifelong support of the Labour Party. "I think he genuinely believes what he says on Green issues," she says. "I think he's trying very hard, and I think he's very genuine."

His political opponents note he has yet to lay out policy details. "I think he's done a clever repositioning of his brand, but his changes are very much skin deep," says Hazel Blears, chairman of Mr. Blair's Labour Party.

Next month, Mr. Cameron will have an opportunity to detail his vision for the country when he gives the keynote speech at the Conservative Party's annual conference. He won't announce any major policies, his office says.

Party Games

Election year politics appear to be a common factor in splitting Republicans.

In the case of the terrorist surveillance bill, for example, the House leadership wants to give a lead role to Rep. Heather Wilson (R., N.M.), who faces a tough re-election at home and is eager to show her independence from the White House. Debate this week provides such a window, but then precludes a quick deal with the Senate. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) acknowledged as much today, saying it is unlikely the warrantless wiretaps legislation will get to the White House before the elections. “We would like to, but I think that might be a stretch,” Mr. Boehner said.

In the case of the stymied defense authorization bill, House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois wants to add legislation that would make it easier to deport illegal aliens found to be members of criminal gangs. That’s a serious issue with Virginia House members, who turned out in support of the speaker at a news conference today. But Virginia Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has argued that the issue shouldn’t be added at this late stage to a measure for national defense. – David Rogers

Spellings Higher Ed Plan Gets Mixed Grades

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings wants to make colleges more accountable to students and their parents, and to that end has proposed setting up an extensive database of student demographics and performance.

Charles Miller, who chaired an Education Department advisory commission, has said he envisions an approach that would require colleges to submit students’ scores on standardized tests. The panel’s report points to such examples as the Collegiate Learning Assessment, currently used by more than 100 colleges, and the Measure of Academic Proficiency and Progress, a gauge of reading, math, writing and critical thinking used by 350 colleges for their own self-assessment or accreditation.

The idea for the database has raised hackles among privacy advocates following disclosures that the Education Department shared information on student financial aid applicants with the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of the government’s counterterrorism work.

Members of the higher education community aren’t happy, either. “We’re perplexed when she says there’s not much information on accountability,” says David Warren, president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities. “Our Web sites are overflowing with information.”

Spellings argues that college is a major investment. “For most families this is one of the most expensive investments we make,” she said. “Yet there is little to no information on why costs are so high and what we’re getting in return.”

DOJ_NMG_0069955

Spellings might not have the last word. Key senators led by Mike Enzi of Wyoming, chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee and Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, the committee's ranking Democrat, warned Spellings that she could be called to the principal's office. "The draft recommendations. . .are broad and will likely require legislative action before they could be appropriately included in regulations," they wrote. –Anne Marie Chaker

FCC Keeps Lid on Media Ownership Hearing

In a week, the five-member Federal Communications Commission is scheduled to hit the road for the first of six public hearings on the contentious media ownership issue. So far, we know the hearing will be in the Los Angeles area and it will be on Tuesday. All of the other details, including where it will be and who will speak, still haven't been released.

Media interest groups are fuming about the delay as FCC officials continue to bicker over the details. One holdup is that new Republican commissioner Robert McDowell is pressing to hold the hearing in the Los Angeles suburb of El Segundo, where his brother happens to be mayor. Other FCC officials want to hold the event closer to downtown Los Angeles, perhaps the University of Southern California campus. Details are expected to be announced late Tuesday or on Wednesday, two FCC officials said.

UPDATE: Late today, the FCC said it would hold its ownership hearing in two different places: the USC Campus from 1 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. and the El Segundo High School from 6:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. A list of panelists would be released "prior to the hearing" and the public will be able to participate "via open microphone." –Amy Schatz

No Laughing Matter

The World Bank plans brown-bag breakfasts next week on management of public toilets in developing nations. "There are 2.6 billion people without toilets of any kind," says senior water and sanitation specialist Peter Kolsky. "If they had a latrine, I'd be a happy camper."

Neighborhood facilities are common in such cities as Nairobi and Bombay; the problem is making sure they're cleaned and maintained. "If it belongs to everybody, it belongs to nobody," Kolsky says. China, India and Kenya provide possible models for other countries.

Kolsky says he is still firming up the timing of a brown-bag lunch on fecal sludge. –Michael M. Phillips

Senate May Delay Vote on China Tariffs

Leading China critics in the Senate said they may again delay action on a bill to slap a big tariff on Chinese-made goods, signaling a willingness to avoid a confrontation over a long simmering currency dispute. The measure reflects wide concern on Capitol Hill with China's currency practices and is intended to raise pressure on Beijing to loosen control of the yuan. Critics contend Beijing pushes the value of its currency artificially low as part of a concerted strategy to give Chinese companies an unfair advantage in world markets.

Lead sponsors of the legislation, Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), had been pointing toward a vote this week, raising alarms in the Bush administration that the U.S.'s free-trade credentials abroad could be undermined. But after meeting with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, the senators suggested they would be willing to put off action, pending further discussions with Treasury over the next day or two about the administration's new strategy engagement with China on economic issues. They stressed that no final decision had been made. –Greg Hitt

Puppy Love

Earlier this month, Republican Michael Steele, who's running for Maryland's open Senate seat, made a prediction:

DOJ_NMG_0069956

"Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowd. Grainy pictures and spooky music saying, 'Steele hates puppies. And worse,'" he warned. "For the record, I love puppies."

Washington Wire loves puppies, too, and the doggie in the commercial was a cutie.

It was perhaps a little surprising that it took 11 days for Steele's prediction to come true. Today, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee released a new ad which went on the air in several broadcast markets around Maryland.

"It's nice that Michael Steele likes puppies, but he's running for the United States Senate, and it's important to know where he stands on the issues," the announcer intones, before panning through photos of the candidate with President Bush, ending on a heart-shaped photo of the two together.

The ad is scheduled to run at least a week, DSCC spokesman Phil Singer said, although he declined to say how big the ad buy is.

Steele's race against Democratic Rep. Benjamin Cardin is capturing a lot of attention and money from both parties. A poll released Sunday by the Baltimore Sun, however, showed Cardin with an 11-percentage point lead over Steele. The survey of 815 likely voters put Cardin at 51% to Steele's 40%.

Steele's puppy ad was among a series of chatty, light spots that have tried to introduce him to Maryland voters as a different kind of candidate. In such a competitive election season, where it seems like every ad is already negative even though the election is still five weeks away, is humor the way to go? –Amy Schatz

Another Week, Another Blow for Allen

It must feel like Christmas morning every day in the Arlington, Va., campaign headquarters of Democratic senatorial candidate Jim Webb.

Allen

His opponent, Republican Sen. George Allen, has battled charges of racism for calling a Webb campaign worker "Macaca" and that he denied his Jewish heritage. His campaign went into crisis PR mode, after Salon.com released a story Sunday night which featured three former football teammates at the University of Virginia accusing Allen of using racial epithets when describing black players in the early 1970s.

Allen and his campaign staff vigorously denied the charges, releasing statements from four other ex-teammates that refute the claims. But the story was picked up by national media outlets, including the Washington Post and ABC News.

In some ways, the story took a slightly more serious turn for the Allen camp last night, when well-respected (and widely, widely quoted) University of Virginia political science professor Larry Sabato told Chris Matthews on MSNBC's "Hardball" last night that "I'm simply going…to stay with what I know is the case and the fact is that he did use the n-word, whether he's denying it now or not." Reporters may not know any of Allen's former teammates, but Sabato has returned a lot of phone calls over the years.

Christopher J. LaCivita, senior consultant with the Allen campaign, told the Richmond Times Dispatch that "Allen and Sabato, who were classmates at U.Va., were not friends in college and did not travel in the same social circle." –Amy Schatz

McClellan Deputy Is Picked to Be Acting CMS Administrator

Leslie Norwalk, deputy administrator of the Center for Medicare and Medicaid Services, has been chosen to be the acting administrator once Mark McClellan leaves the post Oct. 14. In selecting her, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt said she "played a central role" in implementing Medicare's new drug benefit and is also helping redesign Louisiana's health care system after Hurricane Katrina.

Norwalk, a lawyer, said in an email to her agency staff today that "CMS has been my home for the past five years.… I am committed to a stable, seamless transition and will work to move forward as quickly as possible." She said that Herb Kuhn, director of Center for Medicare Management, will become her deputy. In his current job, he has been responsible for developing Medicare reimbursement policies and regulations. –Jane Zhang

U.S. Loses Top Spot in Global Competitiveness Survey

The U.S.'s huge budget deficit threatens to make the country's economy less competitive, according to a study by the World Economic Forum, a Switzerland-based institute. The Forum's annual study of global competitiveness says the U.S. is only the sixth most competitive economy in the world, slipping from first place in last year's ranking thanks to mediocre scores for its public finances.

The competitiveness study ranks countries around the world according to a range of criteria — including macroeconomic policies, market regulations, technological development, education systems and public institutions — which the Forum believes influence an economy's level of productivity, and thereby its ability to sustain economic growth over many years. The ranking combines economic indicators with the findings from a survey of business executives.

Switzerland ranks No. 1 in this year's survey, thanks to what the Forum sees as a combination of efficient public administration and flexible markets. Three Nordic countries — Finland, Sweden and Denmark — come next, followed by Singapore and the U.S. Read the full article. –Marcus Walker

Senate May Delay Vote On Punitive Tariffs On China (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two of the Senate's leading China critics signaled a willingness to avoid confrontation in a long-simmering currency dispute, after a fresh appeal from the Bush administration to delay action on a bill to impose a hefty tariff on Chinese-made goods.

The legislation reflects widespread concern on Capitol Hill about China's currency practices and is intended to raise pressure on Beijing to loosen control of its currency, the yuan. Critics contend Beijing keeps the currency's value artificially low as part of a strategy to give Chinese companies an unfair advantage in world markets.

The lead sponsors of the legislation, Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, had been pushing for a vote this week, raising alarms in the Bush administration that action on the measure could tarnish the U.S.'s free-trade credentials.

But after meeting yesterday with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, the senators suggested they would be willing to delay action pending further discussions with the Treasury in the next day or two about the Bush administration's new strategy of engagement with China on economic issues. They stressed that no final decision had been made.

For both lawmakers, a critical issue in piloting the legislation is how to maximize their influence in the broader China debate. They might win a victory by forcing a vote on the legislation before Congress leaves town for midterm elections, but that victory might prove ephemeral given the uncertain fate the measure faces in the House and President Bush's opposition to it. On the other hand, carrying the issue forward into this fall's lame-duck session or into the new Congress to be seated next year might give them a better chance of continuing their sway in the debate.

Both lawmakers suggested they were impressed by Mr. Paulson's command of the myriad issues roiling the U.S.-China economic relationship and his commitment to change. "He's of the opinion the Chinese are embarking on real reform," Sen. Graham said. "It may not go as fast as we would like. But I need to absorb what he said and see if I can validate it in my own mind."

On a visit to China last week, Mr. Paulson launched a high-level dialogue aimed at addressing the flashpoints in the relationship between the two countries, including the U.S.'s currency complaints. During the visit, he held face-to-face meetings with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao. Treasury officials cited the sessions as evidence the new Treasury secretary is able to command the attention of Chinese officialdom in ways his predecessor couldn't.

"We're going to have to weigh this in terms of our long-term strategy of opening up China. Where America has a competitive advantage, we want to make sure that they open up," Sen. Schumer said. "We need to see real progress, and a path to progress."

The Schumer-Graham measure, which would levy a 27.5% tariff on Chinese goods if Beijing doesn't act to relax its control of the yuan, enjoys wide support in the Senate. But Sens. Schumer and Graham have put off an up-or-down vote on the bill three times before, amid urgent appeals from the Bush administration to give the Chinese more time to move on the currency front. In contrast to previous occasions when the issue was coming to a head, the senators this time had specified that they wanted a vote this week, voicing frustration with the slow pace of action in Beijing.

Calpers Looks At Investing In China (FT)

By Anuj Gangahar And Francesco Guerrera

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

The California Public Employees Retirement System, the largest US public pension fund, is considering investing for the first time in Chinese companies, aiming both to capitalise on the country's booming economy and to raise its exposure to emerging markets.

Such a move by Calpers, which has not invested any of its $208bn (€164bn) portfolio in Chinese companies because of poor corporate governance standards, could have a ripple effect on other US public pension funds and increase demand for Chinese shares.

In an interview with the Financial Times, Russell Read, Calpers' recently appointed chief investment officer, indicated that the fund could begin by investing in Chinese companies with US or international listings through American Depository Receipts and Global Depository Receipts.

He said the pension fund's staff could recommend the strategy to Calpers' board in the coming months.

Mr Read, who shaken up Calpers' investment strategy since joining in June, said the issue of how to invest in China and other emerging markets was a primary focus for the Sacramento-based fund. "Investing properly in the emerging markets . . . is fundamental to our investment success," he said.

Calpers, which has a reputation as a tough guardian of shareholders' rights, has so far excluded China from its list of investable markets.

The list is updated yearly and is up for re-evaluation by the Calpers board in February, although permission to invest in ADRs and GDRs could come sooner.

In spite of China's fast-growing economy, its capital markets have proved disappointing to foreign investors. The local stock markets have been volatile and are closed to all but a small group of investors picked by the Chinese government.

However, several big companies, including the state oil giants Petrochina and CNOOC and telecommunications operators China Telecom and China Mobile, have listings in Hong Kong and trade ADRs in the US.

Calpers has some real estate holdings in China. Other US public pension funds also have a degree of exposure to China, although in most cases it appears to be limited to real estate.

Opera Canceled Over A Depiction Of Muhammad (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey And Mark Landler

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 26 — A leading German opera house has canceled performances of a Mozart opera because of security fears stirred by a scene that depicts the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad, prompting a storm of protest here about what many see as the surrender of artistic freedom.

The Deutsche Oper Berlin said Tuesday that it had pulled "Idomeneo" from its fall schedule after the police warned of an "incalculable risk" to the performers and the audience.

The company's director, Kirsten Harms, said she regretted the decision but felt she had no choice. She said she was told in August that the police had received an anonymous threat, but she acted only after extensive deliberations.

Political and cultural figures throughout Germany condemned the cancellation. Some said it recalled the decision of European newspapers not to reprint satirical cartoons about Muhammad, after their publication in Denmark generated a furor among Muslims.

Wolfgang Börnsen, a culture spokesman for Chancellor Angela Merkel's conservative bloc in Parliament, accused the opera house of "falling on its knees before the terrorists."

"It is a signal to other stages in Germany, or even elsewhere in Europe, to put no works on their programs that criticize Islam," he said.

The disputed scene is not part of Mozart's opera, but was added by the director, Hans Neuenfels. In it, the king of Crete, Idomeneo, carries the heads of Muhammad, Jesus, Buddha and Poseidon on to the stage, placing each on a stool.

"Idomeneo," first performed in 1781, tells a mythical story of Poseidon, or Neptune, the god of the sea, who toys with men's lives and demands spiteful sacrifice.

The cancellation of the performances fanned a debate in Europe about whether the West is compromising values like free expression to avoid stoking anger in the Muslim world.

Already in Germany, there is growing sentiment that Pope Benedict XVI may have overdone his contrition for a recent speech in Bavaria, in which he cited a historical reference to Islam as "evil and inhuman." The speech set off waves of protests in Muslim countries.

The interior minister, Wolfgang Schäuble, who has defended the pope and called for more dialogue with Muslims in Europe, said canceling the opera was unacceptable and "crazy."

Michael Naumann, a former German culture minister, said, "It's a slap in the face of artistic freedom, by the artists themselves." Mr. Naumann, now the publisher of the weekly newspaper Die Zeit, added, "The pope showed the way by being so extraordinarily apologetic."

The sulfurous public reaction prompted some people to speculate that the decision might eventually be reversed.

Ms. Harms said the "Idomeneo" production, which was first staged by the Deutsche Oper in 2003, would remain on the opera's program. It could be performed later, she said, though she would have to consider the political and diplomatic aspects of "this complex issue."

The scene with the severed heads aroused controversy among Muslims and Christians when the Deutsche Oper first staged it. But the company was not the target of any organized protests, and the Deutsche Oper put four performances on its calendar for this November.

Then, in August, came the anonymous threat.

"All this came in light of the cartoon controversy," said a police spokesman, Uwe Kozelnik. "We started to investigate and finally concluded that disturbances could not be ruled out."

While the police said they did not pressure the Deutsche Oper to cancel the opera, they supported the decision.

Berlin's chief security official, Ehrhart Körting, drew a parallel between the decision and that of German newspapers earlier this year to resist reprinting the cartoons depicting Muhammad.

"Even the German journalists' association criticized the reprinting of the cartoons because their publication could hurt the religious feelings of one group of people," Mr. Körting said in a statement.

Muslim leaders in Germany reacted cautiously. Several planned to participate in a conference on Wednesday organized by the government to foster a better dialogue with Germany's 3.2 million Muslims.

The leader of the Islamic Council, Ali Kizilkaya, told a radio station in Berlin that he welcomed the cancellation, saying a depiction of decapitated Muhammad "could certainly offend Muslims."

"Nevertheless, of course, I think it is horrible that one has to be afraid," Mr. Kizilkaya said, according to The Associated Press. "That is not the right way to open dialogue."

The head of the Central Council of Muslims in Germany, Ayyub Axel Köhler, declined to comment on the decision, saying he wanted to learn more about the circumstances.

Those circumstances appear to be in some dispute.

At a news conference on Tuesday, Ms. Harms said she broached the possibility of removing the offending scene with Mr. Neuenfels. When he resisted, she let the matter drop.

However, a lawyer for Mr. Neuenfels, Peter Raue, said Ms. Harms telephoned the director on Sept. 9 to tell him she planned to cancel the performances. The issue of tinkering with the ending never came up, Mr. Raue said, and in any event, "you couldn't change it; it is part of the story."

The scene devised by Mr. Neuenfels puts a sanguinary ending on an opera that, in the way Mozart wrote it, ends with King Idomeneo giving up his throne to appease the god of the sea, and blessing the romantic union of his son Idamante with the Greek princess Ilia.

The severed heads of the religious figures, Mr. Raue said, was meant by Mr. Neuenfels to make a point that "all the founders of religions were figures that didn't bring peace to the world."

André Kraft, spokesman for Komische Oper, a more adventurous opera house where Mr. Neuenfels is engaged in another Mozart production, described the 65-year-old director as "a secularist who does not believe religion solves the problems of the world."

For the Deutsche Oper, the cancellation is a major crisis for a prestigious opera company that has been in transition. Founded in 1912 as the Deutsches Opernhaus, the company moved to its present building in western Berlin in 1961, opening with a production of Mozart's "Don Giovanni."

Ms. Harms was appointed director in 2004, coming from a less prominent opera house in the northern German city of Kiel. While there, she said, she faced a bomb threat to the opera house. Ms. Harms plans to present her first production, a little-known work by Alberto Franchetti called "Germania," on Oct. 15.

Some critics of the decision to cancel said it revealed the weaknesses of Berlin's generously supported cultural institutions.

"Because they are subsidized by the German state, there is a great deal of artistic independence, but also a lack of accountability and intellectual rigor," said Gary Smith, the director of the American Academy in Berlin.

The practice of updating classical operas — often with current political or social themes — is common in Germany. But the cancellation of "Idomeneo" could make this production a landmark of another kind.

"I've never heard of something like this, or even similar to it," said Nikolaus Lehnhoff, a prominent German opera director. "I have seen many politically incorrect performances in Berlin. I think the reaction to the pope's speech has sensitized the cultural scene."

Opera Canceled For Fear Of Muslim Ire (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Germany's top security official yesterday sharply criticized a Berlin opera house's cancellation of a performance of Mozart's "Idomeneo" for fear of Muslim reaction to a scene showing the severed head of the prophet Muhammad.

"We will tend to become crazy if we start forbidding Mozart in opera houses," German Interior Minister Wolfgang Schaeuble said on a Washington visit, calling the cancellation an "unacceptable" violation of the principle of freedom of speech.

The Deutsche Opera, one of the capital's three main opera houses, announced late Monday that it was scrubbing plans for a revival of a December 2003 production of the Mozart work.

The 1781 original told the tale of a king of Crete at the time of the Trojan War, but the production by director Hans Neuenfels inserts a scene in which the severed heads of Muhammad, Jesus and Buddha are placed on chairs alongside the head of the Greek sea god Poseidon.

When Mr. Neuenfels refused to alter the production, Deutsche Opera manager Kirsten Harms said, she canceled plans for four new shows in November after receiving a warning from police.

"We were alerted by the police that all the press publicity surrounding the play would severely heighten the security risk to this opera," she said at a Berlin press conference.

Opera house officials cited the violent reaction across the Muslim world earlier this year to the publication in several European newspapers of Danish political cartoons, which Islamic leaders say mocked Muhammad. Danish embassies and businesses were targeted and more than two dozen people died in the subsequent protests.

DOJ_NMG_0069961

"We know the consequences of the conflict over the [Danish] caricatures," Deutsche Opera said. "We believe that needs to be taken very seriously and hope for your support."

Berlin Police Chief Dieter Glietsch told a German radio interviewer that "one can find nothing wrong" in calling off the production "in a climate that's already tense between Islam and the Western world."

But Mr. Schaeuble, who oversees Germany's police and legal systems, compared the cancellation to the furor generated by some Islamic leaders earlier this month in response to an address by German-born Pope Benedict XVI at the University of Regensburg.

In an aside, the pope in his talk cited a 14th-century Byzantine emperor who criticized Muhammad for promoting violence as a way to spread the faith.

Mr. Schaeuble said some Islamic leaders "tend to use anything to go crazy." If Western officials and artists censor themselves for fear of the reaction of extremists, he added, "we will never convince anyone that freedom of speech and tolerance are a better way."

Ali Kizilkaya, head of the German Islamic Council, welcomed the cancellation, saying the sight of Muhammad's severed head on stage "would certainly offend Muslims."

But, he added in a radio interview, "of course it is horrid that one has to be afraid. That is not the way to start a dialogue."

Berlin Mayor Klaus Wowereit, federal Culture Minister Bernd Neumann and numerous other politicians criticized the opera house's decision.

"If concern about possible protests already leads to self-censorship, then the democratic culture of free speech is in danger," Mr. Neumann said.

Peter Ramsauer, head of the conservative Christian Social Union party in Germany's parliament, called the cancellation "naked fear of violence."

"That's nothing but pure cowardice," he said.

Monika Griefahn, cultural spokeswoman for the leftist Social Democrats, said, "If we weigh security issues against artistic freedom, it makes me wonder if the fundamentalists haven't already won."

Mr. Schaeuble and other German leaders will attend a major summit today aimed at promoting dialogue with Germany's 3.2 million Muslims.

Germans Jeering Opera's Bow To Islamic Extremists (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

BERLIN — Mozart has survived grandiose conductors and abstract interpretations, but the librettos for his operas never cast Islamic radicals threatening a skittish theater company.

On a day of messy drama and furious debate over free speech, German Opera in Berlin reaffirmed Tuesday its decision not to revive a production of Mozart's "Idomeneo" out of fear of inciting Islamic extremists over a scene showing the severed head of the prophet Muhammad.

The cancellation of a work that has run intermittently since 2003 drew a rebuke from politicians and theater critics, who regarded it as a defeat for creative expression and a victory for militant Islamists over liberal European tradition.

The opera company's decision comes as Muslim tensions in Europe have risen since the publication last year of Danish cartoon caricatures of Muhammad and recent comments by Pope Benedict XVI about Islam and violence.

"There have been no concrete terrorist threats against the opera," said Michael Nerkle, a Berlin police spokesman. "We received an anonymous call that certain scenes might be offensive to Muslims. In light of what happened against the Muhammad cartoons, it was appropriate to inform the opera house," he said, referring to the outbreaks of violence that followed publication of the caricatures.

In a terse news conference, German Opera Manager Kirsten Harms said she canceled the show after security officials informed her there would be "incalculable risks" if the production reopened in November.

"If I would ignore this everyone would say, 'She has ignored a clear warning,' " said Harms, adding that director Hans Neuenfels has refused to restage the show. "It is always easy to say, 'This is the decision of a coward.' But as head of this opera house, I had to decide like that."

"Idomeneo" is the ancient story of the king of Crete's pact with the Greek god Poseidon to sacrifice his son. The production by Neuenfels, known for his controversial interpretations, is a meditation on enlightenment that shows the king lifting the severed heads of Poseidon, Jesus, Buddha and Muhammad to suggest that overreliance on religion can endanger the human spirit.

"Closing this opera is very alarming," said Markus Schwering, a critic for Koelner Stadt-Anzeiger, a Cologne newspaper. "The production is anti-religious, but it must be allowed in a free society. It's not a singular attack on Islam. It says religion in general can produce inhumanity and superstition.

"The danger I see now is that theaters may stifle provocative art. We need to have a real and very serious debate on this in Germany."

Mixing satire with anger, Wolfgang Boernsen, cultural spokesman for the Christian Democratic Union, the nation's leading conservative party, said:

"Hurray, we are capitulating. To drop a production critical toward religion out of fear from possible terrorist attacks is hurting the freedom of art.

"With the Berlin opera decision, which is a bow before terrorists, the radical scene is encouraged to continue to pressure and threaten Western culture and Christianity."

Ali Kizilkaya, the leader of Germany's Islamic Council, said the production would offend Muslims, but he told Berlin's Radio Multikulti, "Nevertheless, of course, I think it's horrible one has to be afraid. That is not the right way to open dialogue."

Kenan Kolat, national chairman of the Turkish Union in Germany, which represents immigrants, expressed similar sentiments. "I recommend that all Muslims accept certain things. Art has to stay free," Kolat told a news website.

A poll by the German television network N24 found that 92% of those questioned opposed canceling the production.

The opera company's announcement comes the same week that the government is holding a conference to improve relations with Muslim leaders. The sponsor of the conference, Interior Minister Wolfgang Schaeuble, was in Washington on Tuesday. When he heard of the opera company's decision, he told reporters, "That is crazy. This is unacceptable."

Neuenfels could not be reached for comment. He told the Berlin daily Der Tagesspiegel, "Where will we end if, in the future, we allow ourselves, in foresighted obedience, to be artistically blackmailed?"

Neuenfels' reading of "Idomeneo" and the depiction of beheaded divinities infuriated the largely Christian audience when the show opened in 2003.

"They cried and smashed doors. It was a typical Berlin theater scandal," said Schwering, the Cologne critic. "It lasted two or three days and then died down. No one called for canceling the show."

But Europe has experienced terrorist bombings in Madrid and London and increasing problems with integration. In August, German authorities arrested two Lebanese students in an alleged plot to blow up trains. Such an atmosphere has led to intense police surveillance and growing suspicions between Europeans and immigrant Muslims.

Kay Kuntze, director of the Berlin Chamber Opera, said, "If we give up the central point of our culture — the freedom of art — we end up giving up our entire culture."

Fear Of Muslim Backlash Cancels Opera (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 26 -- German lawmakers and cultural leaders assailed a Berlin opera house Tuesday for canceling a production that included a scene of the severed head of the prophet Muhammad, saying it was caving in to fears about religious extremism.

Officials with the world-renowned Deutsche Oper decided late Monday that the show -- an avant-garde remake of Mozart's "Idomeneo" -- could not go on after police warned that it could result in a violent backlash from Muslim fundamentalists. Opera officials said they were worried about a repeat of the worldwide protests that erupted this year after a Danish newspaper published cartoons satirizing Muhammad.

Kirsten Harms, general manager of the Deutsche Oper, said Tuesday that top Berlin police officials had said the production would "pose an incalculable security risk to the public and employees."

"If I had paid no attention and something had happened, everyone would rightly say that I had ignored the warnings of security officials," she said at a news conference.

Director Hans Neuenfels declined to cut the scene, and so the production was canceled.

The mayor of Berlin, federal officials and other lawmakers panned the decision, arguing that it was wrong to squelch artistic expression, even if it risked offending Muslims. "Our ideas about openness, tolerance and freedom must be lived on the offensive," Mayor Klaus Wowereit said.

German Interior Minister Wolfgang Schaeuble called the cancellation "crazy" and "unacceptable" during a visit to Washington. In a meeting with Washington Post reporters and editors, he added: "We have to be very, very clear -- we will not begin to discuss it. Otherwise we will not be convincing. Tolerance needs a clear position."

The show premiered at the Deutsche Oper in March 2003 and drew some jeers -- but no violence -- for a scene in which Idomeneo, the king of Crete, balks at making sacrifices to the gods and instead produces the severed heads of Muhammad, Jesus, Buddha and Poseidon, god of the sea.

Set in ancient Greece, the opera is considered a forceful critique of theological dogma and wars conducted in the name of religion. Neuenfels's three-act, Italian-language production was last at the Deutsche Oper in 2004.

Islamic tradition bans depictions of Muhammad and other prophets. About 5 percent of Germany's 83 million people are Muslim.

Coincidentally, the German government is sponsoring a conference on Islamic relations Wednesday a few blocks from the Deutsche Oper. The event is intended to aid the assimilation of Muslim immigrants in German culture and bolster religious tolerance.

Ali Kizilkaya, chairman of the Islamic Council for Germany, praised the decision to cancel the opera, saying that "it could certainly offend Muslims."

"Nevertheless, of course I think it is horrible that one has to be afraid," he added in a radio interview. "That is not the right way to open dialogue."

Germany has a strong tradition of free speech developed largely in response to the censorship policies enforced by the Third Reich.

In fact, the Nazis took control of the Deutsche Oper after they came to power in 1933. Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels oversaw the programming, and a box was reserved for Adolf Hitler.

Bulgaria, Romania To Join EU (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

The European Union will welcome Bulgaria and Romania, two of Washington's strongest allies on the Continent, as full members on Jan. 1, but the strings attached to their accession will be the toughest in the organization's history, EU officials said yesterday.

The officials also indicated that further enlargement will have to wait until member states find a compromise on the EU constitution, whose adoption last year was derailed by French and Dutch rejection in high-profile referendums.

The Bush administration praised the decision on Bulgaria and Romania, which joined NATO in 2004, but State Department spokesman Sean McCormack urged "the EU to continue to keep open a European horizon for a number of states, including those in the Balkans, and Turkey as well."

The fifth wave of EU expansion caps seven years of negotiations with the two Balkan countries and brings the bloc's membership to 27 and its population to about half a billion.

"The accession of Bulgaria and Romania will mark a historic achievement. Their readiness is a direct result of the sustained progress both countries have made," said European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso.

Enlargement Commissioner Olli Rehn called the EU's approach fair and rigorous. "It is fair because we recognized the progress that has been achieved, and we gave credit where it is due. It is rigorous because we established the necessary mechanism to accompany Bulgaria and Romania on their reform path, in the interest of the two countries and of the EU as a whole."

The commission proposed close monitoring of areas where it determined reforms have not been sufficient -- justice and home affairs, food safety and disbursement of EU subsidies -- and will require progress reports every six months, beginning in March.

Serious crime is of particular concern in Bulgaria, whose judiciary has been criticized as sluggish and graft-prone, and it was asked to change its constitution to ensure the independence and accountability of its judicial system.

Romania is required to establish an anti-corruption agency to examine government officials' potential conflict of interests. Both countries will have to guarantee a more transparent and efficient judicial process.

They must also eradicate swine fever to be able to sell pork in the rest of the bloc without restrictions, and improve safety of dairy products. They need to set up proper mechanisms to distribute billions in farm subsidies and other economic aid.

"Payments can be interrupted, suspended or canceled if the commission detects cases of irregularities, fraud or corrupt practices," Mr. Rehn said, but he added that the commission hoped sanctions would be unnecessary.

Both countries also will face restrictions on access to other EU markets for their work force. Britain, Ireland and Sweden, which have complained of a flood of workers from Poland, the Baltic states and other countries that joined the EU in 2004, are considering the strictest rules.

But the Bulgarian ambassador to Britain, Lachezar Matev, told London's Sunday Telegraph last week that Bulgarians are not likely to rush to Britain, because "we don't like the climate, it's every expensive and our medical services are better."

Bulgarian Prime Minister Sergei Stanishev said yesterday that EU membership was "the final fall of the Berlin Wall" for his country.

Romania, Bulgaria Favored To Join E.U. (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 26 -- The European Commission recommended Tuesday that Romania and Bulgaria be admitted to the European Union on Jan. 1 but attached unprecedented conditions, signaling that there is still deep unease about the union's expansion eastward and the potential economic and political problems that go with it.

The addition of the two Balkan nations would bring the bloc's membership to 27 countries, raise its population by 30 million to 490 million and expand its borders to the Black Sea. Analysts expect the recommendation by the commission, the E.U.'s executive arm, to win final approval of European leaders next month.

Commission President JosÃ© Manuel Barroso, underscoring the ambivalence toward future expansion, said that following the two countries' entry, he would favor freezing membership until the union resolves a controversy over its proposed constitution, which voters in France and the Netherlands rejected last year.

Many of those no votes reflected popular fatigue with continuing enlargement after 10 countries -- most from the former Soviet bloc -- joined in 2004.

Many citizens of affluent Western Europe express concern about the potential impact that poor, new members from the East could have on immigration, unemployment and terrorism threats. In France and the Netherlands, voters said they particularly opposed the proposed membership of Turkey, which would be the only E.U. country with a Muslim majority.

Fifteen countries have approved the constitution, but adoption requires unanimous acceptance by member states.

Katinka Barysch, a political scientist at the Center for European Reform in London, said Barroso's proposed freeze was a message to the current 25 E.U. governments that "guys, we really need to get together and we really need to make progress on internal reforms." It also served to reassure the European public that enlargement "is not a policy that will continue regardless."

DOJ_NMG_0069965

For most countries, the membership process brings on years of painful political, judicial, electoral and economic change. Supporters of continued expansion say this compels nations to rise to European standards and enhances regional security. Embracing Turkey as part of the E.U., they say, could make it an example of moderation for Muslim countries around the world.

In an interview with [a] news agency last week, Romanian President Traian Basescu warned that barring Turkey would aggravate a standoff between the West and Islamic fundamentalists and undermine Europe's security. "Keeping Turkey out means that it would become Islamist," he said.

Croatia and Macedonia are also candidates for membership.

Many European political analysts say they expect little progress on what to do about the E.U.'s proposed constitution until after French presidential elections in May.

Romania and Bulgaria are now members of the NATO alliance, with troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. Their entry to the E.U. would come with significant strings attached, constituting the toughest monitoring of new members. The conditions are meant not only to mollify skeptics in old E.U. countries but to encourage the two newcomers, which would be among the union's poorest member states, to accelerate and deepen reform.

Both nations would be required to curb corruption, money laundering and organized crime, improve food and aviation safety and continue with judicial and agricultural reforms, according to a report released Tuesday in Brussels on the preparedness of the two countries to meet the criteria for membership.

If they do not continue to improve in agriculture, the E.U. could withhold billions of dollars in agricultural subsidies, according to the report. And if judicial reform and corruption suppression stall, other E.U. states might not have to recognize decisions by their courts, the report said. Bulgaria, in particular, needs to improve aviation safety, the report says, or its airlines may be banned from E.U. airspace, it said.

Despite the continuing concerns, the report said both countries had made substantial progress in reaching E.U. standards. Barroso told the European Parliament that their membership would be "a historic achievement" on the path to "reunification of our European family."

Bulgarian Prime Minister Sergei Stanishev said that for his country, it would mark "the final fall of the Berlin Wall."

Through Lens In Darfur, 'I Was A Witness To Genocide' (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, September 27, 2006

As an admiral's son and a former Marine officer, Brian Steidle believed that following orders and doing the right thing were one and the same. Then he went to Darfur.

As an official international monitor of the vicious conflict in western Sudan, he faced a choice: respect authority and honor a code of silence or show the world what he'd seen and kiss his career goodbye. He puckered up … and blew the whistle.

"I was a witness to genocide," he says. "I wanted to make a difference."

Since returning last year from Darfur, where he was a U.S. representative on an African Union observation team, Steidle has become the most vivid chronicler of one of the world's worst humanitarian catastrophes. His photographs — which were supposed to be for his superiors' eyes only — have helped make Americans care about a complex crisis in a faraway place of little economic or strategic value.

Jerry Fowler of the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington says Steidle "has given people images of Darfur they can hold onto": a soldier standing next to the store he's just torched; a military helicopter firing on a village; a baby with a bullet in her back.

Since 2003, when war broke out between the Sudanese government and Darfuri rebels, about 200,000 civilians have died. Another 2.5 million, a third of Darfur's population, have been driven from home. American food has helped stave off famine and U.S. diplomacy has fostered a partial cease-fire, but it has not been enough.

The Sudanese government refuses to admit 20,000 United Nations troops to relieve a poorly equipped 7,000-member African Union force. Since May, when the government and one of several rebel factions signed a peace agreement, Darfur has become even more violent and lawless.

Steidle is a compact, intense 29-year-old. He lives on a sailboat in southern Maine, where he's writing a memoir.

He's the son of retired rear admiral Craig Steidle, a Naval Academy graduate who flew fighters off carriers in Vietnam, tested experimental planes and trained test pilots, and directed the Defense Department's biggest aircraft program. Then he became associate administrator of NASA in charge of space exploration planning. “He was the best at everything,” his son says, “and we had to try to live up to that.”

That's what he was trying to do in Darfur. “Brian told a story others could not,” says David Del Conte, an American humanitarian worker who met Steidle in south Darfur. “He moved Darfur onto the front page. He saved thousands of lives.”

Steidle says he went to Darfur for several reasons. Mostly, he went because of what he saw one day in 2004 on a computer screen.

He was in the Nuba Mountains in south-central Sudan, working for the international commission supervising a cease-fire in another civil war, between the government and another rebel group.

He was bored. Promotions had put him behind a desk. That's why he'd left the Marines in 2003 after more than four years, having served in Kosovo, made captain and risen to company commander.

That day, a colleague was back from a trip to Darfur. Steidle had heard reports of atrocities against African farmers, who supported Darfur's rebels, by nomadic Arab militias armed and supported by the government. The raiders were called Janjaweed — “devil on horseback."

How was Darfur? Steidle asked his colleague. The man flipped around the laptop on his desk, clicked up a slide show and invited Steidle to take a look.

Steidle had never seen anything like it — schoolgirls, bound together with makeshift handcuffs and burned alive. He was shocked, then outraged, then intrigued. He wanted to see for himself.

Today, when asked why he volunteered for a situation from which most would flee, he sticks his chin out: “I heard there was shooting, and I run toward bullets.” Or he'll cite “selfish reasons” — money ($3,500 a week tax-free, paid by a private company under contract with the State Department) and adventure.

That month he wrote an e-mail to his sister Gretchen, which she shared with USA TODAY. It suggested another motive:

“I have to write to you to get this out of my mind. I have seen these photos from a confidential report. I am not permitted to send them, nor do I wish on you the same dreams that I have as a result. … Why are we sitting here letting this happen? This is not the doing of humans, this is the work of the devil. We as humans, all races, religions, colors, creeds, etc., have to stand up for what is right.”

He applied for a job monitoring Darfur's shaky cease-fire under the auspices of the African Union, the association of African nations whose mission in Darfur receives financial support from the United States and other nations. He'd have no power or authority to stop the violence, not even a sidearm.

But Steidle did not go unarmed. Photography had been his hobby; now he bought the best digital camera he could afford: a professional-grade Canon EOS 1D Mark II. In Darfur, it would prove more powerful, and more dangerous, than a gun.

Steidle believed the world needed information to prick its conscience. If the classified photos he'd seen had been released to the public, he wrote Gretchen, “there would be troops in here in a matter of days.”

Photography was a touchy subject. Although then-Secretary of State Colin Powell had just described what was happening in Darfur as genocide, there had been virtually no pictures of Janjaweed attacks on civilians; Steidle says he was warned the Sudanese government wanted to keep it that way.

A few photos of atrocities had been leaked outside official channels, so African Union commanders — not wanting to offend the host government — were suspicious of the new man with the camera that could zoom in on a face on the ground from 500 feet in the air.

It took Steidle several weeks to win their trust before he was allowed to use his camera. That was Oct. 20, 2004, when his team visited a village that the Janjaweed had torched. They found some women and children huddled under a tree.

A woman handed Steidle a 1-year-old girl. This was Mihad Hamid. Her mother had been shot to death while fleeing with Mihad in her arms. Mihad was shot in the back. She was having trouble breathing. She probably didn't live the night, he says.

There were many days like that. On the worst, he counted smoke from attacks on 37 villages. On another, he stood next to a Sudanese army commander, who watched as soldiers looted a village. Steidle says that when he asked Brig. Gen. Ahmed El Hajer Mohammed why he didn't stop them, the general said they weren't his men — anyone could put on a uniform.

He heard Janjaweed riders explain that they destroyed villages over stolen cattle. He saw neither regret nor remorse: "It was like looking into the devil's eyes."

"My reports," Steidle used to say, "are my ammunition." He soon realized he was firing blanks.

His photos and descriptions vanished into the AU's bureaucracy; others reached the AU's sponsors, including the U.S. government, months late. In secret, he began to send reports directly to the U.S. Embassy in Khartoum.

After a mission, he'd head straight to his tent to download all his images on his laptop. Only then would he go to the operations tent, download into the AU computer and delete the images from his own camera as required.

He became increasingly frustrated with the AU's impotence. By charting Janjaweed attacks, movements and motives, "We got to where we knew where the next attack would be," he says. "But I couldn't stop the attacks I was predicting." Some attac ks were deterred by the AU observers' presence. The top commanders, however, refused to systematically place teams in the way of attacks.

Steidle says he knew why. The AU was in Darfur with the government's permission, and anything that antagonized Khartoum — especially taking sides against its Janjaweed proxies — threatened the AU's ability to function. "The attitude was, 'We gotta tread lightly,' " Steidle says.

(The AU did not respond to a request for comment. In the past, the AU has emphasized the legal, logistical and financial constraints on its operations in Darfur.)

In January, he predicted — based on Janjaweed movements — that the town of Hamada would be attacked within two weeks. When it was hit 10 days later, Steidle says he refused to go with the observation team: "I knew what they were going to see. I said, 'I've seen enough.' "

The team found babies with their faces bashed in. When members came back to the post, "they were like zombies," Steidle recalls. "A guy who'd usually brief me just held up his hand and said, 'I must go pray.' "

The people he'd hoped to help were furious. "They'd say, 'Leave if you can't protect us.' I thought, 'What are you doin' here? Just here makin' money?' "

He returned to the USA in February 2005 with hundreds of images, including those of a man castrated and left to bleed to death, people with their ears cut off and eyes plucked out and an aerial view of government troops joining ranks with the Janjaweed.

Steidle planned to make public his photos, not his identity or affiliation. "It was never his intention to speak out," Gretch en says, "even when he quit."

He'd break the trust of AU commanders and make them less likely to share intelligence with the humanitarian agencies for whom AU patrols were eyes and ears.

He'd ruffle the U.S. State Department, which had not authorized him to go public. He'd throw away a lucrative career doing freelance military and security work overseas.

"Did I promise not to release anything? No. Do I own the copyright to my photos? Yes. I took them with my own camera," he says. "But I was apprehensive. I was paid to do what I was told, keep my mouth shut, and go home."

After the Times printed the photos Feb. 23, Steidle says, Kristof called. "He said, 'Everybody's asking me where I got these photos. Can I use your name?' "

His father says Brian struggled with the decision. "He felt he gave his word." But Steidle thought about what his sister — the family's social conscience — had asked: "Who has the right to keep genocide a secret?"

He thought about the impact of personal testimony. People could look at a photo, but unless there was a witness to tell them that this girl's name was Mihad Hamid and that her mother was shot in the back, it was just a picture.

"I thought about if for a few days," Steidle says, "and I told Nick, 'Go ahead.' "

DOJ_NMG_0069968

Back in Darfur, some of his comrades felt Steidle had broken trust.

In May 2005, USA TODAY spoke with Dale Fage, a former U.S. Army officer who served with Steidle on the AU force, at the airport in south Darfur.

When Steidle's name came up, Fage's face hardened. “Brian was only here five months,” Fage said. “He didn't take all those photos himself.” (Photos of the attack on Hamada had been taken by another photographer.) “What he did created problems for people here.” Having vented his frustration, Fage relented. “He's a good kid,” he said. “He just wanted to do the right thing.”

For the past 18 months, Steidle has shown his photos, told his story and asked people to lobby the Bush administration and the U.N. to stop the carnage in Darfur.

He has taken his message to Congress and the British House of Commons, to an audience of 35 on a college campus in San Antonio and to 100 people at church in Fort Wayne, Ind. Wherever he goes, a newspaper story or broadcast interview usually follows.

(Khalid Musa, spokesman for the Sudanese Embassy in Washington, did not respond to a request for comment on Steidle.)

Sometimes he seems haunted by his photos, like the ones on display last week for a Darfur benefit at a gallery in New York City: “The whole thing comes back to me, not just that image, but the whole scene — the smell, the sound, everything. When I look at … that burned guy that I (photographed) who was burned alive in his hut, I smell him every time I look at that photo.”

As the situation there has grown more desperate, so has he.

“I've been banging my head against the wall,” he told The Philadelphia Inquirer in February during a stop on a national speaking tour. “It's like screaming in a dream, and no sound comes out.”

He says he has no regrets about going public. Neither does his father. “I knew he'd make the right decision,” Craig Steidle says. “I'm proud of him.”

U.S. Pushes Anti-Castro TV, But Is Anyone Watching? (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

MIAMI, Sept. 26 — Soon after Fidel Castro announced his mysterious illness in July, the Bush administration stepped up its anti-Castro television broadcasts to Cuba with a new $10 million system.

For the last two months, a twin-engine plane has beamed the signal of the American broadcast, called TV Martí, toward the island from over the Straits of Florida for four hours a day, six days a week, up from four hours of transmission from an Air Force plane on Saturdays. Because the plane flies at 20,000 feet, administration officials say, the Cuban government cannot jam the signal as easily as in the past, when a blimp tethered 10,000 feet over the Florida Keys did the transmitting.

But in interviews in the past two weeks, many Cubans said they still saw just snowy interference where the TV Martí broadcasts should be. About a dozen people in Havana said they still had never glimpsed the station even after the expanded airborne broadcasts began, raising questions about the usefulness of the $10 million expenditure.

Some said they would not watch the station even if they could, because they assumed that it would be biased.

“In my opinion, that is wasted money,” said a 35-year-old homemaker in Havana who, like all those interviewed, asked that her name not be used. “It’s propaganda.”

She and her husband said many Cubans tried to pick up commercial programs broadcast from Florida, but what they wanted was Spanish soap operas, not TV Martí.

A few Cubans in the interior of the island, away from Havana, said they were able to pick up the signal, but others said they could not.

Nonetheless, Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Republican of Florida, who has long championed TV Martí and its sister station, Radio Martí, said the government had received some promising anecdotal reports about the new plane, which started flying on Aug. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0069969

"The U.S. has received reports from Havana and Matanzas that it is being seen every day," Ms. Ros-Lehtinen said of TV Martí, "and it's getting better as the equipment is being fine-tuned." The government, however, has no hard evidence of the station's popularity.

The federal International Broadcasting Bureau, which also operates the Voice of America, says the purpose of Radio and TV Martí is to broadcast "accurate and objective news and information" to Cuba, where news is tightly controlled by the government.

The stations, which have broad political support among Mr. Castro's many opponents in southern Florida, hope to have legions of Cubans tune in to pro-democracy news and talk programs and others like "Office of the Chief," a laugh-track comedy with Cuban exile actors playing dimwitted versions of Mr. Castro and his brother Raúl.

Cuban exiles in Miami do most of the writing and acting for TV Martí, which was moved here from Washington in 1996 after intense lobbying by exile leaders. On a recent episode of "Office of the Chief," which TV Martí calls its most popular show, an actor playing Raúl Castro said he would mummify Fidel Castro when he died by wrapping him in the pages of a book by Karl Marx, then display him on Havana's seaside boulevard.

The laugh track went wild.

For years, though, critics of the stations have called them overly blunt tools in what should be a nuanced campaign to promote democracy in Cuba.

"The really shrill, outrageous kind of stuff they broadcast has no credibility in Cuba," said John Nichols, a communications professor at Pennsylvania State University who studies Radio and TV Martí.

Mr. Nichols said elected officials in Washington would not dare to anger Miami's 350,000 Cuban-American voters by eliminating a popular anti-Castro program, even if it was largely symbolic.

"It's a litmus test of support for a certain policy on Cuba," he said. "Few right-minded politicians or government bureaucrats are willing to take that on. So essentially we've created a pork-barrel patronage system and the policy is hands-off."

Both stations have been accused of shoddy journalism and hiring practices, especially since the move to Miami, where some say they are primarily a jobs program for hard-line exiles.

In 1999, the inspector general of the State Department told Congress that the stations had "problems with balance, fairness, objectivity and adequate sourcing that impacted credibility."

Another inspector general's report, in 2003, criticized the hiring practices and program quality at the Office of Cuba Broadcasting, prompting its director to resign. His successor, Pedro Roig, says he has improved Radio and TV Martí by hiring freelance professional journalists and broadcasting more news and youth-oriented programming like music videos. But this month, three journalists moonlighting at the stations were fired by El Nuevo Herald, the Spanish-language affiliate of The Miami Herald, after the newspaper's publisher learned of the arrangement and called it a conflict of interest.

Rob Carr, the director of engineering services for the journalism school at the University of Florida, said airborne broadcasts could be easy to jam because the signal output from planes was generally weak.

Mr. Roig declined to be interviewed, but Joe O'Connell, a spokesman for the International Broadcasting Bureau, said TV Martí relied on correspondence from Cuba and reports from recent immigrants to gauge viewership. A telephone survey commissioned by the International Broadcasting Bureau in 2005 found that 13 people out of the 1,589 respondents had seen TV Martí in the past year. Mr. O'Connell said the real number was probably higher, because many Cubans are afraid to admit they watch the station.

In addition to the initial $10 million expense to begin the new airborne broadcasts, he said, the Office of Cuba Broadcasting has requested about $6 million a year to operate and maintain the plane. It is also replacing the blimp, which was destroyed in a hurricane last year.

Altogether, the Office of Cuba Broadcasting received about $38 million this fiscal year, up from $27 million in 2005. The office spends nearly $400,000 to broadcast TV Martí by satellite, a more reliable transmission but one that only a few Cubans with illegal satellite dishes receive.

Several Cubans interviewed said they saw Radio and TV Martí primarily as a source of income for well-connected exiles in Miami, a view shared by José Basulto, founder of Brothers to the Rescue, a strongly anti-Castro exile group.

DOJ_NMG_0069970

"The joke goes on," Mr. Basulto said. "They pay individuals who are instrumental in making the lives of United States politicians easier come election time."

One man in Havana said his neighbor knew people who had seen TV Martí in Matanzas, a province east of the capital. Some reports suggest that the Cuban government focuses it jamming efforts in Havana.

Most of the Cubans interviewed said that while TV Martí remained inaccessible, they were able to receive Radio Martí, albeit with interference that sounded like heavy rain. Some said Radio Martí used to be an important news source — such as when the Cuban government regime sank a tugboat hijacked by would-be migrants in 1994 — but that many more options existed now.

Shortwave radios — which are not sold in Cuba but are smuggled in — can pick up Radio Canada, Radio Netherlands and the BBC, several said. Satellite dishes, while illegal and rare, can pick up television broadcasts from South Florida, Mexico and the Caribbean.

Unhappy Couple Run Against Each Other For Congress In Brazil (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

SÃO PAULO, Brazil -- They came from different worlds. Maria Christina Mendes Caldeira was the daughter of an old-money real-estate magnate. She had studied in Europe and loved polo. Valdemar Costa Neto was the son of a provincial mayor who grew up in smoke-filled political halls on his way to becoming a powerful Brazilian congressman.

They married in 2003, on New Year's Eve in Las Vegas. But the union soon flamed out. In July of 2004, Mr. Costa had the water and electricity cut off in the mansion they had shared in Brasilia to force Ms. Caldeira to move out, which she eventually did.

But his wife found a way to strike back, personally and politically. During nationally televised congressional hearings last year about an alleged political slush fund, she stepped forward to testify that she had seen Mr. Costa stowing big stacks of cash in a secret safe. Facing possible impeachment and a ban on holding office, Mr. Costa resigned his seat.

The couple, still in court over the terms of their separation, are now fighting in a different arena as Sunday's election approaches. Mr. Costa, president of the influential Liberal Party, is campaigning for a new four-year congressional term. His estranged wife has become his chief opponent as candidate of the Green Party. It's an uphill struggle for Ms. Caldeira, who lacks Mr. Costa's fund-raising ability and the political chits he picked up in his 14-year congressional career.

Last Saturday, she led a group of protesters armed with brooms and buckets in a symbolic "cleaning" of Liberal Party headquarters in Mr. Costa's hometown of Mogi das Cruzes. When a woman loyal to the Liberal Party hit Ms. Caldeira with a shoe, the candidate doused the woman with a bucket of water. After police cruisers came and Ms. Caldeira didn't immediately hand over her ID to an officer, she was taken away and held at precinct headquarters for several hours. "Valdemar sent you!" she shouted at one policeman.

More than just a story of romance gone sour, the contest between the estranged couple goes to the heart of the big question looming over Brazil's election: How much do voters really care about political corruption?

Brazil has rarely seen political scandals that compare with those of the past few years, yet the electorate hardly seems to care. President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva is set to win re-election easily, even though several close allies were forced out of office by scandal. Federal authorities charge the officials operated an illicit fund to buy support for the government in Congress.

Political consultant Gaudêncio Torquato says he expects about 70% of Congress to be returned to office, including Mr. Costa and several others who allegedly received or distributed payments. He says the government, flush with cash generated by Brazil's mining and agricultural exports, has mollified voters on the subject of corruption with heavy spending on welfare programs and public works.

In the race between Mr. Costa and Ms. Caldeira, Mogi das Cruzes retiree João Batista Savio opts for Mr. Costa, who is known as Boy. (Some people use it as an allusion to "playboy," others to distinguish him from his father, who was well known as a mayor here.) "I have to vote for what's best for my city, and Boy has built things here," says Mr. Savio, pointing to a $25 million water-treatment project and a viaduct. Mr. Savio says Ms. Caldeira should keep her nose out of politics. "Women are emotional, and maybe she attacks Boy because she's jealous," the voter said. "I don't think he did anything seriously wrong."

As part of an indictment brought against 40 politicians in April, Mr. Costa was charged with racketeering, corruption and money laundering in allegedly receiving $4.9 million from the slush fund.

Mr. Costa, 57, hasn't been talking to reporters in his campaign. In a videotaped ad, he says the questionable funds were reimbursements for his party's campaign expenses from its coalition partner, the governing Workers Party. Mr. Costa insists no public money was involved, an assertion that congressional investigators dispute. Mr. Costa said: "I erred and there were only two paths left to me: abandon public life, or stay, recognize the error and start all over."

According to electoral records, Mr. Costa is running one of Brazil's best-financed congressional campaigns, with $350,000 in contributions.

His disaffected wife, on the other hand, is running a shoestring campaign. One Saturday earlier this month, Ms. Caldeira, 40, was passing out fliers from her campaign vehicle, a bright green 1984 Volkswagen motor home emblazoned with her slogan "Tenho Atitude" ("I've Got Attitude"). But the vehicle was having mechanical problems and its balky speaker system wouldn't even let her play her campaign song. Undaunted, the candidate, stylish in boots and a riding jacket, started buttonholing voters on the street. "Vote for me. I denounced Boy," she said. "I'm his ex-wife."

Hairdresser Elena Maria da Silva excitedly embraced Ms. Caldeira. "I saw her on TV," Ms. da Silva said. "She's very brave." But some other passersby went out of their way to avoid Ms. Caldeira or discreetly crumpled her fliers after walking a few steps.

Over the course of his political career, Mr. Costa developed a raffish reputation. During Rio de Janeiro's 1994 Carnaval, for instance, he introduced a young model named Lilian Ramos to then President Itamar Franco. That twosome became internationally famous when photographers captured the scantily clad model standing alongside the president.

His marriage to Ms. Caldeira had long since fallen apart by the time last June when a congressman accused Mr. Costa of slush-fund involvement. Ms. Caldeira supported the accusations to the congressional committee, where she characterized Mr. Costa as a heavy gambler whose personality would change from "Dr. Jekyll to Mr. Hyde." She said he kept stacks of cash in a "big safe...not a little piggy bank."

Mr. Costa and a Liberal Party associate have filed defamation suits against Ms. Caldeira. "The judicial system is scrutinizing her words," a spokesman for Mr. Costa says.

The Green Party invited Ms. Caldeira to run for Congress, hoping to capitalize on her celebrity and to shake voters out of their lethargy over government corruption.

Benedito Faustino Taubaté Guimaraes, a Mogi das Cruzes councilman, scoffs at the notion that Ms. Caldeira can topple Mr. Costa, who is famous for helping constituents. "People want solutions to their problems, not a socialite who wants to talk over coffee," he said. Mr. Guimaraes shows a testimonial letter written by an adolescent, Fabinho Dorneles, who says that after an accident left him in a wheelchair, Mr. Costa pulled strings to get him treated at a top hospital.

But Brazilian politics are hard to predict. In the country's system of proportional representation, each party gets a quota of congressional seats that varies with its share of the popular vote. The top vote getters within each party fill the quota. So it's possible that both Ms. Caldeira and Mr. Costa could be elected, meaning they'd be back together again, in Congress.

Are you having fun yet?

What's a matter? No sense of humor? You didn't enjoy watching Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez addressing the U.N. General Assembly and saying of President Bush: "The devil came here yesterday, right here. It smells of sulfur still today." Many U.N. delegates roared with laughter.

Oh well then, you must have enjoyed watching Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad breezing through New York City, lecturing everyone from the U.N. to the Council on Foreign Relations on the evils of American power and how the Holocaust was just a myth.

C'mon then, you had to at least have gotten a chuckle out of China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, trying to block a U.N. resolution calling for the deployment of peacekeeping troops to Sudan to halt the genocide in Darfur. I'm sure it had nothing to do with the fact that the China National Petroleum Corporation owns 40 percent of the Sudan consortium that pumps over 300,000 barrels of oil a day from Sudanese wells.

No? You're not having fun? Well, you'd better start seeing the humor in all this, because what all these stories have in common is today's most infectious geopolitical disease: petro-authoritarianism.

Yes, we thought that the fall of the Berlin Wall was going to unleash an unstoppable wave of free markets and free people, and it did for about a decade, when oil prices were low. But as oil has moved to $60 to $70 a barrel, it has fostered a counterwave — a wave of authoritarian leaders who are not only able to ensconce themselves in power because of huge oil profits but also to use their oil wealth to poison the global system — to get it to look the other way at genocide, or ignore an Iranian leader who says from one side of his mouth that the Holocaust is a myth and from the other that Iran would never dream of developing nuclear weapons, or to indulge a buffoon like Chávez, who uses Venezuela's oil riches to try to sway democratic elections in Latin America and promote an economic populism that will eventually lead his country into a ditch.

For a lot of reasons — some cyclical, some technical and some having to do with the emergence of alternative fuels and conservation — the price of crude oil has fallen lately to around $60 a barrel. Yes, in the long run, we want the global price of oil to go down. But we don't want the price of gasoline to go down in America just when $3 a gallon has started to stimulate large investments in alternative energies. That is exactly what OPEC wants — let the price fall for a while, kill the alternatives, and then bring it up again.

For now, we still need to make sure, either with a gasoline tax or a tariff on imported oil, that we keep the price at the pump at $3 or more — to stimulate various alternative energy programs, more conservation and a structural shift by car buyers and makers to more fuel-efficient vehicles.

"If Bush were the leader he claims to be, he would impose an import fee right now to keep gasoline prices high, and reduce the tax rate on Social Security for low-income workers, so they would get an offsetting increase in income," argued Philip Verleger Jr., the veteran energy economist.

That is how we can permanently break our oil addiction, and OPEC, and free ourselves from having to listen to these petro-authoritarians, who are all so smug — not because they are educating their people or building competitive modern economies, but because they happen to sit on oil.

According to Bloomberg.com, in 2005 Iran earned $44.6 billion from crude oil exports, its main source of income. In the same year, the mullahs spent $25 billion on subsidies to buy off the population. Bring the price of oil down to $30 and guess what happens: All of Iran's income goes to subsidies. That would put a terrible strain on Ahmadinejad, who would have to reach out to the world for investment. Trust me, at $30 a barrel, the Holocaust isn't a myth anymore.

But right now, Chávez, Ahmadinejad and all their petrolist pals think we are weak and will never bite the bullet. They have our number. They know that Mr. Bush is a phony — that he always presents himself as this guy ready to make the "tough" calls, but in reality he has not asked his party, the Congress, the people, or U.S. industry to do one single hard thing to reduce our dependence on foreign oil.

Mr. Bush prattles on about spreading democracy and freedom, but history will actually remember the Bush years as the moment when petro-authoritarianism — not freedom and democracy — spread like a wildfire and he did nothing serious to stop it.

Don't Play Politics With Kazakhstan (WP)

By S. Frederick Starr

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The president of Kazakhstan will be visiting the United States soon, and the critics are already sharpening their pens. The trip by President Nursultan Nazarbayev will mark 15 years of independence for his country as well as a growing strategic partnership with the United States. But whereas the State Department sees Kazakhstan as a successful "corridor of reform," critics claim that it's just another corrupt petro-state and Nazarbayev himself a repressive, authoritarian ruler. The fact that Vice President Cheney recently visited the Kazakh capital of Astana only confirms their darkest suspicions: It's all about oil, and probably about Halliburton as well.

To be sure, Kazakhstan has oil and a lot of it. Russia and China have been buying as much of it as they can get, and Europe and the United States are eager to do the same. American firms, including Halliburton, have made big investments there, but so have the Chinese, Italians, British and Dutch. Shouldn't the United States be pursuing this prospect?

Those who say no point to widespread corruption in Kazakhstan. Indeed, corruption thrives in nearly all the countries that were formerly under communist rule. That is why the Kazakh government set up a national fund in 2000 that makes the management of oil revenue more transparent, why its banking system will meet E.U. standards by 2008 and why it has signed on with Britain's rigorous Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative. This year alone it has successfully prosecuted several dozen high- and mid-level officials for corrupt practices.

U.S. critics brush this aside and point instead to the case of an American, James H. Giffen, who is on trial in New York for allegedly arranging massive bribes to senior Kazakh officials over a decade ago. But in spite of much finger-pointing, the only person being prosecuted so far is Giffen. In light of this, should Kazakhstan start refusing U.S. investments?

Under both Democrats and Republicans, the U.S. approach toward Kazakhstan has been to work with the government to reform its laws and courts. The American Bar Association, Freedom House, Counterpart Consortium and the U.S. Agency for International Development have made much headway in this regard. We should be exploring how to continue and expand this fruitful collaboration. Accusations from our side will only strengthen the hand of hard-core nationalists and others in Kazakhstan who defend the old practices.

The majority of Kazak citizens are Muslims. Fundamentalists from the Persian Gulf states and elsewhere are eager to exploit the situation. A few years back members of a group with links to al-Qaeda penetrated the country. But so far Kazakhstan has shown remarkable success in addressing the social conditions that can feed extremism. The Asian Development Bank reports that the poverty rate has been cut by half in five years. A large middle class is rapidly forming, thanks in part to a revised tax code that favors small and mid-size businesses. The government now spends a respectable 4 percent of gross domestic product on modern, Western-style education and pays the full cost of sending its top 3,000 high school graduates for study in the United States, Europe, Japan and other developed countries. Graduates of this program are accustomed to modern freedoms and expect their country to embrace them.

Granting this, critics point to what they politely term Kazakhstan's "democratic deficit." They're right. The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) has drawn the same negative assessment of Kazakh elections that it has of all elections in the former Soviet Union except for the three Baltic countries: They fail to meet European standards. But the OSCE has acknowledged that recent revisions in Kazakhstan's electoral law represent "significant progress." It also concluded that the Central Election Commission managed the crucial run-up to the 2005 elections in a "generally transparent manner." For all the problems that remain, this argues for continuing a quiet process of engagement on electoral reform.

Kazakhstan merits our support for another reason. For a decade the United States has watched helplessly as India, then Pakistan and now Iran developed nuclear weapons. The trajectory is chilling. Contrast this with Kazakhstan, which inherited a large nuclear arsenal from the Soviet Union and -- with U.S. support -- voluntarily got rid of it.

Moreover, Kazakhstan has managed to do what no other country has: maintain cordial and balanced strategic partnerships with China, Russia and the United States. Its links with Washington go far beyond the ceremonial; Kazakh troops stand with ours in Afghanistan. Its contingent in Iraq has destroyed more than 3 million land mines. And the Kazakhs are working closely with the United States in opening up Afghanistan to continental trade.

All this suggests that U.S. links with Kazakhstan are among this country's most promising relations in the Muslim world. Developed over 15 years under both Democratic and Republican administrations, they are the fruit of hard work by U.S. agencies, businesses, educational institutions and scores of nongovernmental organizations. They are creating a successful model of economic and social development for majority-Muslim societies. What a contrast to what we see daily in the Arab world.

U.S. critics of Kazakhstan have every right to remind us that the country still falls short in many respects. But in the eyes of some Kazakhs, the United States may be a less than perfect partner as well. If either of these groups succeeds in damaging the basis of our partnership, further progress in Kazakh social policy and legal and electoral reform will be the first to suffer. And Kazakh oil will then flow mainly to China and other countries that pay their bills and ask no questions.

Shinzo Abe's Asian Challenge (NYT)

If Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, hopes to be as popular and successful as his departing predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi, he needs to be equally daring in breaking with failed policies of the past. The obvious place to start is by rebuilding Japan's badly damaged relations with China.

Nothing is more important to Japan's prosperity and security than normal relations with its giant neighbor. An ugly, but increasingly distant, history of Japanese aggression and war crimes stands in the way. Mr. Koizumi, in one of the greatest errors of his administration, deliberately glorified this history, playing into the hands of Chinese leaders who often use nationalism to distract their people from official corruption and political repression.

Mr. Abe needs to extricate Japan from this destructive dynamic. The first step should be declaring that he will not continue Mr. Koizumi's provocative practice of visiting the Yasukuni Shrine, where the spirits of convicted war criminals are honored. The shrine controversy, and the failure of Japanese textbooks to deal honestly with the wartime behavior of Japanese troops, complicate the nation's ability to handle contemporary military issues, like the emerging debate over amending the pacifist constitution that America imposed on it after World War II. There is no reason Japan should not be able to make that change. But unless it first comes to terms with its history and its neighbors, such a step would be poorly received by other Asian nations.

Japan has a great deal to be proud of, including an increasingly vital democracy, a revived economy and the difficult but necessary economic reforms that Mr. Koizumi began to push through and that Mr. Abe will now need to take further. It does not need to glorify the darkest period of its recent history and the war criminals most responsible for that terrible aberration.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Deal Is Likely On Detainees But Not On Eavesdropping (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Congress on Tuesday was headed toward a split decision on President Bush's pre-election national security agenda, moving closer to passage of legislation on the handling of terrorism suspects while all but giving up hope of agreeing on a final bill to authorize the administration's eavesdropping program.

Lawmakers in both the House and Senate said it now appeared doubtful that bills covering the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program could pass both houses and be reconciled before Congress adjourns this weekend, an outcome that would deny Republicans one of the main achievements they hoped to take into the election.

"We would like to, but I think that might be a stretch," said Representative John A. Boehner, the House majority leader, about getting a final agreement. He said the House would still proceed with its own measure this week in hopes of working out disagreements with the Senate after the election.

But Republicans were optimistic about eliminating last-minute concerns over a separate measure laying out rules for interrogating terrorism suspects and trying them before military tribunals. They said they were hoping to send the bill to Mr. Bush by the end of the week for a signing ceremony that could help them kick off the home stretch of the campaign with a message that Republicans were taking strong steps to protect the nation from terror attacks.

"I think we are good to go," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina and one of three Republican senators who last week forced the administration into negotiations over the detainee measure.

Democrats, while being careful to say that they had made no decision to block the detainee bill, expressed rising concerns about changes to the proposal that they said went beyond what Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the Republican leader, had described Monday as merely "technical changes."

The changes had been made over the weekend, as negotiators from the House and White House adjusted a compromise that had been reached between the White House and Senate Republicans on Thursday.

In one change, the original language said that a suspect had the right to "examine and respond to" all evidence used against him. Mr. Graham and his colleagues in resisting the White House, Senators John W. Warner of Virginia and John McCain of Arizona, had insisted that the provision was necessary to prevent so-called secret trials. The bill submitted late Monday dropped the word "examine" and left only "respond to," reviving complaints about secret trials, this time from Democrats.

In another, the original compromise said that evidence seized "outside the United States" could be admitted in court even if it had been obtained without a search warrant, a provision Republicans and Democrats agreed was necessary to deal with the unusual circumstances of seizing evidence on the battlefield.

The bill introduced Monday dropped the words "outside the United States," which Democrats said meant that prosecutors could ignore American legal standards on search warrants within the country. The bill also broadened the definition of an unlawful enemy combatant, from anyone "engaged in hostilities against the United States" to include anyone who "has purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States."

"These are significant changes, not technical changes," said Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, where the original bill backed by Senators Warner, McCain and Graham was approved. "It's hard to know how to vote on a bill that's this much in motion."

Republicans and the White House defended the change on unlawful combatants. It is narrower than the definition originally proposed by the White House, which said that anyone who materially supported hostilities could be prosecuted because it added the phrase "intentionally and purposefully." Senate and White House staff members said this would resolve the problem of what one Senate aide described as "the grandmother in Switzerland" who writes a check for charity that ends up going to a terrorist organization.

"Most of us feel if someone is engaged in actively assisting Al Qaeda or terrorists that they should fall under this legislation," Mr. McCain said.

Republicans and the White House explained the change to the provision about viewing evidence as, in Mr. Graham's words, "literally just a drafting error," and said the word "examine" would be restored.

Republicans also said they were trying to reach a compromise on the habeas corpus provision of the bill, which would deny a suspect the right to challenge his detention in court.

Democrats, who have found themselves on the losing end of the national security debate the past two national elections, said the changes to the bill had not yet reached a level that would cause them to try to block it altogether.

"We want to do this," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader. "And we want to do it in compliance with the direction from the Supreme Court. We want to do it in compliance with the Constitution."

Though there was momentum in both the House and Senate for the surveillance legislation, lawmakers were taking different approaches, and those involved said it had become apparent that a final resolution could not be quickly achieved. As a result, senators said they doubted that scarce floor time would be consumed moving it through the Senate before the recess when a final bill was out of reach.

"I don't think it is likely we will address it this week," said Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire and one of the lawmakers who has been negotiating the legislation with the Department of Justice.

The House bill, sponsored by Representative Heather Wilson, a New Mexico Republican who serves on the Intelligence Committee, could reach the House floor for a vote on Thursday. It seeks to "modernize" wiretapping law but, in the view of critics, would also give the president broader authority to conduct surveillance without court orders as long as he reported to Congress after doing so.

The bill has major differences from a Senate plan that would submit the entire wiretapping program to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to rule on its constitutionality.

No Compromise On Wiretap Bill (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

A high-profile Republican effort to clarify the legality of President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program will almost certainly not pass before Congress recesses at week's end for the fall campaign, leaving the legislation in deep trouble, congressional leaders conceded yesterday.

Efforts to reach agreement on a single version of the bill that could be brought before the Senate and House this week foundered yesterday on the insistence of key House members that they vote on a House version that they say is significantly tougher than the Senate's. House Republican leaders are deferring to the House bill's primary author, Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), who is locked in one of the tightest House election contests of the season.

"I don't think that's possible," Wilson said of the House and Senate reaching agreement on a compromise bill. "Our focus has to be on passing the House bill."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said GOP leaders would still like to pass a bill this week "but that may be a bit of a stretch."

Failure to act this week would jeopardize Congress's ability to ever authorize the National Security Agency's surveillance efforts, which Republicans see as vital to national security but which many Democrats and civil libertarians regard as unconstitutional. GOP leaders say that if legislation is not completed, they will revisit the issue in a lame-duck session of Congress that will be convened after the Nov. 7 elections.

But most independent political analysts expect Democrats to pick up between three and five seats in the Senate, and possibly more. Without the political pressure of a looming election and with a strengthened hand coming in the next Congress, Senate Democrats would probably filibuster Republican wiretapping legislation this year, congressional Democrats said.

Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, warned that a bill could still appear Friday night or Saturday morning, appended to other legislation. But she added, "If it doesn't happen at 3 a.m. Saturday, it will be become much harder for them to pass a bad bill."

Bills to authorize warrantless wiretapping and military commissions were supposed to pass this month as the twin centerpieces of a legislative agenda designed to bolster the party's national security credentials. But the surveillance bill was in trouble from the start.

White House officials never thought they needed congressional action to continue the NSA's warrantless surveillance, but Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and White House officials did work out legislation that would allow but not require the administration to submit the program to a secret court for constitutional review. Specter maintains that his bill would restore judicial review to a program that President Bush has made the domain of the executive branch alone.

But criticism of the Specter measure has been bipartisan. Opponents say a broad review of the program's constitutionality will do nothing to restore oversight of individual wiretaps. And recent changes to the bill have raised still more questions.

At administration insistence, Senate negotiators agreed to steer legal rulings about the president's broad surveillance to the Court of Review, a little-known appeals court created by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. The three-judge court has rendered only one opinion in its 30-year history, and that opinion included its view that the president has inherent constitutional authority to eavesdrop without warrants as part of the U.S. effort against terrorism.

The Court of Review's commentary in its 2002 ruling has become the language cited by Bush and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales as proof the program passes constitutional muster.

Members of the Senate and administration have repeatedly said in public statements since June that their surveillance legislation would submit the president's program to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court for review. But the FISA court and the Court of Review are quite dissimilar.

The 10-member FISA court does a brisk, nearly daily business considering whether to allow the government secret warrants to surveil terrorism and international-spying suspects. And several of the FISA court's members were disturbed last year to learn the president had authorized spying behind the court's back; some have pointedly questioned the program's legality in private discussions with top Justice Department officials.

Wilson drafted legislation that she said would restore some congressional oversight to the wiretapping program and maintain the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's right to issue warrants on wiretaps.

Detainee Bill In Final Stages (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

White House national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley met with Republican senators yesterday in an effort to reach final agreement on legislation that would govern the military trials of terrorism suspects, but they did not resolve a dispute over whether the captives should have access to U.S. courts.

The complex measure, which President Bush has called a top legislative priority, nonetheless appears likely to win approval by the time Congress adjourns at the end of this week. A vote is expected in the House today on a version of the legislation that the White House supports. It was unclear yesterday evening whether Republican leaders would allow any amendments to it.

The Senate-White House negotiations centered on what is known as a "court-stripping" provision that bars U.S. courts from considering habeas corpus filings by detainees over their confinement and treatment. It affirms the Bush administration's assertion that it has an incontestable right to hold persons detained as "unlawful enemy combatants" for the duration of the battle against terrorism.

"Habeas has to be resolved," and it will most likely be addressed on the Senate floor, John W. Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, told reporters after meeting with Hadley. Senate Republican leadership aides said that the floor debate could begin today and that the legislation setting rules for military commissions, as they are known, might be combined with a bill to create a new fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Three foes of the habeas corpus provision -- Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) -- introduced yesterday an amendment to overturn the administration-backed provision by allowing foreign nationals in military or CIA custody to challenge the legality of their detentions after one year.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who supports the suspension of the habeas corpus process, predicted that the Specter amendment "will be defeated, I think, in a bipartisan fashion, with a solid vote." But Graham said he has been exploring a different amendment on the matter, which he declined to describe.

Administration officials have said that the controversial provision is warranted because "unlawful enemy combatants" are not entitled to the same rights as regular soldiers or U.S. citizens; because isolation and the threat of indefinite detention aid U.S. interrogations; and because habeas corpus petitions could obstruct or delay the military trials of detainees.

But human rights groups and defense lawyers have condemned the provision as unconstitutional. They said it could leave detainees "to rot" in jail.

Thirty-one former ambassadors, including 20 who served in Republican administrations, jointly wrote Congress this week that "to eliminate habeas corpus relief for the citizens of other countries who have fallen into our hands cannot but make a mockery" of the administration's efforts to promote democracy. They also said that it would set a precedent that could jeopardize U.S. diplomats and military personnel overseas.

The negotiators also discussed yesterday a recent administration-backed change in the legislation to broaden the definition of potential unlawful enemy combatants in a way that would allow the government to detain and try a wider range of foreign nationals than envisioned earlier.

Other recent changes to the bill aroused controversy yesterday. In one, the administration and its House allies would give the defense secretary wide latitude to depart, without independent judicial scrutiny, from the rules and detainee protections the legislation would create. It would allow him to do so whenever he deems it "practicable or consistent with military or intelligence activities."

Georgetown University law professor Neal K. Katyal, who represented Salim Ahmed Hamdan in a case in which the Supreme Court overturned in June the administration's previous military-trial procedures, said the discretion, as written, is broad enough for the Defense Department to suspend a presumption of innocence for defendants. The new rules "themselves build in all the flexibility the secretary of defense needs to depart massively," Katyal said.

Other defense lawyers criticized yesterday recent changes that make it easier for prosecutors to introduce evidence without challenge and that eliminate defendants' right to examine all the evidence presented against them. The draft bill would, however, preserve defendants' right to respond to that evidence.

A Last Hurdle For Bill On Detainees: Access To US Court (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON

Some 56 months after the first terrorism suspects arrived at the US prison camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, Congress is rushing to pass new legislation on how to bring them to trial - or not.

It's the "not" - President Bush's claim that any "enemy combatant" can be detained indefinitely, without access to US courts - that is the last obstacle to finishing a bill this week.

The White House and a trio of Republican senators already resolved how trials would handle secret evidence and evidence obtained using harsh interrogation techniques, allowing detainees to see evidence against them, but in redacted form. Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia, and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina also forced the White House to back off its intent to reinterpret terms of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, especially the ban on "humiliating and degrading treatment."

But the deal did not affect a provision that critics say is a more fundamental threat to the rule of law and the nation's reputation: a bid to strip federal courts of jurisdiction to hear cases brought by "unlawful enemy combatants" seeking to challenge their detainment.

Supporters say the action is needed because a flood of pending habeas cases is a distraction from the war on terror and strains military resources. Critics say that's no justification for curbing a fundamental constitutional right.

"A persuasive argument can be made that the Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Great Writ, is the single most important bulwark in protecting our rights and freedoms ... and those who have suspended it have often been treated harshly by history," said John Huston, a retired rear admiral and former top lawyer in the Navy, at a hearing called Monday by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"It is too facile to say that the men detained in Guantánamo 'are all terrorists,' 'the worst of the worst,' and 'all killers.' Maybe they are. Maybe they aren't. The point of habeas corpus is to answer those questions," he adds.

Monday's hearing, attended by three senators, marks the only hearing on the habeas corpus provision before the House and Senate vote on the bill. The legislation may come before the full House as early as Wednesday.

"This is momentous, far-reaching legislation, which is being rushed through on the eve of elections," added Thomas Sullivan, a former US Attorney for the northern district of Illinois, who has represented 10 Guantánamo detainees, three of whom were released in May 2006.

Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, who called Monday's hearing after reviewing last week's deal on military commissions, says he wants to offer an amendment simply deleting the provision eliminating habeas corpus.

The US Constitution says there are only two conditions for abolishing habeas corpus: rebellion or invasion when "the public safety may require it." Senator Specter and some conservative critics of the draft bill on military commissions say that neither condition is currently met.

"The United States is neither in a state of rebellion nor invasion. Consequently, it would be problematic for Congress to modify the constitutionally protected writ of habeas corpus under current events," Kenneth Starr, the former independent prosecutor on the Whitewater investigation during the Clinton presidency, wrote in a letter to Specter.

The issues involved in this legislation are complex and important, say those on both sides. Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas, who backs the legislation, said annual status review hearings, called for under the Detainee Treatment Act, give war-on-terror detainees the same access to meaningful review as habeas corpus.

"The level of due process that the detainees are getting far exceeds the level of due process accorded to any combatants - captured combatants, lawful or unlawful - in any war in human history," says David Rivkin, a Washington attorney who consults with the White House on detainee issues. It's a "fair and balanced approach to judicial review, eliminating repetitive challenges, banning forum shopping, and yet preserving the necessary essentials of a judicial review for detained unlawful combatants," he adds.

In debate this week, both sides will be watching how aggressively Democrats defend the habeas provision. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, was the only member of his party to attend Monday's hearings. He says he worries that only about 5 percent of the Guantánamo detainees were picked up by US troops on the battlefield, and that some innocents may have been turned over to the US to "settle a score" or for a bounty.

The issue has the potential to affect every American, says Eric Freedman, a constitutional lawyer at Hofstra Law School and author of a book on habeas corpus. "Every story about an innocent business traveler or tourist picked up through error is [one] that could happen to anybody," he says. "The whole concept of checks and balances is that when the executive branch acts as judge, jury, and executioner, government power is going to be exercised wrongly."

Rush To Error (WP)

AFTER BARELY three weeks of debate, the Senate today will take up a momentous piece of legislation that would set new legal rules for the detention, interrogation and trial of accused terrorists. We have argued that the only remedy to the mess made by the Bush administration in holding hundreds of detainees without charge at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere since 2001 was congressional action. Yet rather than carefully weigh the issues, Congress has allowed itself to be stampeded into a vote on hastily written but far-reaching legal provisions, in a preelection climate in which dissenters risk being labeled as soft on terrorism.

As we have said before, there is no need for Congress to act immediately. No terrorist suspects are being held in the CIA detention "program" that President Bush has so vigorously defended. Justice for the al-Qaeda suspects he has delivered to Guantanamo has already been delayed for years by the administration's actions and can wait a few more months. What's important is that any legal system approved by Congress pass the tests set by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) months ago: that the United States can be proud of it, that the world will see it as fair and humane, and that the Supreme Court can uphold it.

The compromise legislation cobbled together in the past week by administration officials and a group of Republican senators, including Mr. Warner, doesn't pass those tests. It would improve greatly on the administration's past practices as well as its original plans for trials of enemy combatants, but critical flaws remain. If these are not corrected, U.S. treatment of foreign prisoners is likely to remain a source of global controversy that undermines the war against terrorism. Senators -- and this includes Democrats who have been largely and cravenly absent from this month's debate -- would do best to postpone action on the bill. Failing that, they should support amendments to correct the worst problems.

Foremost among these is the legislation's attempt to prevent U.S. courts from ruling on the treatment of prisoners in the future, including any procedures the Bush administration might adopt for interrogations. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) fought for language in the bill that he believes would stop practices such as simulated drowning, prolonged sleep deprivation and induced hypothermia, but many lawyers believe the administration could interpret the law to permit such abuse. Normally the courts would provide a check on administration policies, but the bill would prevent this by banning prisoners from bringing lawsuits over their detention and treatment. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has promised an amendment to restore judicial oversight. Without it, the Bush administration's abuse of detainees is likely to continue.

A second major problem with the bill is its definition of who could be regarded as an enemy combatant and thus be subject to the exceptional detention and trial procedures. Another hasty agreement over the weekend would allow foreign civilians in the United States or even U.S. citizens to be arrested and held without charge indefinitely on grounds that they "supported hostilities against the United States." This goes far beyond current case law, which reserves unlawful-combatant status for detainees engaged in an armed conflict against the United States or its allies. Endorsement of this standard by Congress would give extraordinary power to the Defense Department to arrest and hold foreigners and Americans without charge, and it would set a dangerous precedent for other nations. It's not hard to imagine civilian American aid workers being arrested by foreign governments as "enemy combatants" for helping people deemed to be terrorists.

White House pressure may have persuaded many in Congress that the easiest course is to quickly approve the detention bill in its present form and leave town. If so, their actions almost surely will come back to haunt them. Until this country adopts a legal system for the war on terrorism that meets Mr. Warner's standard, the war itself will be unwinnable.

Detainees Compromise: Lose-lose (USAT)

By Nat Hentoff

USA Today, September 27, 2006

The rebellion by Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina against the president's proposed legislation to comply with the Supreme Court's June decision on the treatment of enemy combatants (Hamdan v. Rumsfeld) has ended — with fanfare — in a "compromise."

McCain, who has insisted that the principles he fought for are more important than his chances for the presidency, declared: "There's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved." He also said, "We got what we wanted."

But the Supreme Court, in rebuking the president for having violated Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions (to which the United States is a signatory), made plain both the letter and spirit of this minimal standard of "humane treatment."

Article 3 prohibits "at any time and in any place whatsoever … cruel treatment and torture … (and) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment."

The president is also pleased with this compromise because, he says, it preserves "the CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets."

The CIA program involved, as the president has said, "alternative techniques" of interrogation — details of which have been revealed by human rights groups, reporters and McCain himself as specifically and vividly violating the letter and spirit of Article 3.

How, then, does this compromise, as McCain says, result in no losers, only winners and winners? The agreement prohibits — under our own 1996 War Crimes Act — such "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions as torture, rape and murder. (These are actual war crimes under that 1996 statute.)

But, in this three-card-monte game of compromise, it is the president who will have the dominant role in deciding, by executive order, which alternative techniques are grave breaches. How will we know whether the CIA, or any of our interrogators, are committing these war crimes? We won't know all of them, and maybe none.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley points out that "specific techniques" used on terrorism suspects are classified. (We can't let the terrorists know what's in store for them once they're taken into custody.)

As for practitioners of such "coercive" interrogations that could lead to charges of war crimes under American law, the "compromise" protects them from prosecution for past violations. This is known in our lingo as a "get-out-of-jail-free card."

Logically, I would think this amnesty would also include those all the way up the chain of command who authorized "alternative techniques" constituting "grave breaches" of the Conventions.

I'm not surprised that the CIA also agrees with the main belligerents that there are no losers in this agreement. And CIA operatives who have been buying government-funded liability insurance for fear of prosecution under the War Crimes Act need worry no longer.

This pact's most radical failure to adhere not only to the Geneva Conventions but also to a core right in our Constitution is in its allowing the three celebrated senators and the president to revoke habeas corpus petitions on conditions of confinement by any alien detainee — not only those at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba — designated, with or without charges, as an "enemy combatant."

This view of The Great Writ as an irritating inconvenience in the war on terrorism — particularly denounced by Graham for "clogging the courts" with detainee petitions — is embedded in the renowned Senate Armed Services Committee bill generated by McCain, Warner and Graham. It is also included in House legislation dealing with detainees and will be enfolded in the compromise produced by the same three senators applauded by some civil libertarians for standing up to the president.

The result will be that hundreds of detainees, among them many who have never been charged with any crime, will no longer have lawyers to bring their claims of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment by guards and interrogators. This is contrary to the Supreme Court having authorized such habeas petitions in the 2004 Rasul v. Bush ruling and Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

Despite all the purported obeisance to the Geneva Conventions in this agreement that ended the McCain-Warner-Graham mutiny, there will be no way for Americans or the world to know whether these "enemy combatants" — many of whom might be innocent — have been subjected to the same outrages upon personal dignity that this epic struggle by the three senators presumably prevents.

During a previous "victory" by McCain over the president — much publicized around the world — he secured an amendment in the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 banning "cruel, inhumane and degrading" treatment of prisoners.

But in moving that legislation, including the famous McCain amendment, into law, the president added one of his elastic "signing statements" that he would not necessarily implement the amendment if it interfered with national security.

President Bush needn't slip in a signing statement this time around. With the elimination of habeas petitions on conditions of confinement, all of our interrogation centers around the world in which alien detainees are held as enemy combatants will become "black sites" — wholly outside of laws.

There will be losers after all.

EU To Probe Bank Data Monitoring By U.S. (AP)

By Constant Brand

AP, September 26, 2006

European data protection officials agreed Tuesday to investigate further allegations that a Belgian-based company's sharing of confidential banking records with U.S. authorities for anti-terror probes could have violated EU laws.

After their talks, the European Union's 25 national data protection officers said the problem raised "immediate concerns about the lack of transparency which has surrounded" a secret transfer deal between the U.S. Treasury and Belgian-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or SWIFT.

"The issue is complex, both factually and legally," said a statement issued by the panel's vice-chair, Jose Luis Pinar Manas, director of Spain's data protection agency. "Recognizing the seriousness of the questions that have been raised, the working party agreed to continue fact-finding and conduct further analysis based on all relevant factual and legal elements."

EU spokesman Friso Roscam Abbing said the EU experts will meet again in November and would then issue an opinion, including possible stronger safeguards that EU governments should adopt to prevent the misuse of trans-Atlantic transfer of private banking records.

The November meeting will also assess an investigation the Belgian data privacy commission has launched into the SWIFT case, to see whether the firm violated Belgian privacy rules and similar EU rules. The Belgian report is due in a few weeks.

The review is in response to questions about the legality of SWIFT's sharing of banking records with U.S. authorities for use in anti-terror investigations.

The U.S. Treasury has acknowledged that since the Sept. 11 attacks it has tracked millions of confidential financial transactions handled by SWIFT.

SWIFT routes about 11 million financial transactions daily between 7,800 banks and other financial institutions in 200 countries, recording customer names, account numbers and other identifying information.

Before Tuesday's panel talks, German Data Protection Commissioner Peter Schaar said all clients of financial institutions "have a right to know" what happens to their confidential data.

Both SWIFT and the U.S. authorities say records were subpoenaed as part of targeted investigations into suspected terrorist activity.

In its defense, SWIFT reiterated on Monday that it received "significant protections and assurances" that the data transferred to the U.S. was used confidentially.

In a statement signed by SWIFT's CEO Leonard H. Schrank, the company said the U.S. Treasury does not have unlimited access to data stored by SWIFT, and the information it got was used only "for the exclusive purpose of terrorism investigations."

The European Parliament has demanded that EU governments, the European Central Bank and the European Commission fully explain the extent to which they were aware of the secret data transfer deal, and has put pressure on them to prevent such transfers if they violate EU law.

The commission and Finland, which currently holds the EU presidency, have said their hands were tied and that it was up to the Belgian authorities to make sure their data protection laws were in line with EU regulations.

The Belgian government said in June that Washington had subpoenaed data only from SWIFT's U.S. office — but not its global headquarters outside Brussels.

EU Justice and Home Affairs Commissioner Franco Frattini said he had never been informed about SWIFT's program.

Europe Panel Defers Report On Bank Data Sifting (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

BRUSSELS, Sept. 26 — A panel of European data security officials on Tuesday put off a final report on the legality of an American program to monitor millions of international banking transactions. But they said they had "immediate concerns" about the arrangement.

The officials agreed to investigate further whether European Union laws were being violated by a Belgium consortium's sharing of confidential banking records with American counterterrorism officials.

After their meeting here, the European officials said they had concerns about "the lack of transparency" of the arrangement between the Treasury Department and the banking consortium, known as Swift, which stands for the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication.

"The issue is complex, both factually and legally," said a statement issued by the panel's vice chairman, José Luis Piñar Mañas, director of Spain's data security agency. The data officers "agreed to continue fact-finding and conduct further analysis based on all relevant factual and legal elements." Some officials had pushed for a report this week.

A spokesman for the European Union, Friso Roscam Abbing, said the data officials would meet again in November and would then issue an opinion, including possible recommendations for safeguards that union governments should adopt to prevent the improper trans-Atlantic transfer of private banking records.

The November meeting will also assess an investigation into the Swift case by the Belgian National Bank, to see whether the banking consortium violated Belgian privacy policies and similar European Union rules. The Belgian report is due in a few weeks.

The review comes in response to questions about the legality of Swift's sharing of banking records with American authorities for use in antiterror investigations.

The Treasury has acknowledged that since the Sept. 11 attacks it has tracked millions of confidential financial transactions handled by Swift. The banking consortium routes about 11 million financial transactions daily between 7,800 banks and other financial institutions in 200 countries, recording customer names, account numbers and other identifying information.

Disputing An 'Obscure' Organization's Spokesman (WP)

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

When Nadia Bilbassy-Charters, Washington correspondent for the Dubai-based newspaper al-Arabiya, was called on by President Bush at yesterday's news conference, she asked about remarks attributed to Gijs de Vries, the European Union's antiterrorism coordinator.

Bilbassy-Charters: If I may, Mr. President, do you agree with the analysis from the counter chief European -- counterterrorism chief European spokesman who said today that the international support for terrorism has receded. Do you agree with that?

Bush : . . . First of all, I didn't -- what was this person a spokesman for?

Bilbassy-Charters: Counterterrorism chief in Europe.

Bush : Some obscure spokesman?

Bilbassy-Charters: No, actually, he has a name.

Bush : Okay, he's a got a name. Well, no, I don't agree with the spokesman for the obscure organization that said that the international commitment to fighting terror is declining.

Guantanamo Makes Adjustments For Ramadan (AP)

By Michael Melia, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

Muslim detainees at Guantanamo Bay entered Ramadan with traditional sweets, dates and honey — but without a military chaplain to lead them in prayer during Islam's holy month.

Nearly all the alleged al-Qaida and Taliban members held at the detention center in Cuba are observing Ramadan, officials said Tuesday. Meals are offered before dawn and after sunset to accommodate their fasting during daylight hours.

DOJ_NMG_0069986

The adjustments for Ramadan, which began Saturday, come as the U.S. prison faces accusations of religious insensitivity.

A court challenge seeking the return of a full-time Muslim chaplain to the base has been filed by one detainee's attorney, who said that regular religious services would help "preserve the sanity" of the detainees.

"I think it would preserve order and discourage these suicides that are happening there," attorney Gaillard Hunt said.

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment Tuesday on the motion, citing ongoing litigation.

Muslim chaplains — who regularly counseled detainees in the prison's early years — have been assigned to U.S. commands with larger numbers of Islamic service members, said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand.

"The detainee population generally rejects outside religious guidance," he said.

Detainees meet their religious needs primarily by relying on each other, with cell blocks designating an imam or prayer leader, he said.

Ramadan arrived this year with elevated security following three suicides in June.

Fasting detainees will have a meal before dawn, and a "double portion" meal in the evening to ensure they receive enough nutrition. Medical personnel will monitor their health, Durand said.

Guantanamo does have an Islamic cultural advisor who meets with the detainees to discuss their concerns, and chaplains are available to come in and handle delicate tasks, such as the Islamic funeral prayer for the suicide victims in June, Durand said.

Separately, a Red Cross delegation that began a two-week visit to the Guantanamo prison on Monday has met with base officials and was hoping to get a first glimpse of 14 high-level terror suspects previously locked up in CIA secret prisons.

Simon Schorno, a spokesman for the Red Cross in Washington, said the delegation would interview other detainees as it waits for the newest arrivals, including alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, to accept their offer for a meeting.

U.S. Army Gen. Bantz J. Craddock said last week that the detainees would be made available around Oct. 1.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Officials Forgo Supreme Court Appeal In DHS Labor Case (GOVEXEC)

By Karen Rutzick

Government Executive, September 27, 2006

Government officials on Monday night passed up their last chance to seek reversal of a court decision blocking proposed labor relations reforms at the Homeland Security Department.

The solicitor general's office, which brings cases to the Supreme Court on behalf of government agencies, let a midnight deadline pass without filing an appeal at the high court.

"We're OK with that because it allows the department to move forward in implementing our labor relations flexibilities rather than spending additional time in the litigation process," said Larry Orluskie, a DHS spokesman.

In June, an appeals panel unanimously upheld, and even broadened, an earlier ruling that the proposed system would illegally curtail collective bargaining rights for employees by giving management the ability to cancel negotiated agreements. DHS and Justice Department officials in August decided against challenging that decision before the full appellate court, but left open the option for a Supreme Court appeal.

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on why the solicitor general chose not to pursue the Supreme Court appeal.

Orluskie said DHS officials will begin talks soon on how to rework the system so it meets legal standards.

"What we're going to do moving forward is sit down with our component agencies, sit down with the unions, and discuss how we move forward and where we go from here," Orluskie said.

Representatives of the federal employee unions that brought the case were pleased at the government's decision.

"DHS has made the right decision," said Colleen Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union. "It is now time for DHS to put this adversarial proceeding behind it and to join with NTEU in focusing solely on the agency's critical mission of protecting the American people."

"This is the smartest thing DHS has done in quite some time," said Mark Roth, a lawyer for the American Federation of Government Employees. "DHS management was in a battle they knew they couldn't win."

If DHS wants to rework its collective bargaining scheme, it must re-enter the meet-and-confer process with the unions representing its employees and resubmit the regulations to the Federal Register. The department is free, however, to move ahead with personnel changes that don't involve labor relations.

"We are working full-on with performance management," Orluskie said. He noted that DHS has trained 11,000 managers and supervisors on the new system, which focuses on job performance and will eventually link pay raises to performance ratings.

"It is my expectation that DHS will now engage in meaningful discussions with unions and management associations [on labor relations plans]," said Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, ranking member of a Senate federal workforce oversight subcommittee, in a statement Tuesday.

The law that created DHS, and allowed officials to rewrite personnel rules, gave the department five years for labor relations changes. As a result, department's authorization to modify the bargaining system ends in January 2009.

No Supreme Court Appeal For MaxHR (FCW)

By Wade-Hahn Chan

Federal Computer Week, September 27, 2006

The Homeland Security Department has decided not to pursue an appeal to the Supreme Court for the MaxHR human resources system. The agency has now passed on all available options for appeal regarding the labor-relations portions of the pay-for-performance system.

Larry Orluskie, a DHS spokesman, said the decision came from the Justice Department's Office of the Solicitor General late Sept. 25. The decision allows the agency to move forward to "pursue labor relations flexibilities rather than spending additional time in litigation," Orluskie said.

"If we go to the Supreme Court, we'd go on and on and on," he said. "What we're going to do is engage with our other partners, with the components, OPM, sit down with the unions and consider all available options."

MaxHR had been tied down in courts because of problems with ensuring collective bargaining rights for employees. The original court decision, in August 2005, blocked labor-relations portions of MaxHR and was eventually reaffirmed by an appeals court in June.

Unions applauded the decision and agreed with DHS on the need to move past the court battles.

"DHS has made the right decision — for itself, for its employees and for our nation," said Colleen Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union. The union led the fight against MaxHR in court. "It is now time for DHS to put this adversarial proceeding behind it and to join with NTEU in focusing solely on the agency's critical mission of protecting the American people."

"DHS management was in a battle they knew they couldn't win," said Mark Roth, general counsel of the American Federation of Government Employees. "The decision not to appeal was the right thing to do for management, and more importantly for DHS employees."

Currently, nearly 11,000 managers and supervisors are subject to MaxHR's performance management program, with almost 4,000 nonbargaining unit employees under the program. An additional 6,700 managers and employees will convert from the General Schedule system to MaxHR in October.

Administration Opts Not To Appeal Court Rejection Of DHS Personnel System (FEDTIMES)

By Tim Kauffman

Federal Times, September 27, 2006

The Bush administration won't appeal a June court decision striking down key parts of the Homeland Security Department's personnel system, a department spokesman said.

The government had until midnight Sept. 25 to appeal the case to the Supreme Court. The decision not to appeal was made by the Justice Department, which was representing Homeland Security in the case, Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said.

Justice had no comment.

The focus now will shift to figuring out how to proceed from here, Orluskie said, adding that Homeland Security soon will meet with officials from inside the department, the Office of Personnel Management and the unions to begin those discussions.

The department will "consider all available options in going forward from here," Orluskie said.

The head of the National Treasury Employees Union, which led a coalition of five unions that sued the department over the personnel changes, said the government made the right decision.

"It is now time for DHS to put this adversarial proceeding behind it and to join with NTEU in focusing solely on the agency's critical mission of protecting the American people," NTEU National President Colleen Kelley said.

The June 27 decision from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit invalidated changes the department had proposed making to the Title 5 rules governing collective bargaining, labor management procedures, and employee appeals of disciplinary actions.

The department has proceeded with changes to the pay and performance management systems for nonbargaining unit employees. About 4,000 supervisors and nonbargaining unit employees currently are covered under the reformed personnel system, and another 6,700 managers and supervisors will convert on Oct. 1, Orluskie said.

Similar changes to the labor management and appeals systems designed for the Defense Department were ruled illegal in February by a judge with the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia; an appeal of that decision is scheduled to be argued this fall.

Homeland Security Department Ends Litigation On Workplace Rules (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

At the Department of Homeland Security, litigation over new workplace rules is out.

The Bush administration, after losing three times to a labor coalition led by the National Treasury Employees Union, has decided not to file a petition at the Supreme Court, a spokesman for the department said yesterday.

The union had argued in federal district court and before a three-judge appeals panel that the administration's plan would gut the collective-bargaining rights of Homeland Security Department employees and undermine their rights to fair hearings when they sought to appeal major disciplinary action.

The courts found that the department had overreached and blocked the introduction of key parts of the new rules.

"I am very pleased," Colleen M. Kelley , president of the union, said of the decision not to continue litigation. "I think they did the right thing for the department, the employees and the country. We are looking forward to working with them on the priorities for the department."

Larry Orluskie , a spokesman for Homeland Security, said that Paul D. Clement , solicitor general at the Justice Department, informed officials late Monday that he would not take the case to the high court.

"This decision is okay with the Department of Homeland Security because it allows us to move forward toward implementing labor-relations flexibility rather than spending additional time in litigation," Orluskie said. "We will continue to engage with our components and partners in the unions to consider all options in moving forward."

Administration officials declined to discuss what Clement's decision means for the Defense Department, which also has been stopped by a federal court from trying to curb union rights as part of the new National Security Personnel System. The Pentagon has appealed the court ruling, but Mark Roth , general counsel for the American Federation of Government Employees, said that the Defense Department "would be smart to end this now."

Four years ago, Congress gave the Homeland Security Department a green light to overhaul how it pays, promotes and disciplines about 110,000 employees as part of the larger reorganization to strengthen homeland security and fight terrorism. But the rollout of the new system was slowed by legal setbacks in the past two years, and the department no longer has "a hard timeline," as one official put it, for completing the new personnel system.

About 4,000 supervisors and nonunion employees at Homeland Security headquarters, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center have been placed under a new performance-management system. An additional 6,700 managers and supervisors at Citizenship and Immigration Services and Customs and Border Protection will convert to the new performance system next month.

Under the new system, managers and employees set goals, link those goals to the department's objectives, and measure how well they meet expectations laid out for their performance. About 11,000 people have been trained on the new system.

The department hopes to use the system to tie job performance ratings to pay raises and bonuses but has no deadline for shifting employees to performance-based pay.

Rollout of the new pay system also has suffered from turnover in the department. Almost all officials who designed or planned the new workplace rules have retired or left the government. Marta Brito Perez , who had served as a top policy official at the Office of Personnel Management, was recently named as the top personnel adviser to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and will play a key role in deciding the department's next steps.

Union officials said they envision that the department and unions will meet to discuss possible options for replacing the rules blocked by the courts. Administration officials declined to discuss their next steps but did not rule out more talking, making changes through a presidential order or returning to Congress for a change in law.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, "is hopeful" that the department and unions "will approach the next round of discussions with an open mind," a spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0069989

In a statement, Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (Hawaii), the ranking Democrat on the Senate's federal workforce subcommittee, said, "it is my expectation that DHS will now engage in meaningful discussions with unions and management associations."

Chertoff, Democrats Disagree Over Cargo Scans (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday sparred with Democratic lawmakers over the feasibility of scanning cargo for nuclear materials at foreign ports before ships depart for the United States.

Mr. Chertoff told the House Homeland Security Committee that total screening is unrealistic and that other measures are being implemented to protect U.S. ports from such terrorist threats.

Cargo is screened by manifest and cargo lists, but is not scanned for radiation until it reaches U.S. ports, where Mr. Chertoff said the goal is to screen 80 percent of the cargo by year's end.

"Why can't we do it on the other side of the ocean before they depart?" asked Rep. Peter A. DeFazio of Oregon. "Why has there been resistance on the part of the administration and the majority here, to screening all the containers on the other side of the ocean?"

In response, Mr. Chertoff said, "For one thing, we don't own foreign ports, Congressman."

The hearing focused on the department's goals for 2007, including border protection, and members on both sides of the aisle asked that grants to various cities, including Washington, be increased.

Mr. Chertoff said U.S. and foreign officials soon will conduct some screening at the ship's point of departure, but the answer did not satisfy Mr. DeFazio.

"We retain the right of sovereignty in international trade and we can refuse the entry of any cargo," said the Oregon Democrat. "The Chinese regularly do this for commercial purposes; we can sure as heck do it for homeland security purposes.

"Anybody who isn't cooperating with us, we say, 'Well, that's fine, but guess what? Nothing's leaving your port to the United States of America anymore.' It's pretty simple."

Such action, Mr. Chertoff said, would cut off 75 percent of international trade and lead to a depressed economy.

Mr. DeFazio proposed a three-year period to implement such a strategy, but Mr. Chertoff balked and called it an "artificial deadline" that would be "as unrealistic as passing a law that says in three years cancer has to be cured."

Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts Democrat, called Mr. Chertoff's statements "a terrible message."

"You are saying that after the terrorists are in the air coming to the United States from another country that it's already too late, that the same thing is also true with a nuclear bomb in a ship heading for a port in the United States," he said.

The Homeland Security secretary said officials are meeting with shippers and foreign governments to better secure cargo.

One constraint is that some ports are on land already "full of radioactive material" that would constantly set off false alarms.

"We all would desire to have radiation scanning before things are loaded on ships," Mr. Chertoff said. "But I'm not going to sell the American people pie in the sky. I'm going to give something that's realistic, actionable and produces real results."

Air Travelers Glad To Have Liquids, Gels Back (AP)

By Daniel Yee

The AP, September 26, 2006

ATLANTA - Happy that new security rules have cleared their liquids and gels for takeoff, air travelers presented small, clear plastic bags filled with toiletries for inspection Tuesday, but long lines grew at some airports as others confused about the changes filled trash cans with containers that were too large.

Most toiletries can be in containers no larger than 3 ounces, and they must be zipped up in plastic bags that are quart-sized or smaller. Those limits threw off passengers who scrambled at security checkpoints to toss out bottles of shaving cream and hand lotion or to find the proper plastic bags.

"It's an inconvenience," said Ginni Dewbray, whose husband finally found a bag to carry a small bottle of lotion after asking several fellow travelers in a security line at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport.

"If they're going to stand there and ask you to have plastic bags, they should give them out. They're not that expensive," she said.

Trash bins outside airport security checkpoints filled up with forbidden items, though not as much as they did last month when a broader ban was put in place. Many travelers were grateful for the relaxed rules, which allow them to carry drinks, makeup and other items on board their flights.

"I was glad to see (the changes)," said Vicki McGowan, a professional meeting planner at Oakland International Airport for a flight to Reno, Nev. "How can lipstick or mascara put people at risk?"

DOJ_NMG_0069990

The new rules, announced Monday by the federal Transportation Security Administration, allow travel-sized toiletries to be carried aboard flights in a sealable clear plastic bag. Some items are permitted in any amount: saline solution, eye drops and prescription and nonprescription medicine, according to Transportation Security Administration spokesman Christopher White.

Drinks, liquids and gels purchased in airport stores inside security checkpoints can be carried into passenger cabins. Baby formula is allowed but must be inspected.

The rules replace an outright ban on liquids, lotions and gels ordered Aug. 10 after an alleged plot to bomb U.S.-bound jetliners was foiled.

TSA chief Kip Hawley said the stricter ban is no longer needed, and that he was pleased Tuesday's transition to the new rules went as smoothly as it did.

"I woke up scared to death this morning," Hawley told reporters in Washington. "It went great today."

Parents were some of the happiest beneficiaries of the new rules, glad to have regained some of their tools in the challenging job of keeping young children content on a plane.

Leslie Walker of Plano, Texas, was planning to carry drinks for her 5-year-old daughter and 18-month-old son onto their flight from Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport to El Paso.

"It was really a relief to know that I didn't have to get here this morning and repack everything. It saved me a little time," she said.

Airport retailers were thrilled at the news, and some had already begun stocking up on plastic, zip-top bags. The Paradies Shops, an Atlanta-based company with more than 500 stores in 60 airports across the U.S. and Canada, will hand out clear plastic bags to customers for free.

"It's good news for everybody," said Bobbi Passavanti, the company's spokeswoman. "It's great for the traveler."

San Francisco airport spokeswoman Kandace Bender said it was too early to tell if sales are up but concessionaires selling liquids beyond security checkpoints were "very happy campers," on Tuesday.

The rules were too much bother for some passengers, such as Pat Henderson, of Palm Coast, Fla., who threw away the deodorant and toothpaste in his carryon before entering the security check line at the Atlanta airport.

"It's not worth the hassle," he said. "I just don't want to deal with it."

By 8 a.m., a trash bin at a checkpoint in Atlanta was 3 feet deep with water bottles and 16-ounce containers of toiletries, including shaving gel and hand lotion. But TSA officials there were going easy on travelers the first day of the new rules, allowing them to carry proper-sized toiletries in gallon-sized plastic bags.

After testing a variety of explosives, the FBI and other laboratories found that tiny amounts of substances - so small they fit into a quart-size plastic bag - can't blow up an airliner.

In Washington, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the new rules "are likely to be with us for the foreseeable future." Testifying before the House Homeland Security Committee, Chertoff said the new rules would be in place for at least six weeks, but he declined to say whether they would remain as long as six months.

Fliers Allowed Liquids, But Some Get Frustration (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Larry Copeland

USA Today, September 27, 2006

Travelers went to airports Tuesday with the right to carry liquids and toiletries on planes again, but they also found occasional long lines and strict security rules that made some wonder if their toothpaste was worth the trouble.

New rules allow passengers to bring small amounts of liquids, gels and travel-size toiletries through checkpoints, provided the items are in 1-quart clear plastic bags.

"For all practical purposes, you still have to put everything in a checked bag," Matt Daniels said as he waited for his luggage at the baggage carousel in Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport. "Who goes around carrying liquids in plastic bags?"

Some passengers said they were confused by a requirement that the bottles fit in the 1-quart plastic bag. Others stumbled over a policy limiting each traveler to one bag. And a few were frustrated with trying to find the right size of bag.

Mike Pattani, who owns a Candy Express store at Hartsfield-Jackson, gave 80 to 100 bags to travelers who came in frantically looking for Transportation Security Administration (TSA)-approved toiletry storage. Then he started charging 25 cents a bag.

"So many people were asking for them, I had to start charging," Pattani said.

The new rules caused logjams of more than double the normal wait times at the security checkpoints at Hartsfield-Jackson from 7 to 8:30 a.m., according to Christopher White, TSA spokesman for the Southeastern region. The usual wait time on Tuesday morning is no more than 20 minutes. Passengers waited in line for 45 minutes Tuesday, he said.

"Anytime we change procedures, there is a period of time before the public is fully aware of them and used to using them," White said, noting that Atlanta wait times returned to normal by 9 a.m.

Several airports saw routine lines and conditions. At Washington's Ronald Reagan National Airport, an airport employee stood near the security checkpoint handing out 1-quart plastic bags. TSA screener Chloe Oxendine asked everyone entering the checkpoint area, "Do you have liquids, creams or gels?" and checked them for appropriate size before people got in line.

Cyril Daniel, a screener at National, said 40%-50% of travelers were bringing liquids through security Tuesday, but many carried them in containers or bags that exceeded size limits. When Daniel told travelers the items weren't allowed, "they didn't make much of a fuss about it."

Gloria Cabe was one of the travelers who got it right. She says she read every word of the newspaper coverage of the rule change Tuesday before boarding her flight from Washington to White Plains, N.Y., for an overnight trip.

"It makes an unspeakable difference," Cabe gushed about her ability to carry on toiletries. "There's not an adequate word to describe the difference."

TSA chief Kip Hawley said he felt "everything went smoothly across the country" on the first day since the ban was relaxed. The ban had been put in place seven weeks ago after authorities announced they had foiled a plot by terrorists to blow up several trans-Atlantic planes with liquid bombs.

Hawley said FBI tests have since shown that small amounts of liquids on planes are extremely unlikely to be used to bring down a plane.

For travelers who don't want to carry their liquids or toiletries through checkpoints, the new rules allow passengers to bring toiletries or drinks of any size on to a plane — provided they have been purchased at shops located in secure airport areas. But frequent traveler Jon Morris of Devon, Pa., said he's worried about price-gouging.

"Prices are already sky-high for water and other toiletries" at airports, he said. "They probably will increase prices until there is an outcry about that as well."

Carolyn Wright discovered a surprising nuance when she showed up Tuesday morning at Austin-Bergstrom International Airport in Texas. Wright figured that her half-empty 6-ounce toothpaste tube would comply with the 3-ounce limit.

She had no luck. A screener confiscated it. Wright was too startled to complain. "I just said, "You can have it. I'll buy a new one." Frank reported in Washington; Copeland in Atlanta. Contributing: Martin Kasindorf in Los Angeles.

Air Travelers Make Dry Runs Despite Rules (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Many air travelers, given the opportunity to once again bring toothpaste, shampoo and other toiletries aboard flights, yesterday decided instead it was more convenient to forgo their new rights.

"I stuck to my old routine, it's just easier," said Laura Zlomek of Frostburg, Md., who was flying from Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport to attend a wedding in Hilton Head Island, S.C. "This way I don't have to say I have any liquids."

Many passengers coming or going from Washington-area airports yesterday echoed Miss Zlomek's rationale.

"We were scared to bother to even try," said Donna Joule, 43, of McAllen, Texas, at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. "When I learned of the ban a few weeks ago I thought, 'Oh, now we can't bring liquids anymore.' But then I realized we really didn't need that stuff anyway."

At BWI, "I just got in the habit of checking my bags, it's just easier that way," said Kia Baskerville, 34, of Annapolis, before boarding a flight. "I appreciate the security measures, and I accept the rules as they are."

Lauren Harvard, 18, of Olney, said she has no plans to take any liquids on board in the near future.

"I'll just have to wait and see," said Miss Harvard while waiting for a United Airlines flight to Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. "I knew the ban was being lifted, but I didn't want to take any chances."

Beginning yesterday, liquid, lipstick, and gel and cream toiletries in 3-ounce containers or smaller were allowed on commercial flights if they are in a clear, plastic, quart-size or smaller reclosable bag. Only one plastic bag per passenger is allowed.

Some items are permitted in any amount: saline solution, eye drops and prescription and nonprescription medicine, the Transportation Security Administration said.

Drinks, liquids and gels bought in airport stores inside security checkpoints can be carried into passenger cabins; baby formula is allowed but will be inspected.

Some passengers said it was too confusing keeping up with rules, particularly because the Homeland Security Department just announced them Monday.

Irene Riker of Marietta, Ga., sat sipping a can of Coca-Cola before a flight at BWI yesterday after being told that she couldn't bring it past the security checkpoint.

"I heard about the new rules last night, but I didn't have time to read any papers," Mrs. Riker said. "I don't have a problem with [the rules] as long as they keep us informed. It would've been nice if they could've e-mailed ticket-holders about it."

Terry Townsend, 56, of Chattanooga, Tenn., said he applauds the tighter security but is frustrated because of inconsistencies among airports.

"I fly a lot, and some airports let you take some stuff on and others wouldn't -- you just wouldn't know," he said at Reagan Airport. "That's the biggest frustration I have."

Patricia French, 55, who arrived at BWI yesterday from Atlanta, successfully carried small bottles of hair spray and contact lens solution on board a flight from the Georgia capital. But some of her fellow passengers weren't as fortunate.

"They were very strict about the size of the bag -- I saw them make people throw some away because they were too large," Mrs. French said.

Security lines generally moved briskly at Washington-area airports. That wasn't the case, however, in Atlanta, Mrs. French said.

"I've never waited in security lines as long as I have today in Atlanta," she said. "If they would've asked me one more time about my bag, I would've thrown it away."

Passengers weren't the only ones getting used to the new rules. Transportation Security Administration officials at Reagan Airport regularly deferred to clipboards with the updated regulations. And a sign outside an hourly parking garage at the airport still informed passengers that all liquids were banned on board flights, ignoring the updated rules.

Teresa Usher, 44, of Bel Air, Md., said the relaxed rules almost seemed too good to be true. So just in case they weren't, she wasn't going to risk losing any expensive cosmetics while going through security at BWI.

"I just took my lipstick; put it in my pocket so if they told me I couldn't take it, I could just throw it away," she said before boarding a United Airlines flight to see her mother in Portland, Ore. "Everything else I left at home. I just didn't want to take any chances."

Airport Security Adjusts To New Rules On Liquids (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Security was relatively smooth at U.S. airports yesterday, as travelers adjusted to new rules allowing them to bring aboard planes small amounts of liquids and gels in their carry-on bags. But it took some flexibility on the part of authorities to make things work. Many people did not know about revisions to month-long rules banning most liquids and gels from passenger cabins.

For example, consider Ted Koppel and the requirement that containers of 3 ounces or less had to fit easily into clear plastic bags.

The former host of ABC's "Nightline" arrived at Washington's Reagan National Airport yesterday morning for a flight to Dallas without a clear plastic bag and a too-large tube of toothpaste in his shaving kit.

A supervisor with the Transportation Security Administration rushed to the rescue. She gave Koppel the necessary plastic bag and determined that he had already used enough of the toothpaste to meet the new limits for such gels. He put the tube into the plastic bag and sailed through security.

Under the rules that went into effect yesterday morning, passengers are allowed to board with small amounts of toiletries in containers of 3 ounces or less, as long as the items are visible in a clear plastic 1-quart bag. The bags have to be pulled out of carry-on luggage to be examined separately at security checkpoints. Under the new rules, passengers may purchase drinks in secure areas and bring those aboard planes.

The TSA banned nearly all liquids and gels from passenger cabins in August after British authorities said they uncovered a terrorist plot to blow up transatlantic airliners with liquid bombs. Large containers of liquids and gels still must be checked or left behind, officials said.

TSA officials said they eased the rules because they had studied the threat and were confident that the revisions balanced the risk of attack against inconvenience for travelers.

TSA officials said they worked hard yesterday to help travelers make it through security, even if they didn't meet the letter of the new requirements.

"It went great today," said Kip Hawley, director of the TSA, before speaking at the Aero Club of Washington's monthly luncheon. "Everything I have heard suggests it went smoothly across the country . . . We worked with the security officers so they have discretion, particularly on the first day."

Hawley said officials rolled out the revisions on a Tuesday because it usually is one the least busy for passengers. Security lines were fairly short at National yesterday morning.

Rob Yingling, a spokesman for the Washington Metropolitan Airports Authority, which runs National and Washington Dulles International airports, declined to comment on security lines at either airport or how the new rules affected travelers. He referred calls to the TSA. Security lines "moved very efficiently" at Baltimore-Washington Thurgood Marshall International Airport, an airport spokesman said.

At National, passengers said they were happy that the TSA eased the restrictions, though several didn't know about the changes until they were told by a reporter.

Susan Garfield, 33, a director of women's health for a biotech company, called the original ban a "pain in the rear end" because it forced her to check her luggage and wait 40 minutes at the carousel after her flight.

But Garfield said her frustration largely evaporated yesterday when she packed her toothpaste, lip gloss and nail polish into a clear cosmetics bag with a zipper -- technically, a violation of the new rules -- and whipped through security at Boston's Logan International Airport.

"This seems like a much better approach," Garfield said.

Elliot Kash, 34, a salesman for a car-rental agency who travels between New York and the District twice a week, said he heard about the revisions yesterday and immediately bought a small silver mesh case for his toiletries -- not the clear bag the TSA requires.

Screeners at LaGuardia Airport allowed him to pass through security anyway, he said. As he opened his luggage to show a reporter the bag at National, he realized that he had toothpaste, spray-on deodorant and some cream jammed in other parts of his bag -- missed or ignored by the screeners. He said he had forgotten the items were there.

Latest Airport Security Rules Trip Up Travelers In L.A. (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

Some passengers discover that the end of a ban on carry-on liquids doesn't mean shampoo gets a free ride.

Dave Johnson heard about the new flight safety rules as he was preparing to leave for Washington, D.C. He thought he had come to Los Angeles International Airport properly prepared, with all his toiletries in a large plastic sack the size of a freezer storage bag.

But when he reached the X-ray line, the security checker did a double-take.

"Whoa! OK, sir that's much too big! That's much larger than we allow."

"Well, do you have a smaller one?" asked Johnson, a 65-year-old program manager with the Navy.

"Sorry, we don't supply the bags, sir."

"Well, where can I get one?"

Nowhere at the airport, actually, and Johnson was forced to rush back to the ticket counter to check one of his carry-on bags along with the toiletries.

As Johnson left, the man who had been behind him in line held up a similarly oversized plastic bag and said, "I probably have the same problem."

On the first day of the relaxed transportation safety rules, travelers and security personnel at LAX spent much of the morning working through minor kinks and confusion caused by the new guidelines.

Though liquids and gels such as shampoo, toothpaste and shaving cream now are allowed in carry-on bags, no bottles, tubes or jars larger than 3 ounces are permitted and all must fit into a clear plastic container the size of a quart bag.

Many travelers simply heard the words "clear bag" and assumed that any clear bag would do.

Others brought several clear bags packed with things, but only one per person is allowed.

"Basically, you can bring anything you want as long as it's 3 ounces and as long as it's in a Baggie," said a Transportation Security Administration checker named Chris, who declined to give his full name because of agency regulations. Passengers are allowed to bring on more than 3 ounces of medicine or infant formula if they receive clearance from the TSA checker on the scene.

"By tomorrow, the word will be out through the media and everything will be better," Chris said.

On Tuesday, however, many people had either misunderstood the clear-bag rule or misjudged how much the restrictions had been eased.

"I assumed that today all the restrictions were gone," said a man flying home to San Francisco. He had bought a travel-sized tube of toothpaste the night before but had no plastic bag to put it in.

"I'm going to take it up there and see if they'll let me through," said the passenger, who declined to give his name.

DOJ_NMG_0069994

TSA spokesman Nico Melendez spent several hours at LAX on Tuesday morning and said the new travel measures didn't seem to create significant additional delays or longer lines. He encouraged all travelers to check the TSA's website, http://www.tsa.gov for precise information on the new rules.

"We expect a bit of a learning curve," Melendez said. "Whenever we do something like this, it's a couple days' process to get the word out and get everyone on the same page."

The lack of available plastic bags at the airport created a bit of a bottleneck. Anthony Bourke, who had flown into L.A. early Tuesday, noted that airport officials in San Francisco were passing out plastic bags to travelers who needed them.

More than one traveler said a clever entrepreneur could have made good money by simply bringing sandwich bags to the airport and selling them for $1 each.

Still, a healthy percentage of the passengers did show up in step with the new rules. One man, who described himself as a "120,000-mile-per-year traveler," came with a regulation-sized plastic bag that even bore his initials in black marker.

Most of the others, however, were in the clear simply because they had long since abandoned taking any liquids or gels onto the plane.

"I'm traveling every week," said Marion Lowry, who was flying to San Francisco, "and I've come to the conclusion that I'm just bringing no toiletries, no belt, and wearing slip-on shoes."

A Retreat On Carry-On Liquids (NYT)

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The federal government's relaxation of the rules for carrying liquids and gels aboard airplanes is being greeted with sighs of relief by many passengers, airlines, airports and businesses that sell bottled beverages or other liquids at the airport. But we sure wish we could be confident that the Transportation Security Administration was not simply trying to placate airlines and other businesses concerned about possible loss of revenues.

The new rules that went into effect yesterday allow passengers to carry liquids in three-ounce containers provided they all fit comfortably into a single quart-sized, clear plastic, zip-top bag. The rules also permit passengers to carry aboard beverages and other items purchased in the secure area of the airport, after they have passed through the security screening checkpoints.

The head of the T.S.A. said the near total ban was no longer needed because extensive testing by the F.B.I. and others had found that small containers don't pose a real threat and because items bought in the airport's secure area have already been screened on the way in.

But even an amateur can see holes in that argument. It would seem relatively easy for a small group of terrorists to combine their liquids after all have passed through security checkpoints, either in the airport's secure area or even aboard the plane. And one has to wonder whether a corrupt worker or terrorist might find a way to sneak a liquid bomb into the secure area despite enhanced surveillance and background checks.

Perhaps officials have really worked all this out in a methodical and disinterested manner. But it is disquieting that a former inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security, writing in USA Today, declared himself "skeptical" that such a determination had been made. A safer course of action would retain the near total ban on liquids and let the airlines supply passengers with ample beverages.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Orders Intel Report Declassified (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The AP, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush said Tuesday that critics who believe the Iraq war has worsened terrorism are naive, and he ordered the partial declassification of a high-level intelligence analysis that has stirred heated election-season argument on the subject.

At a White House news conference, Bush acknowledged that the fighting in Iraq has been used as a recruitment tool for extremists - one finding of the intelligence assessment that suggests the Iraq war has nourished terrorists' ranks.

But he rejected any suggestion that the war was a mistake. "I think it's naive. I think it's a mistake for people to believe that going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people makes us less safe," Bush said, standing alongside Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

Many Democrats have argued that the U.S. needs to chart a new course to stabilize Iraqi society and eventually shift American military forces away.

After three days of criticism concerning leaked portions of the intelligence analysis, Bush asked National Intelligence Director John Negroponte to declassify key judgments of the 30-page assessment from the nation's top analysts who are spread across 16 different spy agencies.

Democrats saw the conclusions - particularly that the overall terror threat has grown since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 - as political ammunition. Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Carl Levin of Michigan both said release of the key findings alone wouldn't give Americans enough information, and they accused the administration of selective declassification.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., sought a rare secret session of the House to discuss the report's classified findings. Her request was rejected - 217-171 - on a nearly straight party-line vote.

Such a session hasn't occurred in the House since July 1983, when the chamber went into a closed session to discuss U.S. support for paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

In an interview, Pelosi said the secret session was needed to allow members to better understand the intelligence community's most recent assessment on global terrorism. Judging by media reports, she said, the intelligence estimate "is the administration's worst nightmare. It is not a corroboration of what the president is saying. It is a contradiction of what the president is saying."

In a sometimes-testy exchange with reporters, Bush said the document was leaked "coming right down the stretch in this campaign in order to create confusion in the minds of the American people."

He rejected the suggestion that his decision to release a version of the report was a political act, as well. "I want you to read the document so you don't speculate about what it says ... as opposed to relying on gossip," he said.

Bush listed a number of terrorist attacks that predated the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq: the hijackings of Sept. 11, 2001, the 2000 attack on the USS Cole, the 1998 bombings on U.S. embassies in East Africa and the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

"To suggest that if we weren't in Iraq we would see a rosier scenario, with fewer extremists joining the radical movement, requires us to ignore 20 years of experience," Bush said.

Bush Goes Public With Terror Study (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

After its findings are leaked in news stories, part of an intelligence report calling the Iraq war a 'cause celebre' for jihadists is declassified.

WASHINGTON — Declassified portions of a high-level intelligence report released Tuesday describe the war in Iraq as a major catalyst for Islamic radicalism around the world, while also citing other causes for the expanding terrorist threat.

President Bush took the highly unusual step of releasing key findings of the classified intelligence study in an attempt to blunt a growing furor in Washington over news reports this week in which intelligence officials described sections of the document that indicate the war in Iraq has made the terrorism problem worse. The White House said the initial news stories about the National Intelligence Estimate, a report offering a consensus view of U.S. intelligence agencies, did not represent the whole document.

But the release of its principal findings appeared likely to fuel the election-season debate over the impact of the war in Iraq, and provided scant support for the president's position that the U.S. occupation of the country has made America safer.

At a White House news conference, Bush lashed out at what he suggested was a politically motivated leak of the report's conclusions, and at critics who have cited the intelligence estimate to question his administration's course in Iraq and argue that the drawn-out conflict is adding to the danger of terrorism.

"Some people have, you know, guessed what's in the report and have concluded that going into Iraq was a mistake," Bush said, appearing alongside Afghan President Hamid Karzai. "I strongly disagree. I think it's naive. I think it's a mistake for people to believe that going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people makes us less safe."

The section released by the White House does not include an explicit conclusion that the war in Iraq has increased the terrorist threat to Americans. But the thrust of the report's "key judgments" is that the terrorist danger is morphing and growing and that the Iraq war is a major contributing force in that trend.

"We assess that the Iraq jihad is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives," reads one of the main conclusions of the report.

"The Iraq conflict has become the 'cause celebre' for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement."

Among other findings, the report said that Al Qaeda was exploiting the war in Iraq to attract new donors and recruits; that fighters with experience in Iraq were likely to function as leaders in a new generation of militants; and that foreign Al Qaeda fighters were free to leave the country and focus on other targets as more Iraqi militants took their place within Iraq.

Bush did not say who he thought leaked the classified report. Atty. Gen Alberto R. Gonzales indicated Tuesday that the Justice Department could investigate the disclosure once the agency that classified the report — in this case the director of national intelligence — reported the leak.

Bush said he ordered the key judgments declassified — four pages out of the 30-page document — so that "everybody can draw their own conclusions about what the report says." Other officials said it was designed to bolster statements from administration officials in recent days that the report was wide-ranging, and that assessing the impact of the Iraq war was not its main focus.

The portion made public includes six references to the conflict in Iraq, describing it as a recruiting tool for Islamic fundamentalists, a training ground for Muslim fighters and a laboratory for lethal new terrorist methods that are increasingly being exported to other countries.

Overall, the excerpt offers a bleak assessment of the evolving terrorist threat.

Although counter-terrorism operations have damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda, the report concludes that the global jihadist movement "is spreading and adapting to counter-terrorism efforts," and that if current trends continue, "threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide."

The threat from "self-radicalized cells will grow in importance to U.S. counter-terrorism efforts," according to the report, which described Europe as "an important venue for attacking Western interests."

The document even warns that rising anti-U.S. sentiment could fuel other radical ideologies, prompting leftist, nationalist or separatist groups in other parts of the world "to adopt terrorist methods to attack U.S. interests."

The National Intelligence Estimate represents the U.S. intelligence community's most authoritative and comprehensive examination of global terrorism trends. The document was produced by a senior group of analysts under the direction of National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte.

The report, titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States" was completed in April. Some members of Congress were briefed on the report this year, but its conclusions on Iraq were not publicly disclosed until this week, when The Times and other news organizations published articles based on accounts from government officials familiar with its contents.

The NIE lists other factors contributing to the growth in Islamic fundamentalism, including "entrenched grievances" among Muslims such as "fear of Western domination" as well as the slow pace of economic, social and political reforms in many Muslim nations.

It identifies factors that could curb the spread of Islamic extremism, including the limited appeal of militant ideology. The document also indicates that a string of setbacks for insurgents in Iraq could mean that "fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

Frances Fragos Townsend, assistant to Bush for homeland security, told reporters that suggestion "underscores the president's point about the importance of our winning in Iraq."

Even so, the excerpt concludes that the "factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities," suggesting that Islamic radicalization is likely to grow in strength.

Democrats pounced on the report.

"What I conclude from it is that our failed strategy in Iraq has made the world more dangerous," said Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. Harman said the declassification of the document could have immediate repercussions, shifting debate on Capitol Hill away from the White House agenda.

Sen. John D. "Jay" Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said the report's judgments "make it clear that the intelligence community — all 16 agencies — believe the war in Iraq has fueled terrorism."

Republicans downplayed the report's language on Iraq, and pointed out that most of the document's findings are consistent with previous reports and testimony describing terrorist networks as increasingly decentralized.

"Despite Democrats' dubious claims, the NIE report indicates that America's success against Al Qaeda has led to the enemy becoming more diffuse and independent," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

In his news conference with Karzai, Bush sought to refute the suggestion that the war was exacerbating the terror problem by ticking off attacks against American targets before the invasion. He mentioned the 1993 car bombing of the World Trade Center, the 1998 bombings of American embassies in east Africa, and the 2000 attack on the U.S. warship Cole in a Yemen harbor.

"To suggest that if we weren't in Iraq we would see a rosier scenario with fewer extremists joining the radical movement requires us to ignore 20 years of experience," Bush said. "The best way to protect America is defeat these killers overseas so we do not have to face them here at home."

But the implication that there was a connection between Baghdad and any of those attacks — or the Al Qaeda terrorist network — was not supported by intelligence estimates before the war, and has been widely discredited since.

At one point, Bush defended the invasion by saying the war on terrorism requires "going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people."

However, the most comprehensive intelligence estimate on Iraq before the war — a National Intelligence Estimate published in October 2002 — concluded that Baghdad was "drawing a line short of conducting terrorist attacks" against the United States, and that only "if sufficiently desperate" was Hussein likely to seek a partnership with a terrorist organization such as Al Qaeda.

More recently, the Republican-controlled Senate Intelligence Committee concluded a two-year investigation that turned up no evidence that Hussein had ties to Al Qaeda or was plotting against the United States. Instead, the report found that the Iraqi leader had issued a general order barring anyone in his government from having dealings with the terrorist network.

American intelligence agencies are working on an NIE that focuses exclusively on the conflict in Iraq. Townsend said the report is scheduled to be completed in January. Harman said she is concerned that the administration is seeking to delay release of the document until after the November elections.

Bush Declassifies Some Iraq Intelligence Documents (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush on Tuesday attempted to blunt criticism that the war in Iraq has emboldened a new generation of terrorists, ordering the release of a select summary of a classified National Intelligence Estimate concluding that U.S.-led counter-terrorism efforts have "seriously damaged" the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations.

At the same time, a carefully screened summary of the NIE concludes that a holy war in Iraq is "shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives." It reports that the conflict has become "the 'cause celebre' for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement."

While reports of a small portion of the NIE revealed by weekend newspapers focused on the war in Iraq serving as a recruiting and breeding ground for Islamic radicals, the president maintained that the assessment released Tuesday supports his contention that the U.S. and its allies have succeeded in weakening terrorist networks, dispersing their operatives and undermining their plans.

Nonetheless, the intelligence community's assessment that the war in Iraq has spawned new terrorism and inflamed anti-U.S. sentiment in the Muslim world served to buttress opposition to the war in Congress as the critical Nov. 7 elections approach.

The NIE is a consensus report of 16 government intelligence agencies. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte released a select, four-page summary after screening it for sensitive intelligence, although the White House had described the still-classified summary of the report's "key judgments" as a nine-page document.

The report's most alarming finding—that the war in Iraq has generated new terrorism—serves as a powerful challenge to the president's insistence that removing Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq has made the world safer. This is the argument Bush has embraced for the U.S.-led invasion since pre-war intelligence about suspected weapons of mass destruction in Iraq proved to be wrong.

"Some people have, you know, guessed what's in the report and have concluded that going into Iraq was a mistake," Bush said during a White House press conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. "I strongly disagree. I think it's naive.

"To suggest that, if we weren't in Iraq, we would see a rosier scenario with fewer extremists joining the radical movement requires us to ignore 20 years of experience," Bush said. He cited a series of terrorist attacks that occurred before the invasion of Iraq, including both the 1993 and Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center in New York.

The revelation of first a portion of the NIE that was produced in April and now the broader, declassified summary is likely to stir new debate over the war in Iraq at a time when the president and fellow Republicans are attempting to maintain control of Congress in November, contending the GOP is the party most committed to national security.

Citing the NIE as evidence, Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), declared, "Iraq was a strategic mistake. The Bush administration's mishandling of the war has increased the number of radical Islamic fundamentalists and resentment and hatred of the United States."

Bush angrily denounced whoever revealed the report's findings before he decided to declassify a summary of it.

"You know, what's interesting about the NIE… it was an intelligence report done last April," Bush told reporters in the East Room. "And here we are, coming down the stretch of an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspaper. Isn't that interesting? Somebody's taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes."

The White House complained that news reports focused on one paragraph taken "wildly out of context" from a nine-page summary of the NIE known as the "key judgments." Still, much of the four-page summary released Tuesday focuses on the role that Iraq has played in fomenting terrorism.

Among the judgments of the April report released by Negroponte:

* U.S.-led counter-terrorism has "seriously damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations," but Al Qaeda continues to pose the greatest threat to the U.S.

* The global jihadist movement is spreading, and adapting to counter-terrorism efforts, and should this continue "threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide." Yet the movement is "decentralized, lacks a coherent strategy and is becoming more diffuse."

* The Iraq jihad is "shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives," and perceived success there would inspire more fighters elsewhere. The Iraq conflict has become "the cause celebre for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement."

* Al Qaeda, merged with the network of then-elusive Abu Musab al Zarqawi in Iraq, is "exploiting the situation in Iraq to attract new recruits and donors." Zarqawi was later killed.

* As jihadist groups use improvised explosive devices and suicide attacks in urban centers, fighters with experience in Iraq are "a potential source of leadership" for jihadists, and with anti-American sentiment on the rise, this could prompt other groups to adopt terrorist methods for attacking the U.S.

* This "radicalization… is occurring more quickly, more widely and more anonymously in the Internet age," making the likelihood of surprise attacks by unknown groups more likely.

Negroponte, calling the report a comprehensive assessment based on a series of judgments, maintained that "characterizing only a small handful of those judgments distorts the broad strategic framework the NIE is assessing—in this case, trends in global terrorism."

Yet Bush's critics contended that releasing select portions of the NIE, formally titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States," withholds information that would enable the public to fully judge the report.

"For more than three years, President Bush and the Republican Congress have repeatedly claimed the war in Iraq is making America safer," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.). "The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects. The last thing we need is another selective declassification of portions of the report in a desperate attempt by the administration to avoid disclosing the truth."

While complaining of election-season politics in the leak of a portion of a report, the president was asked if his own release of a summary of the NIE is also a political act.

"I want you to read the documents, so you don't speculate about what it says… as opposed to relying upon gossip and somebody, you know, who may or may not have seen the document trying to classify the war in Iraq one way or the other," Bush said, with apparent frustration over leaks. "I guess it's just Washington—where… there's no such thing as classification anymore, hardly."

Backing Policy, President Issues Terror Estimate (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Portions of a National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism that the White House released under pressure on Tuesday said that Muslim jihadists were “increasing in both number and geographic dispersion” and that current trends could lead to increasing attacks around the globe.

The report, a comprehensive assessment of terrorism produced in April by American intelligence agencies, said the invasion and occupation of Iraq had become a “cause célèbre” for jihadists. It identified the jihad in Iraq as one of four underlying factors fueling the spread of the Islamic radicalism, along with entrenched grievances, the slow pace of reform and pervasive anti-American sentiment.

The intelligence estimate said American-led counterterrorism efforts in the past five years had “seriously damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations.” But it said that Al Qaeda continued to pose the greatest threat to American interests among terrorism organizations, and that the global jihadist movement overall was “spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts.” [Text and news analysis, Page A16.]

The estimate predicted that over the next five years the factors fueling the spread of global jihad were likely to be more powerful than those that might slow it.

The White House ordered portions of the intelligence estimate declassified to counter what it described as mischaracterizations about its findings in news reports.

The Bush administration had initially resisted releasing the document but changed course after being pressured to declassify the report by Republicans, including Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, and by the conservative editorial page of The Wall Street Journal.

At a news conference on Tuesday where he announced the release of portions of the document, President Bush suggested forcefully that news reports in the past two days about the document had been based on politically motivated leaks.

"You know, to suggest that if we weren't in Iraq we would see a rosier scenario, with fewer extremists joining the radical movement, requires us to ignore 20 years of experience," Mr. Bush said. He added: "My judgment is: The only way to protect this country is to stay on the offense."

The intelligence estimate says that if jihadists who leave Iraq perceive themselves, or are perceived by others, to have failed, fewer fighters will be inspired to keep fighting.

Democrats seized on the document's conclusions as proof that the invasion of Iraq was a mistake.

"The war in Iraq has made us less safe," said Senator John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the top Democrat on the Senate intelligence committee. Mr. Rockefeller said the judgments contained in the intelligence estimate "make it clear that the intelligence community — all 16 agencies — believe the war in Iraq has fueled terrorism."

The estimate was the first formal appraisal of the terrorism threat by American intelligence agencies since the invasion of Iraq began in March 2003. The public release of any portion of such a document is highly unusual. The White House declassified fewer than 4 pages of what officials described as a document of more than 30 pages, saying that to release more of it would endanger intelligence sources and methods.

The release of the findings added fuel to an intense political debate about the administration's record in combating terrorism. Mr. Bush used the news conference to reassert his view that the Iraq war was not to blame for the growth of Islamic radicalism.

He also attributed the disclosure of some of the assessment findings to what he said were government officials leaking classified information to "create confusion in the minds of the American people" weeks before an important Congressional election.

The first article on the findings was published Sunday in The New York Times after more than five weeks of reporting. More than a dozen United States government officials and outside experts were interviewed for the article, including employees of several government agencies and both supporters and critics of the Bush administration.

Democrats also criticized the White House for only declassifying part of the report, and the House minority leader, Nancy Pelosi of California, tried and failed to persuade Republicans to agree to a vote that would have shut the doors of the House of Representatives to allow members to read the entire classified report.

Officials who have read the entire document said the still-classified portion contained a more detailed analysis of the impact of the Iraq war on the global jihad movement. Representative Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, said that what the White House released Tuesday was broadly consistent with the classified portion of the report.

National intelligence estimates are the most authoritative documents that American intelligence agencies produce on a specific national security issue. They represent the consensus view of the 16 intelligence agencies in government, and are approved by John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence.

The release on Tuesday of portions of the document was the second time that the Bush administration had come under political pressure to declassify a national intelligence estimate.

In July 2003, the White House released the principal judgments of an October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq's weapons programs in an attempt to address a furor over the origins of President Bush's statement, made in a State of the Union address, that Saddam Hussein had been trying to buy nuclear materials in Niger.

In recent months, without disclosing the existence of the intelligence estimate on terrorism, some senior American intelligence officials have given glimpses into its conclusions. During a speech in San Antonio in April, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who was then Mr. Negroponte's deputy, said new jihadist networks and cells were increasingly likely to emerge.

"If this trend continues, threats to the U.S. at home and abroad will become more diverse and that could lead to increasing attacks worldwide," General Hayden said, using the exact language of the intelligence assessment made public on Tuesday. General Hayden is now director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

But the intelligence assessment paints a starker picture of the role that the Iraq war is playing in shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders than that presented either in recent White House documents or in speeches by President Bush tied to the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The intelligence report specifically cited the role of the Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who led the Iraqi group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, in attracting new recruits for the jihad cause in Iraq, and stated that "should al-Zarqawi continue to evade capture and scale back attacks against Muslims, we assess he could broaden his popular appeal and present a global threat."

He was killed by American forces in June.

Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's homeland security adviser, suggested to reporters on Tuesday that the killing of Mr. Zarqawi might ultimately help dampen the appeal of jihad in Iraq.

At the same time, the report concludes that the increased role of Iraqis in managing the operations of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia "might lead veteran foreign jihadists to focus their efforts on external operations."

To be successful in combating the spread of a radical ideology, the assessment states, the United States government "must go well beyond operations to capture or kill terrorist leaders."

Bush's Leak Comments Heighten Debate Over Security (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush on Tuesday accused unnamed people of leaking part of a classified intelligence report on Iraq as an act of political sabotage, intended to "create confusion in the minds of the American people" in advance of the November elections.

Bush's assertion, along with his decision to release portions of the same report in response to the leaks, were the clearest signs yet that the ongoing debate over the Iraq war and its effect on U.S. security has grown to a fever pitch as the two parties struggle to shape public opinion before election day.

"Here we are, coming down the stretch of an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspaper," Bush said, referring to news stories Sunday on the intelligence report, which said the Iraq war, among other factors, was fueling an expansion of Islamic terrorism. "Isn't that interesting? Somebody's taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes."

Bush's comments marked the latest in a string of highly public and politically charged clashes over national security that both major parties believe have implications for the elections. They have included a fight over whether President Clinton took sufficient anti-terrorism steps while in office, disputes on Capitol Hill over interrogation and domestic wiretapping laws, and differing interpretations of the classified intelligence report.

With Congress entering its final days before adjourning for the fall election campaign, the two parties are fighting over which image will be uppermost in voters' minds Nov. 7: That the U.S. has taken on the terrorism challenge by invading Iraq, or that the invasion and its bloody aftermath have left the United States less safe.

Clinton has become embroiled in the debate, marking a rare foray by a former president into a present-day political fight. Clinton used a Sunday interview with the Fox News Channel to defend his efforts to stop Osama bin Laden and, in an unusually sharp rebuke of Bush's policies, to argue that the Republicans who followed him in office had ignored bin Laden until the Sept. 11 attacks.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice accused Clinton of making "flatly false" claims about the Bush administration's efforts against bin Laden, when asked about the former president's remarks Monday by the New York Post.

Democrats have been reluctant to challenge the GOP on national security matters, because the issue has benefited Republicans in recent cycles and Democrats have been divided on Iraq. On Tuesday, they made it clear they intended to fully engage on the security front this time.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., argued -- albeit unsuccessfully -- for the House to go into private session to discuss the intelligence report on terrorism and call for a full declassification. And Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., the former first lady and a possible candidate for president in 2008, not only defended her husband's handling of terrorism but suggested he would have heeded warnings signs that she said were ignored by the Bush White House.

Republicans have sought to portray Democrats as inadequate to the job of protecting the nation, pursuing an election-year strategy of trying to mobilize conservative voters in key districts by arguing that Democrats would "cut and run" from Iraq and thus embolden terrorists.

Democrats, citing shrinking public support for Bush and the Iraq war, have tried to portray the administration as incompetent. However, disagreements among leading Democrats over whether to embrace a troop withdrawal plan in Iraq have left the party with a muted message. This week, citing the intelligence report and other questions about Bush's leadership, the party is attempting to overcome that disunity and beat the GOP at its own game.

"There was a debate as recently as two weeks ago about whether Iraq is advancing or debilitating America's interests," said Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who leads Democratic strategy for House campaigns. "You have now the best the minds of American intelligence saying it's debilitating, and that is affecting the political terrain for this election."

In a sense, former President Clinton's appearance Sunday and Bush's news conference Tuesday offered a split screen debate between each party's most influential leader.

Clinton accused Bush of spending billions of dollars in Iraq and losing focus on capturing bin Laden in Afghanistan. "If I were still president, we'd have more than 20,000 troops there trying to kill him," Clinton said.

"Now, I've never criticized President Bush, and I don't think this is useful," Clinton added. "But you know we do have a government that thinks Afghanistan is only one-seventh as important as Iraq."

Clinton also offered a critique of Bush's broader agenda of promoting democracy overseas, subtly contesting the current president's frequent argument that free elections in Iraq and Afghanistan are signs of progress.

"Democracy is about way more than majority rule," Clinton said. "Democracy is about minority rights, individual rights, restraints on power. ... But I don't think that's all we can do in the Muslim world. I think they have to see us as trying to get a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. I think they have to see us as willing to talk to people who see the world differently than we do."

Bush declined to respond directly to Clinton's comments, turning aside a question about the former president by saying his administration is working to make the country safer.

"I've watched all this finger-pointing and naming of names, and all that stuff," Bush said. "Our objective is to secure the country. ... So I'm not going to comment on other comments."

White House Releases Portions Of Iraq-War Critique (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The White House, under mounting pressure from Congress, released declassified portions of a government intelligence report that concludes the Iraq war is a "cause célèbre" shaping a new generation of militant Islamists and terrorists.

The four pages of findings from the National Intelligence Estimate, representing the input of 16 government agencies, follow days of criticism sparked by portions that were leaked last week. They also come in the run-up to midterm elections in which the conflict has become a defining issue. In them, analysts conclude that while the leadership of al Qaeda has suffered serious damage in Iraq and the wider war on terror, the threat from Islamic extremists has spread in numbers and geographic reach.

Leaders from both parties immediately seized on the findings to argue that their position on the Iraq war would better secure the U.S.

President Bush called those who believe the war has worsened terrorism "naïve," and said to withdraw from Iraq could only further embolden militant groups to spread their influence across the Middle East and the Islamic world.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D., W.Va.) senior Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, countered that, "The reality is, the war in Iraq has inflamed Islamic extremism ... and it has created a training ground for the next generation of terrorists."

The White House initially sought to dismiss the NIE's leaked portions on Iraq as being mischaracterized, but ultimately agreed to release the report's "Key Judgments." None of the conclusions about Iraq had been redacted, said Francis Fragos Townsend, Mr. Bush's top counter-terrorism official.

The NIE seeks to assess the near-term capabilities of al Qaeda and other militant Islamist groups. It said U.S.-led counter-terrorism operations have "seriously damaged" al Qaeda's senior leadership, but the group continues to spread its ideology by breaking into more diffuse cells and communicating through the Internet. The NIE said Islamists have made particular gains in spreading their influence into Europe, and warned that non-Muslim groups in Latin America and Asia who share al Qaeda's anti-American agenda could also resort to terrorist activities.

President George Bush and Afghan President4 Hamid Karzai hold a joint press conference to discuss the Iraq policy and the leaking of classified information for political purposes.

On Iraq, the report said the war has aided al Qaeda's efforts to recruit globally by "breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world." It said U.S. success in stabilizing Iraq and promoting democracy, however, could ultimately bring fewer fighters into the fight. "We assess that the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities" in the near term, the report said.

As the White House and its critics traded charges over the findings, Congress was poised to approve rules for interrogating and prosecuting suspected foreign combatants, as Democrats eager to avoid political fallout before the elections said they aren't likely to block the measure. The House will take up its bill today and the Senate could follow today or tomorrow.

Some critics of the legislation, which would set up military commissions to try "enemy combatants," want to propose changes. But even without those revisions, Democrats aren't likely to filibuster and many might decide to vote for it, Senate aides said.

One sticking point is a change made in recent days that expands the definition of "enemy combatant." Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) called it "much broader than anyone simply caught in terrorist activity." Another is a provision that would prevent suspects held at Guantanamo Bay from challenging their detention with a habeas corpus petition. Human-rights groups have said this would invite abuse of prisoners and allow the government to hold suspects indefinitely.

In related action, the House approved a $447 billion Pentagon budget for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, including $70 billion in emergency funding for military operations overseas. But a companion defense authorization bill remains stymied by a standoff between Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) and the Senate.

Bush On Offensive Over Leaked Iraq Report (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

The Bush administration on Tuesday formally declassified parts of the leaked National Intelligence Estimate, revealing that Iraq had become a “cause célèbre for jihadists” and warning that an increasing number of Muslims identified themselves with the cause.

Publishing the key judgments in the NIE marked a White House effort to limit the political fallout from the admission that the Iraq war had fostered terrorism and to show that the findings were just one part of a wider analysis of terrorism trends.

President George W. Bush said he had declassified parts of the report as he wanted to “stop all the speculation, all the politics about somebody saying something about Iraq”. But he angrily denounced the leak as an effort to influence the election and “confuse the American people about the nature of this enemy”.

“We are coming down the stretch in an election campaign and it’s on the front page of your newspapers. Isn’t that interesting? Somebody’s taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes,” he said, in some of his most pointed political remarks of the mid-term election campaign.

The four-page NIE document said that a small but growing percentage of Muslims identified themselves as jihadist. It warned that Iraq was breeding deep resentment of US involvement in the Muslim world and that fighters trained there could become leaders elsewhere.

Yet it affirmed that, if these fighters failed in Iraq, “we judge fewer . . . will be inspired to carry on the fight”.

Mr Bush took a direct swipe at critics who have called for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq. He said it was “naive and a mistake” to suggest that if the US was not in Iraq “we would see a rosier scenario, with fewer extremists joining the radical movement. It requires us to ignore 20 years of experience”.

Leaks from the classified document that was written in April were published at the weekend. News reports drew attention to the fact that the Iraq war had exacerbated Islamic terrorism and that the dangers had increased after September 11 2001. Democrats have seized on the leaked NIE report to suggest that the Iraq war has undermined the “war on terror” and made the US less safe.

The National Strategy for Combating Terrorism, issued by the White House last month, had played down the threat posed by Iraq. In a list of seven challenges it cited, concerns about Iraq came sixth. “The ongoing fight for freedom in Iraq has been twisted by terrorist propaganda as a rallying cry,” it said.

Democrats in the House of Representatives tried on Tuesday to force a rare closed session to discuss intelligence on terrorism, but the Republican-controlled body rejected their move.

Mr Bush declined to respond to comments made in a Fox News interview this weekend by former President Bill Clinton who said that in the first nine months in office the Bush administration had held no meetings on the threat from Osama bin Laden. “I don’t have enough time to finger-point,” he said.

Bush Hits 'Political' Leak (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

An angry President Bush said yesterday that a secret terrorism assessment had been leaked for "political purposes" and disputed that the classified report had concluded the Iraq war is spreading Islamic extremism across the world.

DOJ_NMG_0070003

But despite misgivings that it "would be a bad habit for our government to declassify every time there's a leak," the president ordered National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte to declassify key judgments on terrorism in Iraq from the 30-page document, drafted by the nation's top analysts in 16 spy agencies.

The four-page section declassified yesterday calls the Iraq war a "cause celebre" for Islamic terrorists and says that despite U.S. troops' wreaking serious damage on al Qaeda leadership, the number of terrorists is spreading in number and geographic dispersion.

"If this trend continues, threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide," the document says. "The confluence of shared purpose and dispersed actors will make it harder to find and undermine jihadist groups."

Although the report -- completed in April and based on data collected through February -- states that the "global jihadist movement is decentralized, lacks a coherent global strategy and is becoming more diffuse," the document also says that new jihadist networks are increasingly likely to emerge and that they will be harder to track or infiltrate.

But at the White House, the president called critics who say the Iraq war was a mistake "naive."

"I think it's a mistake for people to believe that going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people makes us less safe," he said.

He also took issue with the conclusion that the Iraq war is responsible for creating new terrorists, saying that those who "see a rosier scenario with fewer extremists joining the radical movement" if not for the Iraq war are ignoring 20 years of history.

"We weren't in Iraq when we got attacked on September 11. We weren't in Iraq when thousands of fighters were trained in terror camps," Mr. Bush said. "We weren't in Iraq when they first attacked the World Trade Center in 1993. We weren't in Iraq when they bombed the Cole. We weren't in Iraq when they blew up our embassies in Kenya and Tanzania."

"They came to America on September 11th, but they were attacking you before September 11th in other parts of the world. We are a witness in Afghanistan to what they are and how they can hurt. You are a witness in New York. Do you forget people jumping off the 80th floor or 70th floor when the planes hit them? Can you imagine what it will be for a man or a woman to jump off that high?" he said.

In a pointed jab at Democrats just six weeks before the midterm congressional elections, Mr. Bush said that politics was behind the sudden leaking of a five-month-old document.

"Here we are, coming down the stretch in an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspapers," the president said. "Isn't that interesting? Somebody has taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes," he said of the story, which first appeared Sunday in the New York Times.

Mr. Bush charged that political opponents had disclosed only select parts of the National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), the administration's assessment on global terrorism. To counter those opponents, the president announced in the East Room that he would declassify the document "because I want you to read the documents so you don't speculate about what it says."

"We'll stop all the speculation, all the politics about somebody saying something about Iraq, somebody trying to confuse the American people about the nature of this enemy," Mr. Bush said. "Then everybody can draw their own conclusions about what the report says."

Democrats on Capitol Hill, meanwhile, failed to win a motion for a closed House session to discuss classified intelligence from the NIE. The proposal from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, was denied by a vote of 217-171.

Key Democrats issued a slew of coordinated statements calling on Mr. Bush to declassify the entire report, not just the portions that help the administration's position.

"The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts said. "The last thing we need is another selective declassification of portions of the report in a desperate attempt by the administration to avoid disclosing the truth."

"It's high time for this administration to ... acknowledge that Iraq is undermining the security" of Americans, said Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat.

Mrs. Harman, the ranking member of the House intelligence committee, also said she hears there is a second, more recent NIE report and that "its contents are grim."

Although the redacted report had several bleak assertions, it also said:

·"Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

·"The underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities and are likely to do so for the" next five years.

DOJ_NMG_0070004

·A newly increased role of Iraqis in fighting al Qaeda could lead the terror group's veteran foreign fighters to focus their efforts outside the country.

·Iran and Syria are the most active state sponsors of terror, but many other countries will be unable to prevent their resources from being exploited by terrorists.

·Four underlying factors are fueling the spread of the jihadist movement -- entrenched grievances, such as corruption, injustice, and fear of Western domination, leading to anger, humiliation, and a sense of powerlessness; the Iraq war; the slow pace of real and sustained economic, social, and political reforms in many Muslim majority nations; and pervasive anti-U.S. sentiment among most Muslims.

"Exposing the religious and political straitjacket that is implied by the jihadists' propaganda would help to divide them from the audiences they seek to persuade," the report says.

Looking ahead, the report also predicts that the loss of key leaders -- Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahri and Abu Musab Zarqawi, killed in June -- in "rapid succession" would likely split central leadership and cause the group to fracture.

Part Of Iraq Intelligence Report Is Released (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday released portions of a classified intelligence estimate that says the global jihadist movement is growing and being fueled by the war in Iraq even as it becomes more decentralized, making it harder to identify potential terrorists and prevent attacks.

The war in Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists, breeding resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and drawing new adherents to the movement, the assessment says. The growth in the number of potential terrorists is also being fed by corruption, slow-moving political reform in many Muslim countries and "pervasive" anti-American sentiment, according to the report.

The jihadist movement is potentially limited by its ultra-conservative interpretation of Islam and could be slowed by democratic reforms in the Muslim world, says the document, which reflects the collective judgment of the nation's 16 intelligence agencies. In addition, it asserts that if jihadists are perceived to be defeated in Iraq, "fewer fighters would be inspired to carry on the fight."

Still, terrorists with experience constructing roadside bombs and other deadly devices in Iraq "are a potential source" of leadership in attacks elsewhere, the report says.

President Bush took the extraordinary step of releasing portions of the classified report, which was completed in April, to counter assertions made after information from the document was leaked to media outlets over the weekend. Articles based on those leaks said the report blames the war in Iraq for worsening the global terrorist threat -- an interpretation that the administration calls a distortion of its contents.

Speaking at a White House news conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Bush angrily called the leak a political act intended to affect the upcoming midterm elections. "Somebody has taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes," he said.

The president added that it is naive to think that terrorism would be any less pervasive if the United States had not invaded Iraq, repeating his oft-made point that extremists attacked U.S. interests around the world long before the start of the war.

"My judgment is, if we weren't in Iraq, they'd find some other excuse, because they have ambitions," Bush said. "They kill in order to achieve their objectives."

Bush said he reluctantly ordered the release of the National Intelligence Estimate so people can form their own conclusions about it. "You can read it for yourself," he said. "We'll stop all the speculation, all the politics about somebody saying something about Iraq, somebody trying to confuse the American people about the nature of this enemy."

Disclosure of parts of the document, which represents the U.S. intelligence community's first formal assessment of terrorist threats since the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, did nothing to quell the partisan storm that has been brewing since the first stories about it surfaced.

Democrats have seized on the document to bolster their contention that the war in Iraq has been a debacle that has hindered broader anti-terrorism efforts, even as the administration calls Iraq the central front in a global struggle.

For the third straight day, Democrats sought to draw attention to the issue with news conferences and political maneuvers. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) moved to put the House into secret session to discuss the intelligence estimate, but the motion was defeated along party lines.

"With such a devastating and authoritative analysis of the Bush administration's failures in Iraq, the president and the Republican-controlled Congress now have a choice to make," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.). "Will they stubbornly follow a failed stay-the-course strategy that America's intelligence community has concluded makes America less safe, or will they finally admit their mistakes and change course?"

Democrats challenged the White House to release the full report. "The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.). "President Bush should declassify the entire NIE as the Republican chairman of the Senate intelligence committee has suggested so the American people can read the plain facts for themselves."

Bush announced his decision to declassify parts of the terrorism assessment after a meeting with Karzai. During the meeting, he told the Afghan leader that the United States will stand by him in his battle against a resurgent Taliban and other Islamic extremists.

"I know there are some in your country who wonder whether or not America has got the will to do the hard work necessary to help you succeed," Bush told Karzai. "We have got that will."

Bush restated his commitment to help the Afghan government as he is working to warm the increasingly frosty relations between Karzai and another critical ally in the U.S. anti-terrorism efforts, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, president of neighboring Pakistan. Bush met with Musharraf on Friday, and the three leaders are scheduled to meet and have dinner this evening at the White House.

The fruitless search for al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and the surging violence by Taliban fighters, particularly in southern Afghanistan, have contributed to friction between Karzai and Musharraf. They have blamed each other for the continued trouble, with Karzai suggesting that Musharraf is not doing enough to find bin Laden, who is widely believed to be hiding in one of the remote tribal-controlled areas of Pakistan.

Musharraf counters that Karzai has not done enough to address the grievances of Afghan people who have joined the Taliban or who support it.

Although the intelligence report offers a sobering picture of the global terrorist threat, it points to counterterrorism successes, including the killing or capture of much of the al-Qaeda leadership, and the condemnation of extremist views by "a few notable Muslim clerics."

It also says that a backlash could develop against Islamic radicals if they continue to kill fellow Muslims.

Still, the assessment warns, the underlying factors fueling the spread of jihadists' radical ideology "outweigh its vulnerabilities," a situation the report says is likely to continue for some time.

Karzai, speaking at the news conference, offered passionate support for Bush's efforts to combat terrorism. "These extremist forces were killing people in Afghanistan and around for years," he said. ". . . They came to America on September 11th, but they were attacking you before September 11th in other parts of the world. . . . Should we wait for them to come and kill us again?"

Intel Report: Iraq War Cultivating Militancy (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And David Jackson

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Iraq war has become the “cause célèbre” for Islamic militants, breeding resentment in Muslim nations and cultivating supporters worldwide, according to portions of a secret intelligence study the Bush administration released Tuesday.

The administration report also says that the militant Islamic movement is “spreading and adapting” to counterterrorism efforts and militants are “increasing both in number and geographic dispersion.”

If this trend continues, the report warns, “threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide.”

However, it also echoes President Bush's insistence on succeeding in Iraq. “Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves … to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight.”

Bush ordered more than three pages of the National Intelligence Estimate on global terrorism made public Tuesday after several days of Democratic attacks based on media reports about the classified document.

Democrats have trumpeted the report, completed in April and a reflection of the analysis of the 16-agency U.S. intelligence community, as the first admission by the administration itself that Bush's policy in Iraq has made the problem of global terrorism worse.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the report confirms “what the American people have long believed: The Bush administration's failed policies in Iraq are fueling global terrorism and making America less safe.”

The “key judgments” of the report released Tuesday cite the Iraq war for “breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement.”

DOJ_NMG_0070006

Fran Townsend, the president's counterterrorism adviser, emphasized the more positive aspects of the document to reporters. An example: U.S. counterterrorism efforts have “seriously damaged the leadership of al-Qaeda and disrupted its operations,” the report says.

As for the Iraq war's impact, Townsend said, “The fact is they were fighting us long before we were in Iraq.”

Leading Democrats such as Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., called for the entire intelligence document to be released. “The entire report should be declassified — period,” Levin said.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., tried unsuccessfully Tuesday to call for a closed House session to debate the report. The move failed, 217-171.

Iraq Is 'Cause Celebre' For Extremists (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader And Jennifer Loven

AP, September 26, 2006

The war in Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for Islamic extremists, breeding deep resentment of the U.S. that probably will get worse before it gets better, federal intelligence analysts conclude in a report at odds with President Bush's portrayal of a world growing safer.

In the bleak report, declassified and released Tuesday on Bush's orders, the nation's most veteran analysts conclude that despite serious damage to the leadership of al-Qaida, the threat from Islamic extremists has spread both in numbers and in geographic reach.

Bush and his top advisers have said the formerly classified assessment of global terrorism supported their arguments that the world is safer because of the war. But more than three pages of stark judgments warning about the spread of terrorism contrasted with the administration's glass-half-full declarations.

"If this trend continues, threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide," the document says. "The confluence of shared purpose and dispersed actors will make it harder to find and undermine jihadist groups."

The intelligence assessment, completed in April, has stirred a heated election-season argument over the course of U.S. national security in the years following the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

Virtually all assessments of the current situation were bad news. The report's few positive notes were couched in conditional terms, depending on successful completion of difficult tasks ahead for the U.S. and its allies. In one example, analysts concluded that more responsive political systems in Muslim nations could erode support for jihadist extremists.

Bush ordered a declassified section of the secret report released after several days of criticism sparked by portions that were leaked to the news media over the weekend.

At a news conference, Bush said critics who believe the Iraq war has worsened terrorism are naive and mistaken, noting that al-Qaida and other groups have found inspiration to attack for more than a decade. "My judgment is, if we weren't in Iraq, they'd find some other excuse, because they have ambitions," he said.

The unclassified document said:

· The increased role of Iraqis in opposing al-Qaida in Iraq might lead the terror group's veteran foreign fighters to refocus their efforts outside that country.

· While Iran and Syria are the most active state sponsors of terror, many other countries will be unable to prevent their resources from being exploited by terrorists.

· The underlying factors that are fueling the spread of the extremist Muslim movement outweigh its vulnerabilities. These factors are entrenched grievances and a slow pace of reform in home countries, rising anti-U.S. sentiment and the Iraq war.

· Groups "of all stripes" will increasingly use the Internet to communicate, train, recruit and obtain support.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, a U.S. ally in Washington for a Thursday meeting with Bush, found himself drawn into the political dispute. He was asked in a CNN interview about an assertion in his new book that he opposed the invasion of Iraq because he feared that it would only encourage extremists and leave the world less safe.

"I stand by it, absolutely," Musharraf said. "It has made the world a more dangerous place."

White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend took issue with one of the report's most damning conclusions: that the number of jihadists has increased.

"I don't think there's any question that there's an increase in rhetoric," she said. But "I think it's difficult to count the number of true jihadists that are willing to commit murder or kill themselves in the process."

The intelligence assessment also lays out weaknesses of the movement that analysts say must be exploited if its spread is to be slowed. For instance, they note that extremists want to see the establishment of strict Islamic governments in the Arab world — a development they say would be unpopular with most Muslims.

The report also argues that the loss of key al-Qaida leaders — Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahri and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi — in "rapid succession" would probably cause the group to fracture. Al-Zarqawi was killed in June, but the top two al-Qaida leaders have remained elusive for years.

National intelligence estimates are compilations of the best thinking of U.S. intelligence agencies, meant to provide the broadest guidance to government policymakers.

But they can be wrong. A 2002 assessment, for example, concluded that Iraq had continued its development of weapons of mass destruction, held arsenals of chemical and biological weapons and "probably will have a nuclear weapon during this decade." None of those assertions turned out to be true.

Hours before the terrorism report was made public, Democrats seized on the political ammunition. Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Carl Levin of Michigan both said release of the key findings alone wouldn't give Americans enough information, and they accused the administration of selective declassification.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., sought a rare secret session of the House to discuss the report's classified findings. Her request was rejected — 217-171 — on a nearly straight party-line vote. In an interview, she said the intelligence estimate "is not a corroboration of what the president is saying. It is a contradiction of what the president is saying."

Waging The War On Terror: Report Belies Optimistic View (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Three years ago, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote a memo to his colleagues in the Pentagon posing a critical question in the "long war'' against terrorism: Is Washington's strategy successfully killing or capturing terrorists faster than new enemies are being created?

Until Tuesday, the government had not publicly issued an authoritative answer. But the newly declassified National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism does exactly that, and it concludes that the administration has failed the Rumsfeld test.

Portions of the report appear to bolster Mr. Bush's argument that the only way to defeat the terrorists is to keep unrelenting military pressure on them. But nowhere in the assessment is any evidence to support Mr. Bush's confident-sounding assertion this month in Atlanta that "America is winning the war on terror.''

While the spread of self-described jihadists is hard to measure, the report says, the terrorists "are increasing in both number and geographic dispersion."

It says that a continuation of that trend would lead "to increasing attacks worldwide'' and that "the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities.''

On Tuesday evening the White House issued what it called a fact sheet lining up the intelligence estimate's findings with President Bush's own words in recent months, comparing, for example, the report's account of the the spread of new terror cells independent of Al Qaeda to Mr. Bush's references to "homegrown terrorists'' from Madrid to Britain.

But there is a difference in tone between Mr. Bush's public statements and the classified assessment that is unmistakable.

The report says that over the next five years "the confluence of shared purpose and dispersed actors will make it harder to find and undermine jihadist groups.''

It also suggests that while democratization and "exposing the religious and political straitjacket that is implied by the jihadists' propaganda'' might dim the appeal of the terrorist groups, those factors are now outweighed by the dangerous brew of fear of Western domination, the battle for Iraq's future and the slow pace of real economic or political progress.

Yet the intelligence report bears none of Mr. Bush's long-range optimism. Rather it dwells on Mr. Rumsfeld's darker question, which he put cheekily as, "Is our current situation such that 'the harder we work, the behinder we get?' "

Tuesday's declassified report asked a more subtle version of that question. It notes that while democratization might "begin to slow the spread'' of extremism, the "destabilizing transitions'' caused by political change "will create new opportunities for jihadists to exploit.''

And while Mr. Bush talks often of transforming the Middle East, the report speaks of the "vulnerabilities'' created by the fact that "anti-U.S. and antiglobalization sentiment is on the rise and fueling other radical ideologies.''

The result, it said, was that other groups around the world are radicalizing "more quickly, more widely and more anonymously in the Internet age.''

In short, it describes a jihadist movement that, for now, is simply outpacing Mr. Bush's counterattacks.

"I guess the overall conclusion that you get from it is that we don't have enough bullets given all the enemies we are creating,'' said Bruce Hoffman, a professor of security studies at Georgetown University.

What was most remarkable about the intelligence estimate, several experts said, was the unremarkable nature of its conclusions.

"At one level it is unsurprising stuff,'' said Paul Pillar, who was the national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia on the intelligence council until last year. "But there is definitely much there that you haven't heard the president say,'' he added, "including the role that Iraq has played'' in inspiring disaffected Muslims to join an anti-American jihadist movement.

Administration officials expressed their certainty on Tuesday that the leak of parts of the report was an example of politically inspired cherry picking, to use a term from earlier arguments over intelligence about unconventional weapons.

"Here we are, coming down the stretch in an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspapers,'' Mr. Bush said at a news conference with President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan. "Isn't that interesting? Somebody has taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes.''

And at the center of the political debate is Iraq. Frances Fragos Townsend, the director of homeland security at the White House, used a conference call with reporters on Tuesday evening to call attention to the intelligence finding that "the Iraq conflict has become a cause célèbre for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world, and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement.''

"Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves and be perceived to have failed,'' the findings went on, "we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight.''

Ms. Townsend argued that "this really underscores the President's point about the importance of our winning in Iraq,'' she said.

As a political matter, at least for the next few weeks, the intelligence findings will only fuel the argument over Iraq on both sides. Mr. Bush has grown increasingly insistent that nothing he has done in Iraq has worsened terrorism. America was not in Iraq during the first World Trade Center attack in 1993, he said, or during the bombings of the U.S.S. Cole or embassies in Africa, or on 9/11.

But that argument steps around the implicit question raised by the intelligence finding: whether postponing the confrontation with Saddam Hussein and focusing instead on securing Afghanistan, or dealing with issues like Iran's nascent nuclear capability or the Middle East peace process, might have created a different playing field, one in which jihadists were deprived of daily images of carnage in Iraq to rally their sympathizers.

Sobering Conclusions On Why Jihad Has Spread (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

In announcing yesterday that he would release the key judgments of a controversial National Intelligence Estimate, President Bush said he agreed with the document's conclusion "that because of our successes against the leadership of al-Qaeda, the enemy is becoming more diffuse and independent."

But the estimate itself posits no such cause and effect. Instead, while it notes that counterterrorism efforts have seriously damaged and disrupted al-Qaeda's leadership, it describes the spreading "global jihadist movement" as fueled largely by forces that al-Qaeda exploits but is not actively directing. They include Iraq, corrupt and unjust governments in Muslim-majority countries, and "pervasive anti-U.S. sentiment among most Muslims."

The overall estimate is bleak, with minor notes of optimism. It depicts a movement that is likely to grow more quickly than the West's ability to counter it over the next five years, as the Iraq war continues to breed "deep resentment" throughout the Muslim world, shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and cultivating new supporters for their ideology.

In describing Iraq as "the 'cause celebre' for jihadists," the document judges that real and perceived insurgent successes there will "inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere," while losses would have the opposite effect. It predicts that the elimination of al-Qaeda leaders, particularly Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahiri and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed after the estimate was completed in April, would probably leave that organization splintered into disparate groups that "for at least a time, pose a less serious threat to U.S. interests" than the current al-Qaeda structure.

On the relative bright side, the assessment notes the unpopularity with "the vast majority of Muslims" of the jihadists' brutal tactics and ultraconservative ideology. Democratic reforms and peaceful political alternatives in Muslim countries will also counter terrorist aims, it says.

But "the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities and are likely to do so for the duration of the timeframe of this estimate," the report notes. An intelligence official who was not authorized to speak on the record said the time frame is until early 2011.

The key judgments released yesterday made up slightly more than three pages of a much longer document that includes supporting background information. The judgments were intact except for what the official called "a small amount, and I emphasize small, of sensitive text" that was removed "to protect sources or address sensitivities" of allied intelligence agencies, or to "protect tactical recommendations that could become a part of future policy actions."

"What you're seeing here is really the key judgments," the official said.

Descriptions of the unseen document in media reports last weekend quoted intelligence officials as saying it described a global terrorist threat that was worsening as a result of the Iraq war. The reports led to an explosion of reaction, with the Bush administration and leading congressional Republicans saying that the published portions did not reflect the document's balanced view of successes and remaining challenges. It was no accident, Bush charged, that selective and potentially damaging parts had been "leaked" on the eve of the midterm elections.

Democrats, sensing advantage, contended that the administration had withheld a negative assessment for political reasons and demanded its release. The clamor apparently led Bush, in a meeting yesterday with Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, to authorize publication of the judgments.

Democratic claims of an administration coverup seemed less justified yesterday as it became apparent that the complete classified report had been made available to lawmakers within days of its completion in April.

Copies of the NIE were sent to the House and Senate intelligence, armed services and foreign affairs committees at the time, through normal electronic information channels available to all members, intelligence and congressional sources said. It arrived at the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence on April 26.

In the House, "there was a bit of a snafu with this particular document," said a spokesman for Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), the intelligence committee chairman. "We had a massive computer failure on our classified side." The first that the committee knew of its existence was late last week, when "it was requested specifically by a member. That was when it was found and scanned into our system."

Whether the document was ignored or disappeared into cyberspace, however, it seemed to have made little impact on Capitol Hill at the time. No one in either chamber, on either side of the aisle, requested a briefing or any further information on its conclusions until now, the sources said.

The intelligence community has had its own problems with the attention the document is now receiving. Several active and retired intelligence officials stressed that the judgments were nothing new and followed a series of similar assessments made since early 2003 about the impact of the Iraq war on global terrorism.

"This is very much mainstream stuff," said Paul R. Pillar, the CIA's national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005. "There are no surprises."

Several active and retired intelligence officials, who were not authorized to speak on behalf of the intelligence community, expressed resentment at the administration's decision to have Negroponte issue the first official reaction to the weekend reports. They said he should not have become involved in what quickly became a political battle.

Decision To Declassify (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday released a summary of the National Intelligence Estimate on terror, and we're happy to take credit for the suggestion made in our editorial yesterday, "Declassify the Terrorism NIE." But of course it was hardly rocket science to come to this decision.

In its umpteenth such "leak" story Sunday, the New York Times acknowledged the NIE was the product of 16 intel agencies, and then, based wholly on conversations, shrunk the whole document down to: The Iraq war made terrorism worse. So Mr. Bush deserves some credit in now giving the whole country the opportunity, if it is so inclined, to look at one of these multi-bureaucracy, on-the-one-hand, on-the-other-hand NIEs.

The one policymaker who appears to have been swept away on the basis of the leak is House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. After Mr. Bush made his announcement, Ms. Pelosi called for the House to go into a "closed" session -- the first since 1983 -- to discuss the NIE. We'll set aside the manifest absurdity of the House going into "secret session" to discuss a classified document being made public. The point of Ms. Pelosi's stunt is to gain traction for the Democratic campaign strategy of telescoping the national-security debate down to her party's proposal to withdraw from Iraq, thereby neutralizing the GOP's advantage when the debate is on the broader war on terror.

We reprint nearby Mr. Bush's remarks on all this at his news conference yesterday because, amid all the flak thrown up by this subject, we think it is a succinct summary of the policy course he has chosen since 9/11. On balance, we have supported that policy, just as we have supported a more robust, pro-active policy against Islamic terror since its emergence more than three decades ago at the Munich Olympics.

We will hold an election in this country in six weeks and a bigger one in 2008. The war on terror -- with or without Iraq -- will be central to those votes. If declassifying this national intelligence estimate helps voters in that decision, so much the better.

The Fine Art Of Declassification (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0070010

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

It's hard to think of a president and an administration more devoted to secrecy than President Bush and his team. Except, that is, when it suits Mr. Bush politically to give the public a glimpse of the secrets. And so, yesterday, he ordered the declassification of a fraction of a report by United States intelligence agencies on the global terrorist threat.

Mr. Bush said he wanted to release the document so voters would not be confused about terrorism or the war when they voted for Congressional candidates in November. But the three declassified pages from what is certainly a voluminous report told us what any American with a newspaper, television or Internet connection should already know. The invasion of Iraq was a cataclysmic disaster. The current situation will get worse if American forces leave. Unfortunately, neither the report nor the president provide even a glimmer of a suggestion about how to avoid that inevitable disaster.

Despite what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, have tried to make everyone believe, one of the key findings of the National Intelligence Estimate, which represents the consensus of the 16 intelligence agencies, was indeed that the war in Iraq has greatly increased the threat from terrorism by "shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives."

It said Iraq has become "the cause célèbre for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement." It listed the war in Iraq as the second most important factor in the spread of terrorism — after "entrenched grievances such as corruption, injustice and fear of Western domination." And that was before April, when the report was completed. Since then, things have got much worse. (The report was written before the killing in June of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq. The authors thought such an event would diminish the danger in Iraq. It has not.)

Mr. Bush decided to release this small, selected chunk of the report in reaction to an article on the intelligence assessment that appeared in The Times over the weekend. As a defense of his policies, it serves only to highlight the maddening circular logic that passes for a White House rationale. It goes like this: The invasion of Iraq has created an entire new army of terrorists who will be emboldened by an American withdrawal. Therefore, the United States has to stay indefinitely and keep fighting those terrorists.

By that logic, the more the United States fights, the longer the war stretches on.

It's obvious why Mr. Bush did not want this report out, and why it is taking so long for the intelligence agencies to complete another report, solely on Iraq, that was requested by Congress in late July. It's not credible that more time is needed to do the job. In 2002, the intelligence agencies completed a report on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction in less time. Mr. Bush also made selected passages of that report public to buttress his arguments for war with Iraq, most of which proved to be based on fairy tales.

Then, Mr. Bush wanted Americans to focus on how dangerous Saddam Hussein was, and not on the obvious consequences of starting a war in the Middle East. Now, he wants voters to focus on how dangerous the world is, and not on his utter lack of ideas for what to do about it.

The Big Question Democrats Are Ducking (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

No matter how you slice it, the National Intelligence Estimate warning that the Iraq war has spawned more terrorism is big trouble for President Bush and his party in this election year. It goes to the heart of Bush's argument for invading Iraq, which was that it would make America safer.

Many Democrats act as if that's the end of the discussion: A mismanaged occupation has created a breeding ground for terrorists, so we should withdraw and let the Iraqis sort out the mess. Some extreme war critics are so angry at Bush they seem almost eager for America to lose, to prove a political point. Even among mainstream Democrats, the focus is "gotcha!" rather than "what next?" That is understandable, given the partisanship of Republican attacks, but it isn't right.

The issue raised by the National Intelligence Estimate is much grimmer than the domestic political game. Iraq has fostered a new generation of terrorists. The question is what to do about that threat. How can America prevent Iraq from becoming a safe haven where the newly hatched terrorists will plan Sept. 11-scale attacks that could kill thousands of Americans? How do we restabilize a Middle East that today is dangerously unbalanced because of America's blunders in Iraq?

This should be the Democrats' moment, if they can translate the national anger over Iraq into a coherent strategy for that country. But with a few notable exceptions, the Democrats are mostly ducking the hard question of what to do next. They act as if all those America-hating terrorists will evaporate back into the sands of Anbar province if the United States pulls out its troops. Alas, that is not the case. That is the problem with Iraq -- it is not an easy mistake to fix.

An example of the Democrats' fudge on Iraq was highlighted yesterday by Post columnist Dana Milbank in his description of retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste's appearance before the Senate Democratic Policy Committee. Senators cheered Batiste's evisceration of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld but tuned out Batiste's call for more troops and more patience in Iraq, and his admonition: "We must mobilize our country for a protracted challenge."

Here's a reality check for the Democrats: There is not a single government in the Middle East, with the possible exceptions of Iran and Syria, that favors a rapid U.S. pullout from Iraq. Why? The consensus in the region is that a retreat now would have disastrous consequences for America and its allies. Yet withdrawal is the Iraq strategy you hear from most congressional Democrats, whether they call it "strategic redeployment" or something else.

I wish Democrats (and Republicans, for that matter) were asking this question: How do we prevent Iraq from becoming a failed state? Many critics of the war would argue that the worst has already happened -- Iraq has unraveled. Unfortunately, as bad as things are, they could get considerably worse. Following a rapid American pullout, Iraq could descend into a full-blown civil war, with Sunni-Shiite violence spreading throughout the region. In this chaos, oil supplies could be threatened, sending prices well above $100 a barrel. Turkey, Iran and Jordan would intervene to protect their interests. James Fallows titled his collection of prescient essays warning about the Iraq war "Blind Into Baghdad." We shouldn't compound the error by being "blind out of Baghdad," too.

The Democrat who has tried hardest to think through these problems is Sen. Joseph Biden. He argues that the current government of national unity isn't succeeding in holding Iraq together and that America should instead embrace a policy of "federalism plus" that will devolve power to the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. Iraqis are already voting for sectarian solutions, Biden argues, and America won't stabilize Iraq unless it aligns its policy with this reality. I disagree with some of the senator's conclusions, but he's asking the right question: How do we fix Iraq?

America needs to reckon with the message of the National Intelligence Estimate. Iraq has compounded Muslim rage and created a dangerous crisis for the United States. The Democrats understandably want to treat Iraq as George Bush's war and wash their hands of it. But the damage of Iraq can be mitigated only if it again becomes the nation's war -- with the whole country invested in finding a way out of the morass that doesn't leave us permanently in greater peril. If the Democrats could lead that kind of debate about security, they would become the nation's governing party. But what you hear from most Democrats these days is: Gotcha.

Justice Dept. Might Probe Leak (USAT)

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday that the Justice Department will determine whether to investigate the weekend leak of an intelligence assessment that found the war in Iraq is exacerbating terrorism.

“We have a standard procedure in place that is followed with respect to leaks of classified information,” Gonzales said when asked at a news conference whether a criminal investigation would be launched, as it was in the case of an earlier leak of warrantless eavesdropping on suspected terrorists by the National Security Agency.

“I suspect that standard procedure will be followed in this case,” he said. That procedure requires the agency that classified the document to request a criminal investigation and then to answer 11 questions about how widely the document was circulated and how much the agency is willing to divulge in court if a case is brought to trial. The answers usually determine whether an investigation is opened.

Bush Brings Afghanistan, Pakistan To The Table (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

President Bush met yesterday with Afghanistan President Harmid Karzai and last Friday with Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf. Tonight, joined by Vice President Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, he will bring both men into the old family dining room of the White House for a private chat. "It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are," Bush told reporters.

Bush said he was "kind of teasing" about watching the body language, but the intimate dinner has all the earmarks of a peace conference. Karzai and Musharraf have been sniping at each other from long-distance for months, and Rice was dispatched to Kabul and Islamabad last June to try to ease tensions.

The meeting comes as chaos is increasing in southern Afghanistan, as the Taliban grows bolder and the Afghan government's grip on power weakens. Meanwhile, Musharraf recently signed a deal with tribal chiefs that many experts believe turned over much of the area along Afghanistan's border to the control of Pakistani-based Taliban forces.

"Our interests coincide," Bush said yesterday, saying both Karzai and Musharraf want Osama bin Laden captured. "There is an understanding that by working together it is more likely that all of us can achieve common objectives, which are stable societies that are hopeful societies, that prevent extremists from stopping progress and denying people a hopeful world."

Administration officials noted that this is the second meeting Bush has brokered between the two men, and it was an effort to build a common strategy between two countries that have been at odds for decades. "When the three leaders sit down, they will not be talking about the short-term tactics," said an administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the meeting had not taken place. "They are talking about the long-term situation that helps those two countries put their relations on a sound footing."

Carlos Pascual, vice president at the Brookings Institution and former coordinator for Reconstruction and Stabilization at the State Department, said the dinner is necessary for setting the foundation for greater cooperation on their borders. He said both the Taliban and drug lords now move at will across the border, which is potentially destabilizing to both countries.

"This summit is an American effort to try to make Karzai and Musharraf recognize each other's problems," said Husain Haqqani, director of the Center for International Relations at Boston University and a former Pakistani government official and journalist. "I think what Bush hopes to achieve -- he wants to look Musharraf in the eye once again, and he wants to look Karzai in the eye -- and he wants them to make promises to one another."

But Haqqani said such personal diplomacy "can only succeed if it is followed by detailed and meticulous intelligence work and diligent diplomacy at a lower level," adding: "It's not like sitting down with two quarrelling kids and saying let's forget about it and move on. . . . Both sides have historic agendas, problems and issues."

All three presidents have faced difficulties and disappointments in their fight against the Taliban this year.

The United States has turned over the southern part of Afghanistan to NATO forces. But NATO forces have come under unexpected attack from Taliban forces, potentially delaying a reduction of U.S. troops.

Meanwhile, U.S. aid to Afghanistan has gotten crunched as it has become more difficult to fund through emergency appropriations. In the fiscal year ending this month, the administration requested $3.3 billion for Afghan reconstruction and the buildup of security forces (including a supplemental request), down from $4.35 billion in fiscal 2005. For 2007, the administration has requested $1.1 billion, though some experts feel the current crisis will require yet another emergency spending bill.

Karzai is straining to hold his country together but is losing popular support because of increasing violence, corruption, drug trafficking and an inability to demonstrate tangible progress since the fall of the Taliban. He has complained that he is being undercut by Islamabad's failure to rein in jihadists operating out of Pakistan, a charge Musharraf disputes.

"My fear is that Afghanistan is beginning to look like Iraq -- we're seeing the beginning Iraqification of Afghanistan," said Richard N. Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations and a senior State Department official in Bush's first term.

Musharraf's peace deal with tribal chiefs comes as elections are scheduled for next year in Pakistan -- and after three assassination attempts against him. The fight against the Taliban has resulted in high casualties among the Pakistani military and is unpopular among Pakistanis.

There are signs that Musharraf -- who seized power in a bloodless coup nearly seven years ago -- is maneuvering to extend his presidential term. U.S. officials have been wary about pressing Musharraf too hard, seeking to balance demands for action against extremist groups with tangible U.S. rewards, such as sales of F-16 fighter jets.

Bush Reiterates U.S. Support For Karzai (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 26, 2006

President Bush reassured Afghanistan's leader on Tuesday that the United States will stick by him five years into a democratic experiment that both men acknowledged has suffered setbacks.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai said the insurgent violence in his country can be tamed, and he called the staggering growth in Afghanistan's illegal drug production an embarrassment.

"You got a tough job," Bush told his guest at the start of a White House press conference.

"Sometimes it is," a slightly rueful Karzai agreed.

Karzai lives under constant threat of assassination and has seen his popularity slide at home while Taliban violence and illegal drug production spike. Suicide bombings, once unknown in Afghanistan, have spread to the capital Kabul.

DOJ_NMG_0070013

Afghanistan is a tough job for the Bush administration as well, as American support for the war slips and some of the hard-fought democratic gains in Afghanistan appear threatened. The White House is trying to contain the damage ahead of midterm elections this fall.

Afghanistan is suffering its heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban was toppled in late 2001 for harboring al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

According to an Associated Press count, based on reports from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials, at least 2,800 people have died so far this year in violence nationwide. The count, which includes militants and civilians, is about 1,300 more than the toll for all of 2005.

Bush lamented the killing "in cold blood" Monday of a teacher and women's rights advocate who ran an underground school for girls during Taliban rule. Safia Ama Jan's assassination underscored the increasingly brazen attacks by militants on government officials and schools in Afghanistan.

"Our country will stand with the free people of Afghanistan," Bush told Karzai, adding that he knows some in Afghanistan question American resolve to finish the job of securing and rebuilding the country.

"We have got that will," Bush said.

"Wonderful," Karzai replied.

Afghanistan stands as the best success story in the Bush administration's twin drives to rout terrorism and seed democracy in the Muslim world, with a constitutional democracy in place where the repressive Taliban militants had ruled until their ouster by a U.S.-led force.

Democrats and other critics claim that Bush took his eyes off the ball soon after, and that the war in Iraq bled resources from Afghanistan's reconstruction. Although the Bush administration vigorously denies the charge, Karzai's presence, and the joint visit on Wednesday of Karzai and Pakistani President General Pervez Musharraf, underscore the changed circumstances in Afghanistan.

The United States views both leaders and their region as crucial to stopping terrorism. U.S. officials have been irritated at recent feuding between Karzai and Musharraf over who is doing more to combat terrorism and whose country is bin Laden's likely hiding place.

"I'll be good," Karzai joked ahead of the three-way White House meeting.

Bush and Karzai said they had a frank discussion of the narcotics problem in Afghanistan, where opium cultivation rose 59 percent this year to produce a record 6,100 tons of opium — a massive 92 percent of total world supply. The Taliban had all but eradicated poppy cultivation.

The U.N.'s Office on Drugs and Crime said this month only six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces are opium-free. It said some 2.9 million people were involved in growing opium, representing 12.6 percent of the Afghan population, and that revenue from this year's harvest was predicted to hit more than $3 billion.

"It is an embarrassment to Afghanistan," Karzai said.

Militants have stepped up attacks in southern Afghanistan in recent months, including the use of roadside and suicide bombs. Most of the fighting is in the country's volatile south, where some 8,000 NATO forces took military control from the U.S.-led coalition on Aug. 1. NATO commanders are calling for up to 2,500 more troops, plus greater air support to crush the Taliban threat more quickly.

The Taliban-led militants increasingly have been using Iraqi-style tactics, including suicide, car and roadside bombings, in a bid to topple the U.S.-backed Karzai government. That includes attacks on Afghan officials, like the governor of eastern Paktia province, a friend of Karzai's, who was killed in a Sept. 10 suicide bombing.

Suicide bombings have killed 173 people in Afghanistan this year, NATO announced this month.

"Now we are at a stage of bringing more stability and trying to get rid of them forever," Karzai said of the militants.

"The desire is to do that sooner, but a desire is not always what you get," he added. "So it will take time, and we must have the patience to have the time spent on getting rid of them for good."

Karzai Questions Pakistan Peace Deal (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

On the eve of a White House effort to address rising Taliban violence in Afghanistan, Hamid Karzai, Afghanistan's president, expressed scepticism about a key agreement to stop potential insurgents from crossing the Pakistani border, saying he would "wait and see" how it would be implemented.

Referring to a recent peace agreement struck by President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan related to the North Waziristan region, which borders Afghanistan, Mr Karzai said: "My initial impression was that this was a deal signed by the Taliban – and then later I learned that they actually signed with the tribal chiefs. It will have a different meaning if it is signed with the tribal chiefs."

On Wednesday President George W. Bush will host a White House dinner for Mr Karzai and Gen Musharraf. "It will be interesting for me to watch the body language between these two leaders to determine how tense things are," Mr Bush said.

In the past few days Gen Musharraf and Mr Karzai have added to tensions. Gen Musharraf has suggested the root cause of Afghanistan's problems is its own history. On Monday Mr Karzai, blamed outsiders: "We must remove the need for groups, organisations or state entities – and here I am beginning to be very careful in my remarks – of reliance on religious radicalism as instruments of policy."

US Democrats have been seeking to refocus attention on Afghanistan as the central front of the "war on terror". At the weekend, Bill Clinton said that if he were still president, "we'd have more than 20,000 troops there".

Robert Templer, director of the Asia programme at the International Crisis Group, was pessimistic about the prospects for a breakthrough in relations at the dinner: "Musharraf and Karzai absolutely hate each other. Musharraf sees him as a jumped-up nobody who was plucked from obscurity, while he regards himself as an extraordinary historic figure, the indispensable man who saves Pakistan."

Bush Guests Are Both Allies — Of The U.S., At Least (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush tests his mediation skills today when he brings together a pair of feuding neighbors who are both essential to the U.S. war on terrorism: Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan and Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan.

The White House dinner is an attempt at trilateral negotiations for Bush, who wants the two leaders to work on clearing out Taliban insurgents who camp in Pakistan and launch attacks in Afghanistan. He also wants to focus on areas where national interests coincide, including the capture of al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

"It will be a chance for us to work on how to secure the border," Bush said Tuesday after a meeting with Karzai.

The Taliban militia gained control of nearly all of Afghanistan in 1996 after a civil war that followed the withdrawal of Soviet forces. The Taliban ruled the country with Pakistan's backing until the regime was toppled by a U.S.-led coalition in 2001, after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Relations between Karzai, the Afghan president since shortly after the fall of the Taliban, and Musharraf, his Pakistani counterpart, have been testy at best.

Karzai has accused Musharraf and Pakistan of allowing safe havens for Taliban insurgents across the border from Afghanistan. Musharraf has said Karzai needs to look within his own country to quell the rising Taliban insurgency.

That insurgent violence threatens to undermine the post-9/11 victory over the Taliban, analysts say. "Afghanistan is on the brink of becoming a failed state once again," said Beth DeGrasse, senior program officer with the U.S. Institute of Peace, a non-partisan think tank funded by Congress. "It's ours to lose again."

DeGrasse said the Bush administration deserves a share of the blame for growing problems in Afghanistan, along with NATO, which leads the international stabilization force there, and other coalition members such as Britain, Germany and Italy.

"No one's in charge," she said. "It's an uncoordinated mess."

James Dobbins, a U.S. envoy to Afghanistan from 2001 to 2002, said the United States should do more to help Afghanistan pressure Pakistan to crack down on Taliban operations in Pakistani territory.

"It's better that we be the bad cop, and Karzai be the good cop," Dobbins said, "because the Karzai government is weaker."

Dobbins also said the United States and its allies "failed to take advantage of a period of relative tranquility" after their victory in 2001. He said a resurgent Taliban is "taking advantage of a weak government and a very light international troop presence."

The U.S.-led coalition dislodged the ruling Taliban for harboring al-Qaeda, which carried out the 9/11 attacks.

About 20,000 U.S. troops remain in Afghanistan; the Pentagon has reported at least 335 American deaths since October 2001.

Bush met one-on-one with Karzai on Tuesday. They discussed a variety of challenges to the new democracy in Afghanistan, including production of opium and the illegal drug trade and the need to develop schools and hospitals.

Bush met with Musharraf on Friday, before the Pakistani leader told an audience at George Washington University that his government is in the process of "mainstreaming" religious schools in his country that breed extremism.

Karzai has protested these Islamic schools, called madrassas, in which he says young, poor children are "preached hatred and hatred alone."

DOJ_NMG_0070015

"They are told, 'Go, kill yourself in Afghanistan, commit suicide and kill as many as you can of the international community or Afghans,' " Karzai said Monday.

In another shot at his neighbors, Musharraf charged in a speech Monday that more Afghans may be helping the Taliban with its attacks: "As soon as President Karzai understands his own country's environment, the easier it will be for him."

Given his guests' rhetoric, Bush said he is looking forward to the meeting. "It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are," he said.

Get Musharraf And Karzai On Same Page (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

THE WAR ON TERROR BEGAN not as a fuzzy, open-ended concept but as a U.S. military offensive against two specific entities: Al Qaeda and the Taliban. Almost exactly five years ago, President Bush promised to drive them "from place to place until there is no refuge," and he warned that "any nation that continues to harbor or support" terrorist organizations "will be regarded by the United States as a hostile regime."

Tonight, the president will host a dinner for the heads of the two nations, Afghanistan and Pakistan, that harbor the most fighters from Al Qaeda and the Taliban. Yet these are not hostile regimes; they are important U.S. allies. In fact, if there's any hostility, it's between their presidents, Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan and Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, who have spent the last few days blaming each other for the Taliban's resurgence. Both men have a case.

Karzai's government has been losing control of Afghanistan's southern and eastern provinces, where an estimated 4,000 Taliban loyalists are operating. Suicide bombings are up — including one Tuesday that killed 18 people — and NATO forces in the country have suffered more fatalities in 2006 (about 150, including more than 30 this month) than they did from 2001 to 2003. When Musharraf says that Karzai doesn't know what's going on in his own country and that the Taliban problem "lies in Afghanistan," he has a point.

He's also trying to change the subject. Musharraf raised hackles around the world this month by signing a truce with tribal extremists on the Afghan border, essentially withdrawing Pakistan's security presence there in exchange for a promise to cease cross-border raids and reduce the influence of the Taliban there. Karzai slammed the deal as creating "terrorist sanctuaries," while Musharraf defended it as a "holistic approach" to fighting terrorism.

Where does Bush stand on all this? Not with the most confidence-inspiring of testimonials. When Musharraf "looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people, and that there won't be a Taliban and won't be Al Qaeda," the president said, "I believe him, you know?"

Bush's famously personal approach to diplomacy hasn't always worked out — the last leader into whose eyes he gazed, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, has not turned out to be a reliable ally of the U.S. or of democracy — and it will be tested tonight. Somewhere between Karzai's and Musharraf's competing versions of the truth, and within the borders of the lands they nominally control, lie the leaders of the Taliban and Al Qaeda — the original enemies in this war.

Maybe Bush can trade on his friendships with Karzai and Musharraf to come up with a coordinated plan to fight the Taliban and reduce its havens in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Otherwise, he will have to explain how those countries can continue to harbor terrorists yet not be considered hostile regimes.

Punch Lines For Pakistan's President (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The president of Pakistan has been in the United States lately to discuss matters of global importance and -- in his spare time -- to flog a memoir. Last night he appeared on Comedy Central's "Daily Show" with Jon Stewart, where he demonstrated both a sense of humor and a deep desire to sell "In the Line of Fire," which, incidentally, is now available on Amazon.com for the low, low price of $16.80, plus shipping and handling.

Following Pakistani custom, Stewart started off by offering Gen. Pervez Musharraf some tea. He also gave Musharraf the "American delicacy" known as a Twinkie.

"Is it good?" Stewart asked, then followed up with: "Where's Osama bin Laden?"

"I don't know," Musharraf replied, as the audience roared with laughter. " You know where he is? You lead on, we'll follow you."

Has it really come to this? In recent days, Musharraf has promoted his memoir, published Monday, on "Hannity & Colmes," "Today," "60 Minutes" and "Charlie Rose." He has engaged in long discussions of his country's foreign policy and endured the occasional moment of awkwardness in service to the greater good of book sales.

For example, on "Charlie Rose":

DOJ_NMG_0070016

Rose: " 'In the Line of Fire" seems an appropriate title for your memoir, does it not?"

Musharraf: "I think so. That's why I selected it."

Last night was the first appearance of any sitting president on "The Daily Show," and the best lines, as usual, belonged to Stewart. He asked his guest ("Mr. President") about two attempts on his life, which took place on the same bridge.

"I'd come up with a new way to go to work," Stewart advised his guest.

As usual, much of Stewart's humor was rooted in criticism of the U.S. administration. If Musharraf felt such jokes put him in an awkward position with his ally President Bush -- with whom he met on Friday and is scheduled to meet again today -- he did not say so. Rather, he chuckled and played along. For example, Stewart asked Musharraf if Bush ran against bin Laden in a low-level election in Pakistan, who would win. Musharraf responded that both would "lose miserably."

Stewart asked Musharraf why he hadn't made much reference in his book to America's war in Iraq.

"Is that because you felt like it was such a smart move, and has gone so well that to mention it would be gloating?" Stewart asked.

Musharraf laughed and said of the war, "It has led certainly to more extremism and terrorism around the world."

"So we're safer?" Stewart pressed.

Musharraf laughed again. "No, we're not."

Stewart also asked if Bush pays attention when Musharraf meets with him, or whether he might be, say, watching television or sleeping with his eyes open. The president of Pakistan said the president of the United States paid close attention during their last meeting.

Book tours can benefit greatly from juicy details released in advance of publication, and this has proved no less true for Musharraf's book. Last week, it came to light that Musharraf claimed that former deputy secretary of state Richard L. Armitage threatened to bomb his country "back to the Stone Age" if Pakistan did not cooperate in the war on terror. (Armitage has since denied making such a threat.)

Asked about the "Stone Age" quote at a news conference with Bush on Friday, the Pakistani president said he could not discuss his book before it came out, citing an agreement with his publisher.

"In other words, buy the book is what he's saying," Bush said.

Is there any publicity better than that? Of course -- Oprah.

Taliban Bombs Afghan Official's Compound (AP)

By Abdul Khaleq

AP, September 26, 2006

A Taliban suicide bomber killed 18 people outside a provincial governor's compound Tuesday, including several Muslim pilgrims set to travel to Mecca — another in a series of attacks directed at senior figures in President Hamid Karzai's U.S.-backed government.

The blast at the doorstep of Helmand Gov. Mohammed Daoud Safi's compound came on the same day a bombing against a NATO patrol in the Kabul area killed an Italian soldier and a child, and two weeks after militants assassinated a governor in eastern Afghanistan who had been a Karzai confidant.

Safi was inside the compound in Lashkar Gah but was not injured. Karzai was in Washington on Tuesday, meeting with President Bush.

Afghan soldiers stopped the bomber at the compound's security gate, where he detonated his explosives, said the governor's spokesman, Ghulam Muhiddin. The attacker had been walking toward a vehicle of the private military contractors who provide security for Safi, said Squadron Leader Jason Chalk, a NATO spokesman.

Nine Afghan soldiers and nine civilians were killed, said Rahmatullah Mohammdi, director of the hospital in Lashkar Gah. Seventeen people were wounded, he said.

Among the civilians waiting outside the compound were pilgrims seeking permission to travel to Mecca in Saudi Arabia, Muhiddin said. The main mosque in Lashkar Gah is across from the compound.

Qari Yousaf Ahmadi, who claims to be a spokesman for Taliban affairs in southern Afghanistan, contacted The Associated Press and said the militant group was responsible for the attack. Ahmadi's exact ties to the militants are not known.

Militants have stepped up attacks in southern Afghanistan in recent months, including the use of roadside and suicide bombs. Twenty-one people were killed in Lashkar Gah in August by a suicide bomber, and last week militants killed 19 construction workers riding on a bus in neighboring Kandahar province.

Although Muhiddin said he believed "innocent civilians and Afghan soldiers" were the targets Tuesday, the blast appeared to be another broadside fired toward a senior government figure.

Violent extremists have also been increasingly targeting Afghan officials, including the governor of eastern Paktia province — a friend of Karzai's — who was killed in a Sept. 10 suicide bombing. A women's rights activist, who was the Kandahar provincial director for Afghanistan's Ministry of Women's Affairs, was killed Monday in a drive-by shooting.

Karzai sent Safi, a former member of Afghanistan's National Security Council and like the president an ethnic Pashtun, to Helmand province last year to take over a region in the heart of the booming drug trade and the Taliban resurgence. Helmand's former governor, Sher Mohammed Akhunzada, has been accused of having links to drug gangs; he is now a lawmaker.

Two people were detained for questioning after Tuesday's attack on the NATO patrol five miles south of Kabul.

A remote-control bomb planted under a bridge detonated when a three-vehicle military convoy passed by, said Ali Shah Paktiawal, the city's police criminal director.

Chief Corp. Maj. Giorgio Langella was killed in the blast, and five Italian soldiers were wounded, two seriously, the Italian Defense Ministry said in Rome. A child riding in a car behind the NATO convoy was killed, NATO said. Four other civilians in the car were wounded.

Italy has some 1,600 troops in the 20,000-strong NATO-led force in Afghanistan.

An Italian soldier died and two were injured on Sept. 20 when their armored vehicle overturned on a steep incline near Kabul. Four Italian soldiers were wounded Sept. 8 by a roadside bomb in the western Farah province.

Although Taliban-linked militants have stepped up their attacks across Afghanistan the last several months, attacks in Kabul are still far rarer than in the country's south — the focus of the most intense fighting since the ouster of the Taliban regime in a U.S.-led military campaign five years ago.

Attacks in the capital are mostly aimed at foreign military troops. On Sept. 8, a suicide car bomber rammed into a U.S. Humvee, killing 16 people, including two U.S. soldiers. That attack was Kabul's deadliest since the 2001 toppling of the Taliban.

In other violence, seven armed men died in Paktika province Monday when an explosives vest one of them was carrying detonated in the Yousef Kheil district, said Gov. Mohammad Akram Akhpelwak. There were no other casualties.

A suicide bomber on foot killed himself Tuesday while trying to attack a vehicle carrying security workers traveling to the border in Khost province, in eastern Afghanistan, said Gen. Mohammad Ayub, the provincial police chief. No one else was wounded in the blast, he said.

Attacks In Afghanistan Grow More Frequent And Lethal (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan, Sept. 26 — Afghanistan suffered two deadly bombings on Tuesday that killed 20 people, providing another sign of the increasing size and power of suicide attacks and roadside bombs by insurgents.

The more devastating attack occurred when the police stopped a suicide bomber as he approached a security checkpoint near the governor's office in Lashkar Gah, in southern Helmand Province, and he detonated explosives strapped to his chest.

The bomber killed 18 people, 6 of them policemen and soldiers. The rest of the casualties, including a woman, were civilians who had gathered at a central mosque to sign up for the Hajj pilgrimage to Mecca, said the police chief of Helmand, Gen. Muhammad Nabi Mullahkhel.

South of Kabul, the capital, a bomb planted under a bridge struck a NATO military vehicle, killing an Italian soldier and an Afghan child nearby.

The suicide attack in Lashkar Gah was the second there in a month, and one of more than 60 in Afghanistan this year, United Nations officials said. The tactic was rarely used by insurgents a year ago.

Civilians increasingly have been paying the price of the more frequent and devastating attacks. More than 150 civilians have been killed by suicide bombings this year, the head of the United Nations mission in Afghanistan, Tom Koenigs, said recently, before the attacks on Tuesday.

The bombings, once relatively ineffective, now increasingly claim casualties in the double digits. On Aug. 3, a suicide bomber struck in the district bazaar of Panjwai, near Kandahar, killing 21. A suicide attack killed another 21 people in Lashkar Gah on Aug. 28.

On Sept. 18, a bomber in Kabul rammed his car into an American military convoy, causing a huge explosion that ripped apart an armored Humvee and killed 16 people, 2 of them American soldiers and the rest passers-by.

The use of roadside bombs has also increased. Two powerful bombs were laid on roads close to Kabul in recent weeks.

The bomb bomb near the capital, positioned under a bridge less than 10 miles south of Kabul, also wounded five soldiers and five civilians, according to officials. The hurt civilians were driving in a car behind the convoy.

Military and intelligence officials in Afghanistan are divided about whether the tactics and technology used in suicide bombings and roadside bombs have been brought from Iraq, where they are so common, or if insurgents here are simply copying those tactics.

Canadian and American soldiers on operations in the southern province of Kandahar last week said they saw a clear connection with tactics in Iraq. One called it the "Iraqization" of the insurgency here, whether through personal contacts or the Internet.

Canadian soldiers, for instance, said they recently found a scarecrow by a roadside rigged with explosives. In Iraq, insurgents have rigged corpses beside roads with explosives.

Suicide bombers are also now using explosive vests, which are far more powerful than before, the soldiers said. In another bombing on Sept. 18, a man on a bicycle who rode up to Canadian soldiers handing out gifts to children in the southern village of Char Kota, in Pashmul, had on a vest rigged with explosives. The detonation killed four soldiers and injured several more who were in full body armor, as well as wounding two dozen children.

There are signs of more careful training as well. The bomber who killed the governor of Paktia Province on Sept. 10 managed to penetrate security by claiming to have a letter of recommendation addressed to the governor.

He then threw himself onto the hood of the governor's car, detonating his explosive vest up against the windshield and killing everyone inside the car, according to government and military officials.

The high level of civilian casualties has appeared to cause a split in the Taliban, with some apparently opposed to suicide bombing, NATO military officials said.

Taliban fighters who occupied the Panjwai district in July and August tried to distance themselves from the suicide bombing that killed so many civilians and damaged shops in August. They posted leaflets saying that outsiders, or "foreign Taliban," were responsible for the suicide bombing and that such violators would receive capital punishment.

"They were worried about their image," said Olli-Pekka Nissinen, a NATO media operations officer.

Villagers and farmers in the Panjwai area, where heavy fighting has taken place over the past three weeks, also blamed foreigners or outsiders for the suicide bombing, and said that ordinary Taliban were just intent on fighting NATO forces.

A witness of the Sept. 18 suicide bombing in nearby Pashmul, Khair Muhammad, whose two daughters were wounded in the blast, said the bomber appeared to be an Arab.

Talabani: Iraq Won't Have Civil War (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 26, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani disputed on Tuesday reports of growing violence in his country and declared, "I can assure you there will be no civil war."

At a news conference, Talabani also leveled a warning to Iraq's neighbors that interference will not be tolerated.

"Iraq is not so weak our neighbors can do anything and we will remain silent," Talabani said after delivering an upbeat speech at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

In Baghdad, the Iraqi capital, gunmen assaulted two Sunni mosques and sprayed bullets into the homes of Sunni Muslims. Three people were killed and 15 wounded.

Police in the capital also found the bodies of 23 men apparently slain by sectarian death squads.

Talabani projected a vastly different account of the security situation. He said it had improved since last year when many areas were in the control of terrorists.

Last year, he said by way of example, there were 10 to 14 car bombings a day in Baghdad and this year one to four.

Most of the fighting is centered in Baghdad, and since most media are in the capital they provide a slanted picture of Iraq's situation, Talabani said.

"The media is only focusing on the negative and exaggerating it," he said.

Talabani declined, meanwhile, to specify which neighboring countries were the intended target of his warning against interference. "We are asking all our neighbors not to interfere in our internal affairs," he said.

"We cannot tolerate more interference of our neighbors," he said at another point, with evident anger.

Talabani also denounced as "a big lie" a report last week by Manfred Nowak, the U.N. special investigator on torture, that torture in Iraq may be worse than it was under Saddam Hussein, with militias, terror groups and government forces disregarding rules on the humane treatment of prisoners.

Talabani said Iraq's constitution provides human-rights safeguards.

DOJ_NMG_0070019

On Capitol Hill, meanwhile, Talabani told a group of six senators that setting a deadline for withdrawal of U.S. troops would be a tragedy for Iraq as it works to build its military and police forces, Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., said in a conference call with reporters.

Pulling out now would "encourage the militias and the enemies of a free and independent and unified Iraq," Lieberman quoted Talabani as saying.

However, Lieberman said, "he said, 'We look forward to the day when we can take over ourselves, and most of the American troops can go home.'"

Distrust Breaks The Bonds Of A Baghdad Neighborhood (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

BAGHDAD -- It began with a dispute over the price of ice and erupted into full-scale violence over the sighting of two strange cars cruising the neighborhood. A week later, the scars of sectarian strife were visible everywhere in Tobji.

Short concrete blocks and long coils of razor wire barred entry into every block. Stores stood shuttered, and black banners mourned the dead. Women and children stayed inside their sunbaked houses. And young men stood on corners, their eyes darting suspiciously at every car that drove through their divided neighborhood.

The scars were also heard in the perplexed voice of Ibrahim Abdul Sattar, a Sunni Arab whose mother and wife, as well as three-quarters of his friends, are Shiite Muslims. He and so many others in Tobji are trapped in a war that is reshaping the identity of their neighborhood and their shared way of life.

"We have been living together for 30 years. We've never had such tensions like this before," he said. "We are fearing for our future."

Across the capital, mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods have become battlegrounds of sectarian hostilities. West of the Tigris River, hundreds of Shiite families have fled mostly Sunni neighborhoods such as Amiriyah and Ghazaliya. In the east, hundreds of Sunni families have fled mostly Shiite areas such as Amin and Shaab. Increasingly, the strife is spreading into central Baghdad. In still-mixed neighborhoods such as Tobji, nestled in north-central Baghdad, political and militant Islam is clashing with tribal customs and a shared Arab and Muslim identity that have bonded Sunnis and Shiites for decades.

The latest conflagration in Tobji, which is officially named Salaam, or peace, began Aug. 8. What unfolded over a period of 10 days illuminates the way sectarian tension spreads in mixed neighborhoods, as well as the murky forces that drive it. This article is based on interviews with Sunni and Shiite residents, Sunni tribal elders, Shiite militiamen and Iraqi army commanders as the events unfolded in Tobji, as well as visits to the area during and after the tensions.The Prelude

Abu Mohammed, a short man with a trim beard and crooked teeth, has spent his whole life in Tobji. He is a Shiite; his next-door neighbor was a Sunni. Growing up, sect never mattered. He played, studied and socialized with Sunnis.

Now, sect means everything. After the ouster of President Saddam Hussein, Abu Mohammed joined the Mahdi Army, the militia of radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose shadowy death squads are widely believed to exact street justice under the cloak of Islam, something Sadr has denied. As the chaos deepened, Abu Mohammed became more suspicious of his Sunni neighbors, particularly after the bombing of a Shiite holy shrine in Samarra in February.

Three months ago, Mahdi Army militiamen erected checkpoints at each end of Tobji's main thoroughfare, lined with shops and small restaurants. The Iraqi army soldiers who patrol the area and are widely believed to be sympathetic to Shiites did nothing to stop them, residents said.

At the checkpoints, the militiamen targeted members of the Sunni Egheidat tribe. They demanded to see residents' identification cards before they could enter their own neighborhood. The militiamen viewed the Egheidat as sympathetic to Sunni radicals who have waged a three-year insurgency against Iraq's Shiite-led government and its American backers.

"The imam's army is a dogmatic people's army to keep order, prevent killings and chaos, and to spread Islam," said Abu Mohammed, who asked that his full name not be used. "The Egheidat are terrorists."

Moments later, as if to demonstrate his influence, he pulled out an Iraqi Interior Ministry identification card, showing his real name and his police commando unit, the Wolf Brigade. The card was evidence that members of the Mahdi Army had infiltrated the Interior Ministry's elite forces, as has long been suspected. Then he flashed his license to legally carry a firearm.

Soon after the checkpoints went up, the Egheidat began to arm themselves. They had lived in the neighborhood for decades, and controlled the ice factories and a cooking oil distributorship. They believed fervently in the Sunni interpretation of Islam, in which the caliphs who succeeded the prophet Muhammad are seen as Islam's rightful rulers.

"We've lived with Egheidat for 50 years," said Abdul Sattar, who is not an Egheidat. "I'm not sure if they are making bombs. They are a religious people, and they are always praying. This is a reason they are targeted, maybe."

Last month, Abu Mohammed and his comrades confronted an Egheidat businessman who sold ice -- a precious commodity in a city plagued by furnace-like heat, constant electricity outages and soaring prices for fuel to power generators.

"He was selling a block of ice for 20,000 dinars. Its actual price is 5,000 dinars," said Abu Mohammed. "When we told him he should lower the price, he slapped one of our guys. We didn't like that. So we beat him up as punishment."

Shortly afterward, unfamiliar cars started to drive toward the Egheidat section of Tobji, Abu Mohammed said. Then came the rumors: The cars were to be used for drive-by attacks or suicide bombings.Day One

Rumors filled the streets: A BMW and a Land Cruiser were making their way along the sweltering streets of Tobji toward the green and tan Haji Zeidan mosque, run by the Egheidat. Word of the unfamiliar cars soon reached Sadr's local office, located opposite a parking lot filled with junked cars on the main road in Tobji. A group of Mahdi Army militiamen, including Abu Mohammed, headed toward the mosque. Outside, clutching their weapons, they called out to the mosque guards.

"We told them they should hand over the strange cars so that we could hand them over to the Iraqi army," Abu Mohammed recalled. "Then we came under heavy gunfire."

A battle erupted, forcing the militiamen to retreat. Two of their men were wounded. Egheidat community leaders gave a different account. They said the militiamen taunted the guards with slurs, then shot at their guard on the roof. Forty to 50 gunmen emerged firing, but only over the heads of the militiamen.

"We were on rooftops, and they were on the street. If we wanted to kill them, then none of them would have left alive," said Muhammed Jamal al-Egheidi, 40, a leader of the Egheidat tribe.Day Two

At checkpoints, the Mahdi Army men took into custody eight Egheidat men and beat them with rubber-coated electrical cables, several Egheidat tribal leaders said. Abu Mohammed, who often did duty at the checkpoints, did not deny the men were taken, but he said they were handed over to Iraqi soldiers.

"In the streets, we set up checkpoints with the Iraqi army," he said. "I am there to serve the neighborhood. I would point people out -- only those who hurt Iraq."

That day, a group of concerned tribal elders and businessmen, both Sunnis and Shiites, met to discuss ways to stop the violence from escalating.

"They came and said this violence will never end unless we reconcile," Egheidi said. "Many of them were Shia in the neighborhood, and they knew us very well. We knew they were on our side."

The group decided to hold a tribal reconciliation gathering, a traditional mechanism used to solve conflict among Iraq's tribes. The grievances of both the Egheidat and the Mahdi Army would be addressed through negotiations and the payment of fasil , or blood money. Both sides agreed to meet the next day.Day Three

An hour before the meeting, gunmen attacked a Mahdi Army checkpoint and killed four of its men, including Abu Mohammed's 16-year-old nephew, Omar. The Mahdi Army immediately blamed the Egheidat.

"They killed our men, and then kicked them to see if they were still alive," said Abu Mohammed. "Then they shot them in the head to make sure they were dead."

Abu Mohammed recalled that he and his men ran straight to the Egheidat area. "We opened fire on them," he said matter-of-factly. A gun battle followed. "They were shooting at us from the mosque. This is God's home. They defiled the house of God. So we shot at it with an RPG, and the minaret was hit."

The fighting raged until U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered the fray and sealed off the neighborhood.

"The militiamen, when they saw the American army, they fled at extraordinary speed," said Abdul Sattar, who was too afraid to leave his house to go to work this day. "They jumped into houses. One woman saw one of them in her house and fainted."

Abu Mohammed described jumping into houses as a tactical move that the Mahdi Army often uses because its members know U.S. troops rarely remain long inside a neighborhood. "We didn't want to confront them," he said.

When Abu Mohammed returned to his home, enraged, he fired at the houses of his Sunni neighbors, even though they were not Egheidat. A Sunni neighbor, on hearing the gunfire, came out clutching an AK-47 assault rifle.

"I shot at him," said Abu Mohammed. "He bent down, and the bullet struck his mother in the arm. Then I walked out into the neighborhood and shouted: 'Any Sunni I see in the street is my enemy. No Sunni will stay in Tobji. The Sunnis are infidels.' " Egheidat tribal leaders denied any involvement in the attack on the checkpoint, blaming radical Sunni insurgents seeking to deepen the divisions in Tobji.

"We'll pay 10 times the amount -- not four times, as tradition dictates -- if what they are saying is true," Egheidi said, referring to blood money. The reconciliation meeting was postponed. That night and the following day, the streets lay silent.Day Five

Fierce gun battles between the Mahdi Army and the Egheidat erupted again. Once more, U.S. and Iraqi troops entered the neighborhood, and the fighting subsided.

The tribal reconciliation meeting was held at the neighborhood municipal council office under the protection of the Iraqi army, which cordoned off the office with its tan camouflage Humvees and soldiers.

With U.S. soldiers by his side, Brig. Gen. Abdul Jaleel Kahlaiaf, commander of the Iraqi 6th Division's 1st Brigade, met with the parties. Such neighborhood reconciliation meetings, he said in an interview later, are crucial in helping to defuse Baghdad's sectarian violence. He also denied that his mostly Shiite forces were sympathetic to the Mahdi Army.

The Mahdi Army demanded that the Egheidat hand over the men who wounded their two militiamen, as well as their weapons, and pay a fasil of 4 million dinars, or $2,700, to each of the families of the wounded.

The matter of the four dead Mahdi Army militiamen was not discussed, since the identities of their killers were unknown, said Fadil Khalifa Jassam, a Sunni imam who served as one of the mediators. "There will be another tribal gathering for the four killed," he said. At the end of the meeting, the Egheidat were given time to consider the Mahdi Army's demands, and an atwa , or truce, was declared for three days.Day Six

On the first day of the truce, Egheidi, the Sunni tribal leader, was worried. "The Mahdi Army is now going around the neighborhood saying they are going to eliminate us," he said. "We are not going to work. We're afraid we'll get captured at the checkpoints. At the market, they are not selling to Egheidat anymore. They say, 'You are terrorists.' How can we be terrorists when we stay inside our homes?"

Then he added, "How can you reconcile when you are sending people into our neighborhood to shoot us?"

The conversation turned to the U.S. troops. A year ago, Egheidi refused to accept the U.S. occupation. Now, after watching the violence in Tobji unfold, he said he has concluded that Shiite extremists are the greater enemy.

"When the Americans are in my neighborhood, I can put my head in my pillow and sleep," said Egheidi. "If they stay, there will be security. If they leave, there will not only be civil war. There will be a house-to-house war."Day Seven

On the second day of the truce, Abu Mohammed, the Sadr militiaman, was angry. "Our wounds are still fresh," he said as he puffed on a cigarette. Coloring his language was a sense of entitlement and a belief that the U.S. occupation had ruptured the cohesiveness of the sects in his community.

"Before the entrance of the Americans, we lived like brothers," Abu Mohammed said. "They married us. We married them. Saddam's regime was unjust but he didn't create divisions. We didn't have civil war. . . . The American intention is to dismember Islam."

His thoughts soon turned back to Tobji, and his nephew Omar. He wanted the Egheidat to leave. "We will not take their houses by force," he said. "They will sell them and buy in other areas. The important thing is they get out of my neighborhood."

At 4 p.m., the normally busy streets lay quiet.Day Eight

At 10 a.m., the Mahdi Army and the Egheidat reached an agreement. The Egheidat would hand over some weapons to the Mahdi Army and pay the fasil. Each side would stay out of the other's section of Tobji in order not to inflame tensions. All sides hugged and congratulated, Jassam recalled. It seemed as if the Tobji they knew had united. "Even up to this moment, we still have feelings of brotherhood," said Amar Ali, a trader.

"It was a success," said Kahlaiaf, the Iraqi army commander. Sunni and Shiite mosques in Tobji announced the news over loudspeakers. Egheidat residents came out of their homes and handed out sweets and juice to their neighbors. Then "they brought a truckload of ice cubes and distributed to the people -- for free," said Ali Laith, 19, a tall, slim student. Later in the day, shops reopened and residents ventured onto the streets.

But at 7:55 p.m., a mortar shell struck the parking lot with the battered old cars less than 100 yards from the Sadr office. It landed on a rusting Volkswagen Passat, witnesses said, killing an elderly man and a child, and wounding others.

"There are some people who don't like for things to be quiet in Tobji," said Abu Ahmed, a shopkeeper whose store was less than 200 yards from where the shell hit. He asked that his full name not be used because of the potential for more violence.

That night, six Egheidat elders visited the Mahdi Army's representatives to assure them they were not behind the attack.Day Nine

At 10:40 a.m., Nabil Ibrahim was open for business. Two women in black abayas and a girl were in his store. Did he think Tobji would slide back into violence?

"It's in God's hands, inshallah ," Ibrahim said. As he spoke, Haidar Muhammad Latif, 22, entered the store. He was short, with close-cropped hair, and wore a blue shirt. And he soon revealed his allegiance: "We are from Sayyid Moqtada Sadr's army," he said, using an honorific for the cleric.

He asserted that the mortar attack had targeted the militia and proclaimed "God is great" because the mortar did not hit the Sadr office. Asked who was behind the attack, he answered without hesitation. "I expect it was the Egheidat who did it," he said. "I wish I could trust them."

Two blocks away, a funeral tent was erected next to the parking lot.Day 10

DOJ_NMG_0070022

On this day, Abu Mohammed, still angry, was thinking about revenge. He, too, believed the Egheidat had fired the mortar two days before. But now he had a more pressing goal. He said he and his comrades had identified three Sunnis, including one Egheidat, who they believed were involved in the killings of the four members of the Mahdi Army, including his nephew. Now, he said, he was planning to create a death squad to carry out the justice the tribal negotiations didn't bring.

Asked how he knew the three men were guilty, Abu Mohammed said witnesses told him that the men were inside one of the cars that rushed the checkpoint. "We only take blood for blood," he said.

Asked if the three men lived in Tobji, Abu Mohammed replied: "Yes, they are our neighbors. Now their houses are empty, and they have fled."

Most Iraqis Favor Immediate U.S. Pullout, Polls Show (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Leaders' Views Out of Step With Public

BAGHDAD, Sept. 26 -- A strong majority of Iraqis want U.S.-led military forces to immediately withdraw from the country, saying their swift departure would make Iraq more secure and decrease sectarian violence, according to new polls by the State Department and independent researchers.

In Baghdad, for example, nearly three-quarters of residents polled said they would feel safer if U.S. and other foreign forces left Iraq, with 65 percent of those asked favoring an immediate pullout, according to State Department polling results obtained by The Washington Post.

Another new poll, scheduled to be released on Wednesday by the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland, found that 71 percent of Iraqis questioned want the Iraqi government to ask foreign forces to depart within a year. By large margins, though, Iraqis believed that the U.S. government would refuse the request, with 77 percent of those polled saying the United States intends keep permanent military bases in the country.

The stark assessments, among the most negative attitudes toward U.S.-led forces since they invaded Iraq in 2003, contrast sharply with views expressed by the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Last week at the United Nations, President Jalal Talabani said coalition troops should remain in the country until Iraqi security forces are "capable of putting an end to terrorism and maintaining stability and security."

"Only then will it be possible to talk about a timetable for the withdrawal of the multinational forces from Iraq," he said.

Recent polls show many Iraqis in nearly every part of the country disagree.

"Majorities in all regions except Kurdish areas state that the Multi-National Force-Iraq (MNF-I) should withdraw immediately, adding that the MNF-I's departure would make them feel safer and decrease violence," concludes the 20-page State Department report, titled "Iraq Civil War Fears Remain High in Sunni and Mixed Areas." The report was based on 1,870 face-to-face interviews conducted from June 26 to July 6.

The Program on International Policy Attitudes poll, which was conducted over the first three days of September for WorldPublicOpinion.org, found that support among Sunnis for a withdrawal of all U.S.-led forces within six months dropped to 57 percent in September from 83 percent in January.

"There is a kind of softening of Sunni attitudes toward the U.S.," said Steven Kull, director of PIPA and editor of WorldPublicOpinion.org. "But you can't go so far as to say the majority of Sunnis don't want the U.S. out. They do. They're just not quite in the same hurry as they were before."

The PIPA poll, which has a margin of error of 3 percent, was carried out by Iraqis in all 18 provinces who conducted interviews with more than 1,000 randomly selected Iraqis in their homes.

Using complex sampling methods based on data from Iraq's Planning Ministry, the pollsters selected streets to conduct interviews. They then contacted every third house on the left side of the road. When they selected a home, the interviewers then collected the names and birth dates of everyone who lived there and polled the person with the most recent birthday.

Matthew Warshaw, a senior research manager at D3 Systems, which helped conduct the poll, said he didn't think Iraqis were any less likely to share their true opinions with pollsters than Americans. "It's a concern you run up against in Iowa or in Iraq," he said. "But for the most part we're asking questions that people want to give answers to. People want to have their voice heard." The greatest risk, he said, was the safety of the interviewers. Two pollsters for another Iraqi firm were recently killed because of their work.

The State Department report did not give a detailed methodology for its poll, which it said was carried out by an unnamed Iraqi polling firm. Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said he could not comment on the public opinion surveys.

The director of another Iraqi polling firm, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he feared being killed, said public opinion surveys he conducted last month showed that 80 percent of Iraqis who were questioned favored an immediate withdrawal. Eight-five percent of Sunnis in that poll supported an immediate withdrawal, a number virtually unchanged in the past two years, except for the two months after the Samarra bombing, when the number fell to about 70 percent, the poll director said.

"The very fact that there is such a low support for American forces has to do with the American failure to do basically anything for Iraqis," said Mansoor Moaddel, a professor of sociology at Eastern Michigan University, who commissioned a poll earlier this year that also found widespread support for a withdrawal. "It's part of human nature. People respect authority and power. But the U.S. so far has been unable to establish any real authority."

Interviews with two dozen Baghdad residents in recent weeks suggest one central cause for Iraqi distrust of the Americans: They believe the U.S. government has deliberately thrown the country into chaos.

The most common theory heard on the streets of Baghdad is that the American military is creating a civil war to create an excuse to keep its forces here.

"Do you really think it's possible that America -- the greatest country in the world -- cannot manage a small country like this?" Mohammad Ali, 42, an unemployed construction worker, said as he sat in his friend's electronics shop on a recent afternoon. "No! They have not made any mistakes. They brought people here to destroy Iraq, not to build Iraq."

As he drew on a cigarette and two other men in the store nodded in agreement, Ali said the U.S. government was purposely depriving the Iraqi people of electricity, water, gasoline and security, to name just a few of the things that most people in this country lack.

"They could fix everything in one hour if they wanted!" he said, jabbing his finger in the air for emphasis.

Mohammed Kadhem al-Dulaimi, 54, a Sunni Arab who used to be a professional soccer player, said he thought the United States was creating chaos in the country as a pretext to stay in Iraq as long as it has stayed in Germany.

"All bad things that are happening in Iraq are just because of the Americans," he said, sipping a tiny cup of sweet tea in a cafe. "When should they leave? As soon as possible. Every Iraqi will tell you this."

Many Iraqi political leaders, on the other hand, have been begging the Americans to stay, especially since the February bombing of a Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra, which touched off the current round of sectarian reprisal killings between Sunnis and Shiites.

The most dramatic about-face came from Sunni leaders, initially some of the staunchest opponents to the U.S. occupation, who said coalition forces were the only buffer preventing Shiite militias from slaughtering Sunnis.

Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the outspoken Sunni speaker of parliament who this summer said that "the U.S. occupation is the work of butchers," now supports the U.S. military staying in Iraq for as long as a decade.

"Don't let them go before they have corrected what they have done," he said in an interview this month. "They should stay for four years. This is the minimum. Maybe 10 years."

Particularly in mixed neighborhoods here in the capital, some Sunnis say the departure of U.S. forces could trigger a genocide. Hameed al-Kassi, 24, a recent college graduate who lives in the Yarmouk district of Baghdad, worried that rampages by Shiite militias could cause "maybe 60 to 70 percent of the Sunnis to be killed, even the women, old and the young."

"There will be lakes of blood," Kassi said. "Of course we want the Americans to leave, but if they do, it will be a great disaster for us."

In a barbershop in the capital's Karrada district Tuesday afternoon, a group of men discussed some of the paradoxical Iraqi opinions of coalition troops. They recognized that the departure of U.S.-led forces could trigger more violence, and yet they harbored deep-rooted anger toward the Americans.

"I really don't like the Americans who patrol on the street. They should all go away," said a young boy as he swept up hair on the shop's floor. "But I do like the one who guards my church. He should stay!"

Sitting in a neon-orange chair as he waited for a haircut, Firas Adnan, a 27-year-old music student, said, "I really don't know what I want. If the Americans leave right now, there is going to be a massacre in Iraq. But if they don't leave, there will be more problems. From my point of view, though, it would be better for them to go out today than tomorrow."

He paused for a moment, then said, "We just want to go back and live like we did before."

Saddam's Trial Has Shouting, Then He Is Removed (MCT)

By Mark Brunswick

McClatchy Newspapers, September 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - For the second time in as many days in his genocide and war crimes trial, former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was ordered tossed from the courtroom on Tuesday, sparking an eruption from the other defendants and briefly shutting down the court.

DOJ_NMG_0070024

"You let the prosecutor comment and I'm not? Is this the justice you exercise? Damn this justice you are trying to serve in this court," Saddam shouted at the chief judge, the second to preside over the trial since it began in August.

"Don't use bad words," the judge shouted back, ordering guards to surround Saddam and escort him out of the courtroom.

Two other defendants were led out of the courtroom after Saddam, who barely concealed a smile on his face as he made his way to the door.

Saddam and his six co-defendants have been on trial since Aug. 21 for their roles in a 1987-1988 crackdown on Kurdish rebels that has become known as the Anfal campaign, a reference to a verse in the Quran meaning roughly "the spoils of war."

They are accused of killing as many 180,000 people, mostly civilians in a military offensive that included the use of chemical weapons. The defendants could face the death penalty if convicted.

Saddam was ordered removed from the trial on Monday when he protested the court's appointment of lawyers to defend him. His own defense team boycotted the proceedings as a protest over the appointment of Mohammed Oreibi al Khalifa as the presiding judge.

The latest exchange, watched on television by entertainment-deprived Iraqis like it was a morning soap opera, fueled rumors that Khalifa might soon be sacked and a third judge appointed. While no one was claiming to be pining for the days of Saddam's regime, it also seemed to give the average Iraqi a brief in-your-face respite to the sectarian violence and lack of services that make up today's Iraq.

Things started rocky on Tuesday when Saddam entered the court and immediately asked to leave. Khalifa began a long speech, talking about the Iraqi justice system and how it was developed over centuries.

"If you want to defend yourself, submit your arguments. We are a court. It has no connection to politics. When you want to leave the legal framework, we will not allow you," he said. "Try to cope with the session requirements and you will see how much time you will get to defend yourself. Humiliation and abuse of the court will take you nowhere."

At that point, Saddam pulled a piece of paper from his Quran and began reading. The judge ordered microphones turned off as Saddam continued reading for 14 minutes. After the reading, the judge and Saddam exchanged what appeared to be often heated words toward each other, each pointing fingers and shaking fists.

Saddam stood up during testimony of the second witness of the day, a Sulaimaniyah resident in his mid-60s who talked of having his village destroyed in the Anfal campaign. Khalifa asked him if he had a question. Saddam said he did not.

"OK, sit down," the judge ordered. That started the fireworks.

"You are a defendant and I'm a judge," Khalifa said as Saddam interrupted. "Shut up. No one talk. The court has decided to eject Saddam Hussein from court."

As Saddam was led from the room, the other defendants, almost on cue, stood and demanded to leave as well. The judge ordered them to sit, but they refused. "I don't how to deal with you," the judge shouted.

Defendant Sultan Hashim Ahmad al Tai a former defense minister, shouted back in anger, "Don't shout at us. We are not children. We defended this country. It is not you who is teaching us to be polite. We are teaching you."

At that point, he was escorted out, continuing to yell.

The next, Hussein Rashid Mohammed, a former chief of staff of the Iraqi Army, said: "I served Iraq for 44 years. If you want to execute us, execute us. You can't insult us with these charges. We have dignity." He was removed, with two guards very physically holding both his arms.

The other defendants remained standing as guards surrounded their cages in the courtroom. The judge ordered the curtains to the press gallery closed and a recess. When the afternoon session resumed, the defendants' cages were empty. The court recessed until Oct. 9.

Judge Postpones Hussein Trial As Lawyers Continue Boycott (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 26 — After throwing Saddam Hussein out of court again, the judge hearing the deposed dictator's genocide trial abruptly postponed the case until Oct. 9, so Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants could consult with lawyers who are boycotting the trial or find new ones.

The court session on Tuesday degenerated into a shouting match with the angry judge, Muhammad al-Uraibi, barking at Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants to "sit down" and "shut up." The men, charged with killing tens of thousands of Kurds in 1988, shouted back that the judge was not respecting them and had already decided their guilt.

The trial of Mr. Hussein has been in turmoil for a week, since Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki fired the previous judge, who prosecutors had complained was biased in favor of the defendants. In protest, defense lawyers have been boycotting the trial.

After Judge Uraibi ejected Mr. Hussein from the courtroom on Tuesday, the other defendants rose in anger, and the judge demanded: "Shut up. Nobody talk."

After more testimony, the judge said he would postpone the case for nearly two weeks.

Elsewhere, insurgents and militiamen across central Iraq attacked mosques, police officers and, with one large blast, lunchtime diners who the police said had apparently been singled out because they could be seen eating in a public place during the Ramadan fast.

All told, news agencies reported that more than 20 people were killed in or around the capital. An Interior Ministry official also said 15 new dead bodies were discovered in Baghdad, the latest victims in the capital's continuing violence.

On Monday morning, insurgents staged a coordinated attack with mortars and a car bomb on a newly opened police station in northern Babil Province, south of the capital, killing at least two Iraqi police officers and wounding four policemen.

The attack on the Jurf al-Sakhr police station, which opened earlier this month at a cost of $440,000, began when a white car drove through the gates of the station and then exploded when it rammed the northwest corner of the building, the United States military said.

Other insurgents simultaneously attacked guard towers nearby with machine guns and mortars. Eight American soldiers suffered minor wounds but were returned to duty, the military said.

In Baghdad, the attacks began early Tuesday. At 7 a.m., gunmen used explosives to severely damage a Sunni mosque in the southeastern part of the city, the Interior Ministry said.

Shortly before noon, a motorcycle packed with explosives detonated near Communist Party offices and a restaurant in central Baghdad. Four people were killed and 18 wounded, all of whom had been at or near the restaurant, an Interior Ministry official said.

Clashes raged in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Amil, killing at least three people. Two bombs exploded in Mahmudiya, south of Baghdad, killing five people and wounding eight. Two American soldiers also died in what the military described as a "noncombat incident" southwest of Baghdad on Tuesday. No other details were provided.

In the heavily fortified Green Zone, Iraqi lawmakers shouted at one another as debate proceeded over how quickly to allow provinces to become autonomous states.

Sunni political leaders had agreed to allow a bill, defining how these states would be formed, to come up for debate this week. The bill is backed by a large faction of Shiites and Kurds, but is opposed by many Sunnis, who say it will strip them of a share of the country's oil wealth.

In return for Sunnis' agreeing to a debate, the Shiite and Kurdish factions agreed to the creation of a constitutional committee to examine amendments sought by Sunnis, and to postpone any actual move toward autonomous regions until at least 2008.

But a number of Sunni legislators made it clear on Tuesday that they would fight the proposal no matter what. One top Sunni legislator, Dhafir al-Ani, quit in protest as chairman of the committee scheduled to hear the proposal.

Inquiry: Australian Wheat Exporter Warned (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia — Australian wheat exporter AWB Ltd. was repeatedly warned by lawyers that funneling money to Saddam Hussein's regime could be illegal and breach U.N. sanctions on Iraq, according to evidence released by a corruption inquiry Tuesday.

The documents, released by a government-commissioned inquiry into the kickbacks scandal, contradicted testimony by company executives that the monopoly exporter, formerly the government-owned Australian Wheat Board, did not knowingly pay $222 million in bribes to the Iraq government under the corruption-riddled U.N. oil-for-food program.

The documents are among 900 that AWB fought to withhold from the inquiry headed by retired judge Terrence Cole.

But the Federal Court ruled last week that 360 of those documents must be handed to the Cole commission because they are not protected by legal professional privilege.

The commission is examining whether company officials broke any Australian laws when AWB paid bogus transport fees for wheat to a Jordanian trucking company partially owned by the Iraqi government.

Under U.N. sanctions against Iraq, companies were banned from making payments to the Iraqi government.

Legal advice from the Australian corporate law firm Blake Dawson Waldron, as well as top barristers, between 2003 and 2005 warned AWB the payments were questionable, documents revealed.

In mid 2003 when American wheat exporters were claiming AWB was inflating its wheat prices for Iraq in breach of the U.N. oil-for-food program rules, AWB's in-house legal team set up an inquiry, known as Project Rose.

DOJ_NMG_0070026

As part of that inquiry, Blake Dawson Waldron warned AWB "it is possible" the trucking fees AWB was paying the trucking company Alia breached Australian federal and state criminal laws.

The law firm said it appeared "in a broad sense" AWB paid the trucking fees to influence the Iraqi Grain Board, which was owned by Saddam's government.

"It is possible that AWB's conduct has resulted in a contravention by Australia of U.N. resolution 986 (1995)," the advice added.

AWB was the largest single supplier of humanitarian goods under the oil-for-food program. From 1997-2003, the company sold 6.8 million tons of wheat to Iraq and received payments from the U.N. of more than $2.3 billion.

West Point Mourns A Font Of Energy, Laid To Rest By War (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Lonnae O'Neal Parker

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

WEST POINT, N.Y., Sept. 26 -- They remember Emily Perez in her many bursts of motion: the diminutive young woman calling out orders to the freshman cadets on the castled military campus of West Point.

They see her sprinting the third leg for Army's 400-meter relay team. Or in the school's gospel choir, filling her lungs and opening her mouth to sing.

Emily J.T. Perez, a determined 23-year-old from Prince George's County, rose to the top of her high school class and then became the first minority female command sergeant in the history of the U.S. Military Academy.

Now she has another distinction. The second lieutenant was buried Tuesday at the academy, the first female graduate of West Point to die in Iraq. Perez, a platoon leader, was killed while patrolling southern Iraq near Najaf on Sept. 12 when a roadside bomb exploded under her Humvee.

And at the service on the high bluffs along the Hudson River, her former fellow cadets, the younger women who looked up to Perez and now are preparing to follow her path, were still learning from her.

"The fact that she's died -- it makes what's going on in the Middle [East] . . . so much more real. I mean, here at West Point, it's kind of like Camelot, you know -- everything just seems to work," Sylvia Amegashie, 21, of Woodbridge, co-captain of West Point's track team, said as she stood on the cemetery grass, holding back tears. "What happened to her, being out there in Iraq, it's real. Her death really makes everything seem more like it's going to happen."

"For me, yeah, like, it's just an eye-opener," agreed Meghan Venable-Thomas, 21, a senior who also ran track and sang in the choir with Perez, who graduated last year. "She was like a little superwoman . . . so full of energy and life, and she was just willing to do anything."

Perez was born into a military family in Heidelberg, Germany, and moved to Fort Washington in 1998. A woman repeatedly described as focused, tenacious and passionate, she was an avid reader from a young age and eventually finished near the top of her class at Oxon Hill High School. From early on, she wanted to be a soldier, her friends recalled, and she became wing commander of Junior ROTC at Oxon Hill.

"She was the cream of the crop," said Nathaniel Laney, Perez's high school track coach and now assistant principal at Oxon Hill. "This wasn't some average Joe."

Her nickname was Kobe, family friend E. Faith Bell said, because everyone knew she could make the shots, in whatever she did.

While in high school, working with the District's Peace Baptist Church, Perez helped begin an HIV-AIDS ministry after family members contracted the virus.

One of her mentors, Roger Pollard, who worked with her when she volunteered with the Alexandria Red Cross HIV-AIDS peer education program, recalled her remarkable ability to stay focused -- always on time, always ready to work. She shared with other teenagers her stories about people close to her living with the depression and stigma of AIDS.

"She was sensitive to the suffering of others" but tough-minded, Pollard said. "I clearly remember thinking that she would definitely be the first female president of this country."

After graduating from West Point, she was assigned to the Army's 204th Support Battalion, 2nd Brigade, 4th Infantry Division and deployed to Iraq in December. Before she left, she spoke with Laney, her high school track coach. He gave her a journal to write everything down when she wanted to clear her head.

"She was like, 'I'll be okay. Don't worry about me.' That was just the confidence she had in herself," he said.

Her godfather, the pastor of Peace Baptist Church, remembered that same time in Perez's life.

"She was resilient. Her spirit was calm. She was resolute. She believed . . . the real tragedy is to not live while you are alive," said the Rev. Michael Bell, Faith Bell's husband.

DOJ_NMG_0070027

She was the 64th female member of the U.S. military to be killed in Iraq or Afghanistan and the 40th West Point graduate killed since Sept. 11, 2001. Another female West Point graduate, Laura M. Walker of the Class of 2003, was killed in Afghanistan last year.

Her family chose to hold the funeral at West Point because of Perez's reverence for the institution that challenged her physically and mentally, Michael Bell said.

At the cemetery, in a quiet corner of campus beneath Storm King Mountain, the warm September sun glinted off the silver tubas of the marching band and lighted the rustling leaves' various shades of flame.

Dozens of uniformed men and women gathered in the crowd: West Point's track team, its gospel choir, former classmates and fellow soldiers. When the hearse pulled up to Perez's grave site -- in Section 36, near those of several other young graduates -- the crowd saluted the flag-draped coffin in near perfect unison.

The family, including parents Vicki and Daniel Perez, sat on 10 folding chairs under a small tent facing the coffin, daubing their eyes.

"Honor guard! Attention!"

The guard assembled around the coffin.

"Do not stand at my grave and weep, I am not there, I do not sleep," Michael Bell read from a poem. "I am a thousand winds that blow. I am the diamond glint of snow. I am the sunlight on ripened grain. I am the gentle autumn rain."

Then West Point Chaplain Darrell Thomsen addressed Perez.

"In your short time here, you stood the watch with duty, with honor," he said. "Your work on earth is done."

Five guns fired in unison three times. The bugler and the drummer played taps. The bagpiper wailed "Amazing Grace." The marching band finished with the "Alma Mater."

After it was over, Faith Bell reflected on what Perez will be remembered for.

"Her tenacity," Bell said. "Her passion for life. One of the things that was important to Emily was not the fear of death but the fear of not living."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron's Fastow To Serve 6 Years (LAT)

By Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

HOUSTON — A federal judge sentenced former Enron Corp. Chief Financial Officer Andrew S. Fastow to six years in prison Tuesday for his role in running the fraudulent, off-the-books dealings that brought down the company while he made millions.

But the judge stopped short of the maximum term, citing Fastow's contrition and his cooperation with the government.

In 2004 Fastow had agreed to serve as long as 10 years in exchange for testifying against the former top executives of the fallen energy company. U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt said that although Fastow was once "drunk on the wine of greed," he has since demonstrated remorse by fully cooperating with government and civil lawyers in lawsuits against Enron.

"These factors call for mercy," the judge said.

Fastow's sentencing turns another page in the saga of Enron, which came to symbolize the wave of corporate accounting scandals of this decade. One of the bosses he testified against, former Chief Executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, will be sentenced on fraud and conspiracy charges next month.

And the same day Fastow was led off in handcuffs and shackles, former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard J. Ebbers reported to federal prison to begin serving a 25-year term for leading a massive accounting fraud.

Hoyt imposed no fine in meting out his sentence to Fastow, noting that under terms of the plea agreement he had already forfeited $23.8 million and pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy. Hoyt sentenced Fastow to two years of supervised release upon completing his prison term. The judge recommended a minimum-security prison for Fastow, as well as drug treatment for the anti-anxiety medication he has been taking.

Fastow, 44, hugged his wife, Lea, a former Enron executive who had done prison time for tax fraud, before he was handcuffed by marshals and led from the courtroom.

His departure ended an emotional hearing punctuated by sobs from his family and friends who packed the courtroom. A parade of lawyers spoke in favor of a reduced sentence, all noting Fastow's willingness to lay out Enron's fraudulent deals in excruciating detail. In addressing the court, he paused often to maintain his composure.

DOJ_NMG_0070028

"When I pled guilty I was consumed by despair and shame by what I had done," Fastow said, his voice cracking. "I know I deserve punishment. I accept it without bitterness."

Federal prosecutor John C. Hueston said no one "has cooperated more thoroughly and extensively than Mr. Fastow." Without his assistance, Hueston said, the government would not have obtained convictions against Skilling and the late Kenneth L. Lay, the company's founder and longtime chairman.

Fastow's attorney, John Keker, said that Scott D. Sullivan, the former WorldCom chief financial officer in a "parallel situation" to Fastow's, received a five-year sentence for his crimes.

"Nobody is asking he not get any punishment," Keker said of his client. Instead, he asked Hoyt to show mercy to a man "disgusted" with his deeds and "desperate to make amends."

Investor Brian Durbin was the only person to speak against reducing Fastow's sentence. When he bought a few thousand dollars of Enron stock, he said, the company appeared to be in prime financial health. But when Enron collapsed, he watched with growing resentment as friends lost their jobs and retirement savings.

"I'm here to convey my personal anger at the management of Enron," Durbin said, looking at Fastow, who returned his gaze. "We were the victims of a scam."

Former Enron employee Tracy Michel, when told of the sentencing, said Fastow should have gotten a longer sentence.

"It's not enough. He got off easy," she said. "But so much time has passed, I guess they hoped people will forgive and forget and move on. I'm sure he's humiliated, so hopefully this is hitting him hard."

Fastow's sentence was fair, given his willingness to cooperate with prosecutors, said Barry Boss, a Washington-based white-collar defense attorney. "People have lost perspective on how long six years is," said Boss, former co-chairman of the U.S. Sentencing Commission's Practitioners Advisory Group.

The sentence could open the door for Skilling to say he should get similar consideration, Boss said.

"Skilling's lawyers may argue that Fastow is the most culpable party. But they tried to play this card before and the jury didn't believe it," he said.

Said Anthony Sabino, professor of law and business at St. John's University in New York: "The sentence will have no effect on Skilling's sentencing. Jeff Skilling is going away for a long, long time."

Tuesday's 75-minute hearing capped a four-year legal battle for Fastow, a Northwestern University business school graduate once regarded as a talented, hard-charging comer.

Federal indictments handed down in October 2002 took a different view of the brash executive and the complex financial deals that set him apart. From 1997 to July 2001, prosecutors said, Fastow engineered a complex series of "clandestine transactions" that hid staggering Enron debt, inflated profit and diverted millions of dollars to himself, his family and his friends.

As the fraudulent partnerships began to unravel, Enron stock collapsed. In December 2001, the company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

In 2002, Fastow was indicted on 78 counts of fraud, money laundering, insider trading and other charges. He pleaded not guilty but changed his mind after the government brought charges against his wife for signing a tax return that failed to declare her husband's improperly pocketed gains as income. Lea Fastow, a former Enron assistant treasurer, served a one-year sentence. The couple sought to stagger their prison time so that one parent could remain with their two sons.

In March, Fastow testified against Lay and Skilling at their federal fraud trial. Both defendants were convicted in May. Lay died of a heart attack in July. Skilling is to be sentenced Oct. 23.

Enron's Fastow Gets 6 Years (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

HOUSTON, Sept. 26 -- Andrew S. Fastow, the finance chief who helped Enron Corp. mislead investors at the same time he stole millions of dollars from the company, was sentenced Tuesday to six years in prison by a judge who said Fastow deserved mercy because of "exceptional" government cooperation and the toll on his family.

U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt significantly discounted the 10-year prison term spelled out in Fastow's plea deal with the Justice Department two years ago. The judge said that Fastow, 44, had been "the subject of great persecution," including threats and religious slurs, as the primary scapegoat for an accounting fraud that cost thousands of employees of the Houston energy company their jobs and retirement savings.

Disclosures nearly five years ago about Fastow's questionable business partnerships foreshadowed not only Enron's bankruptcy but also a string of corporate fraud cases across the country. Federal prosecutors said Tuesday that the Enron debacle remained the largest such investigation in history and that Fastow's help unlocked the case, giving them a priceless window onto the 50th floor of the company's gleaming office tower.

The judge acknowledged Fastow's efforts to repair the harm he has done. Fastow's wife, Lea, who sometimes nodded along with the judge's remarks, already served nearly a year in prison after pleading guilty to underreporting the couple's income. Criminal charges against Lea Fastow helped pressure her husband to cooperate with investigators.

"Seldom does a man's public fall cause an equally public fall for his wife," the judge said.

Rejecting a request that Fastow remain free until next month to assist shareholders pursuing a lawsuit against banks that are accused of helping Enron conceal its debt, Hoyt nonetheless allowed the couple a few moments to embrace before a U.S. marshal cuffed Fastow's hands behind his back. Until the Bureau of Prisons decides where Fastow will serve his term for the two conspiracy counts, he will spend his days in Houston's high-security federal detention center, the same place his wife served the bulk of her sentence.

Clad in a gray suit, white shirt and dark tie, a withered, snowy-haired Fastow showed none of the blinding confidence he wore with pride in the years before Enron collapsed. During the 1990s, Fastow reaped awards and collected tens of millions of dollars in salary and bonuses for engineering the company's unflagging revenue growth.

But the past five years have taken a personal and physical toll. Struggling to keep his composure, Fastow walked slowly into the 11th-floor courtroom crowded with more than two dozen friends and relatives, including his parents, in-laws and brother, who sat in the front row. The judge recommended that Fastow be placed in a residential drug treatment program administered by prison officials, to help wean him from the undisclosed substances he used to mask his anxiety.

In the most emotional moment of the proceeding, Fastow broke down as he apologized to employees and shareholders, including one who told the judge he bought Enron stock as a "no-brainer" investment. Fastow pivoted to speak directly to Brian Durbin, an engineer whose wife worked at Enron and who lost money when the company filed for bankruptcy protection in December 2001: "To Mr. Durbin especially, and to all the victims, I apologize to you. I wish I could undo what I did at Enron, but I can't."

Earlier, Durbin expressed anger and condemned the company's leaders for engaging in an "elaborate scam, if not outright theft."

"When theft and fraud occur from within the company, what chance does an investor have?" Durbin asked.

Hoyt said he received letters from about a dozen others who wrote about the loss of their jobs or insurance policies, difficulties in supporting their children, and "the bankruptcy of spirit that has entered their lives." One unidentified former employee wrote that he is working three part-time jobs to replace his tattered retirement savings account. "I'm not guilty of anything, but my sentence will be longer than Fastow's," the former employee wrote.

The substantial reduction in Fastow's sentence underscores the importance of insiders, who can help prosecutors unravel complex business cases. Fastow was sentenced the same day WorldCom Inc. founder Bernard J. Ebbers reported to a Louisiana prison to serve a 25-year sentence. With time off for good behavior and the successful completion of the drug rehabilitation program, Fastow could cut more than a year from his sentence.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston said Tuesday that without 1,000 hours of briefings and "unflappable, remarkably consistent" testimony by Fastow, the government never would have been able to convict former Enron chief executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay in a fraud trial that ended earlier this year.

Lay, whose lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, scowled at Fastow from a seat in the jury box Tuesday, died of heart disease in July. Skilling faces decades in prison when he is sentenced Oct. 23.

The Fastows -- who have two sons, ages 8 and 11 -- and their relatives have already forfeited nearly $30 million to the government, and their lawyer, John W. Keker, said the couple "will be living in a barrel if these civil cases continue." Fastow on Tuesday pledged to help shareholder lawyers recover even more money from companies that he says helped Enron manipulate its financial reports. In recent weeks, Fastow has spent hundreds of hours guiding them through the company's byzantine business partnerships.

"Man cannot earn mercy," the judge said, reading from prepared remarks. "It comes to a man who is shipwrecked, whose back has been broken . . . who finds himself in a conspiracy of circumstances."

Rabbi Shaul Osadchey, who married the Fastows and who appeared at the courthouse with them Tuesday, told reporters that he had spoken to Fastow a day earlier. "I think he felt he was ready to be sentenced, that he was ready to move on and see an end to this."

Fastow Gets Six Years As Judge Calls For Mercy (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And John M. Biers

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

Andrew Fastow, Enron Corp.'s former chief financial officer and a central figure in the scandal at the fallen energy giant, received a surprisingly lenient sentence of six years in prison followed by two years of community service.

The sentence, handed down in a Houston federal court by Judge Kenneth Hoyt, was significantly less than the 10 years of imprisonment that had been envisioned in the 2004 plea agreement between Mr. Fastow and federal prosecutors, who were investigating Enron following its December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy proceedings. The lower sentence apparently reflects the extensive cooperation the 44-year-old Mr. Fastow provided to government investigators following his plea agreement. Under federal rules, the determination of a sentence is up to a judge.

Judge Hoyt ordered Mr. Fastow be immediately taken into custody yesterday.

Mr. Fastow was a major prosecution witness in the criminal trial this year in Houston federal court of Kenneth Lay, Enron's former chairman, and Jeffrey Skilling, its former president. Both men were convicted in May of conspiracy and fraud charges. Mr. Lay died of heart-related problems in July. Mr. Skilling is scheduled to be sentenced on Oct. 23 in Houston by Judge Sim Lake. Observers believe Mr. Skilling could receive a sentence of about 20 years.

Some found the reduced sentence for Mr. Fastow troubling. "I was very surprised," said Leslie Caldwell, the original director of the special Justice Department task force that investigated the Enron scandal. Ms. Caldwell, who is currently a partner with Morgan, Lewis & Bockius in New York, said the 10-year sentence included in the 2004 plea deal contemplated that he would provide full cooperation. In return for that cooperation and his pleading guilty to two felony counts, the government dropped a 98-count indictment against Mr. Fastow that could have sent him to prison for 20 years.

At yesterday's sentencing hearing, prosecutor John Hueston described Mr. Fastow's cooperation as a "key breakthrough" in the probe. Mr. Fastow was "critical" to winning the convictions of Messrs. Lay and Skilling, said Mr. Hueston, who was one of the three lead prosecutors in that trial.

Mr. Fastow also received robust praise from plaintiffs attorneys representing the University of California and other investors in civil litigation against financial institutions that helped to created some of Enron's most controversial deals. They said Mr. Fastow had provided helpful information about some of those dealings, including a 25-page declaration that he signed just Monday. But plaintiffs attorneys were unsuccessful in requesting that Mr. Fastow's prison sentence be delayed until next month, so he could be deposed.

In his written declaration, Mr. Fastow said several of Enron's bankers helped to devise structures that they knew "created the false appearance" of financial health at the company. Mr. Fastow added that he and other Enron executives had provided assurances to the financial institutions of a guaranteed return in certain transactions. Such a guarantee can nullify the legitimacy of a deal for financial accounting purposes and leave the participants open to criminal charges.

The statements in Mr. Fastow's declaration are similar to conclusions reached previously by others. For instance, a 2003 report by a court-appointed examiner in the Enron bankruptcy proceeding said there was evidence that major financial institutions had knowingly "aided and abetted" company executives in transactions aimed at manipulating the energy giant's financial results.

A person familiar with the Enron criminal investigation said the information in the Fastow declaration has long been known to federal investigators and isn't viewed as likely to produce any new criminal charges. In late 2004, four former Merrill Lynch & Co. officials were convicted of conspiracy and fraud in a Houston federal court in connection with a 1999 deal involving the sale of some Enron electricity barges. Those convictions were recently overturned on appeal.

When he addressed the court yesterday at his sentencing hearing, Mr. Fastow, his voice cracking, said: "I wish I could undo the harm I caused," adding, "I am trying to be the best person I can be going forward."

Judge Hoyt noted that Enron's collapse had caused widespread damage. Thousands of company employees were laid off and billions of dollars were wiped out as Enron's stock fell to zero. Nonetheless, Mr. Fastow's cooperation, along with his very public fall from grace, "calls for mercy" in sentencing, Judge Hoyt said.

Mr. Fastow has been a much vilified figure. While Enron's chief financial officer, he also ran and partly owned two private partnerships, known as LJM1 and LJM2, which prosecutors subsequently identified as major tools for illegally manipulating the company's financial statements.

Coincidentally, former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers also started his incarceration yesterday. The 65-year-old Mr. Ebbers reported to a federal prison in Oakdale, La., to begin serving a 25-year sentence for his role in the $11 billion accounting fraud at the telecommunications giant. Mr. Ebbers was convicted by a jury in New York federal court last year of securities fraud and other crimes. He had remained free pending an appeal that was recently turned down by one higher court. His attorney has said Mr. Ebbers will continue to appeal.

Fastow Gets Lighter Prison Sentence Of Six Years (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, September 27, 2006

Andrew Fastow, designer of the infamous accounting tricks that destroyed former energy giant Enron, was sentenced Tuesday to a six-year prison term.

The sentence was lighter than the 10-year term the former chief financial officer of Enron agreed to in 2004. Fastow pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit wire fraud and securities fraud and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors to build a case against other executives.

The judge, U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt, said Fastow deserved a more lenient punishment because he and his family had suffered enough. Fastow has turned over nearly $30 million in cash and property. "Prosecution is appropriate, but persecution is not," Hoyt said.

Fastow, 44, who also is barred from serving as an officer or director of a public company, could shave a year from his prison term by joining a drug-treatment program. The judge recommended Fastow to serve at the federal prison in Bastrop, Texas, followed by a two-year probation.

"I'm ashamed of what I did," a crying Fastow said in court. "I wish I could undo what I did at Enron, but I can't. I understand that I deserve punishment."

Fastow's wife, Lea, served a year in jail for not reporting the income received from his Enron partnerships. The toll on the family factored into the judge's sentencing. "Your family has taken a particularly acrimonious hit," Hoyt said. "That calls for mercy."

Enron lingers as one of the biggest frauds in U.S. history. The energy company had been worth more than $68 billion. Its failure wiped out the savings and retirement funds of thousands of employees who also lost their jobs.

Some were surprised Fastow's sentence was reduced. "Enron was such a notorious fraud," says Michael Perino, professor at St. John's University School of Law.

But the sentencing decision speaks to how the judge was convinced Fastow has already suffered, says Bill O'Neill, partner at Latham & Watkins. "All of us are surprised by this, but not all of us are sitting where the judge is sitting," he says. "If someone is honestly contrite, and an experienced judge sees contrition, he will grant leniency."

Meanwhile, in a sign of the legal battles still to come, Fastow said in a filing Tuesday as part of an investors' securities-fraud case that Enron banks Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, Royal Bank of Scotland (RBS), Deutsche Bank and Barclays all knew of his schemes. Merrill, Credit Suisse and Deutsche declined comment.

Spokeswoman Carolyn McAdam said RBS will defend itself vigorously. David Braff, lawyer for Barclays at Sullivan & Cromwell, called the credibility of Fastow's filing "highly suspect."

Enron's Fastow Is Sentenced To Six Years In Jail (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

HOUSTON, Sept. 26 — In a courtroom crowded with teary family and friends, Enron's former chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, was sentenced to six years in jail today for his role in the collapse of what was once the world's largest energy company.

He will serve two additional years at home under court supervision. The total sentence of eight years is two years less than the maximum provided in his plea agreement with government prosecutors.

Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt of the Federal District Court in Houston set the sentence after three lawyers representing Enron shareholders said Mr. Fastow, who pleaded guilty to two counts of wire and securities fraud in 2004, was a crucial witness in their cases against several banks that allegedly participated in fraudulent deals to conceal Enron's massive debt.

While thousands of people lost their jobs and savings when the company declared bankruptcy in 2001, only one disgruntled investor appeared in court to argue against leniency. Brian Durbin said he and his family had been "victims of an elaborate scam" and said Mr. Fastow should serve no less than the 10 years specified in his plea agreement. "A deal's a deal," he said, though he said he had prepared his statement before he knew Mr. Fastow was cooperating in the shareholder lawsuits.

In explaining his decision, Judge Hoyt said he had to "examine the relationship between justice and mercy." Although Mr. Fastow had "drunk the wine of greed," he said, the former high-flying executive had been the "subject of great persecution" including anti-Semitic slurs and personal threats.

The judge also cited the incarceration of Mr. Fastow's wife, Lea. She served a year in jail for her role in a fraudulent Enron tax return. During that time, Mr. Fastow was left to care for his two young sons alone. Acknowledging Mr. Fastow's devotion to his family and community service while simultaneously working to redress his crimes at Enron, Judge Hoyt said, "The best evidence of remorse is what you do going forward."

Although Mr. Fastow's lawyers and government prosecutors asked that he be allowed to surrender voluntarily after the Yom Kippur holiday on Monday, Judge Hoyt refused. Mr. Fastow was allowed to briefly embrace his wife before U.S. Marshals escorted him from the courtroom in handcuffs.

"We're very disappointed he was remanded into custody," said Chris Patti, counsel for the University of California, which is a plaintiff in pending shareholder litigation. "I'm not sure what this will mean for us."

Mr. Patti and other lawyers involved in Enron civil cases had asked the judge at today's hearing to allow Mr. Fastow to remain free until at least October 23, the date they hoped to conclude his deposition. October 23 is also the date Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey Skilling, will be sentenced.

Another lawyer representing shareholders, Lawrence Irving, testified that Mr. Fastow was "critical" to their case. Referring to Mr. Fastow's testimony in the trials against his former bosses Mr. Skilling and Kenneth Lay, Mr. Irving said, "I have never seen a more impressive witness." Mr. Lay died of a heart attack in July before serving any jail time.

United States Attorney John Hueston testified that the cases against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay were weak until Mr. Fastow agreed to help the Justice Department's Enron Task Force: "He allowed the U.S. government to bring jurors inside the executive suite."

Mr. Hueston said Mr. Fastow worked with prosecutors for "in excess of 1,000 hours to untangle the web" of deceit and proved "credible, contrite and truthful" on the witness stand. Moreover, Mr. Hueston said Mr. Fastow was "truly repentant" and "not the same person introduced to the Task Force in 2003."

Mr. Hueston requested that Mr. Fastow be imprisoned in a federal penitentiary in Bastrop, Texas, where he can be treated for his dependency on anti-anxiety medication. The judge said he would recommend that facility but that the decision would be made by the Bureau of Prisons. During his remarks, Mr. Hueston did not argue for or against the maximum 10-year sentence.

Mr. Fastow also addressed Judge Hoyt. Choking back tears, he said he felt shame and regret for his actions. Turning to face Mr. Durbin, the shareholder, Mr. Fastow apologized. Speaking of his friends and family, he said, "I've failed them and have to work everyday of my life to regain their trust."

Former Enron Financial Officer Fastow Sentenced To 6 Years In Prison (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Andrew Fastow, the former Enron Corp. financial whiz, was sentenced Tuesday to six years in prison for his role in the energy company's collapse that wiped out thousands of jobs and millions of dollars in retirement savings.

Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, had agreed to serve a maximum 10-year term when he pleaded guilty in 2004.

His attorneys, David Gerger and John Keker, on Tuesday asked for a lesser sentence, citing Fastow's admission of his guilt and his help in the federal government's successful prosecution of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and the former chief executive, Jeffrey Skilling.

Enron, once the seventh-largest U.S. company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out more than $60 billion (now â,¬47.3 billion) in market value along with thousands of jobs and more than $2 billion (â,¬1.6 billion) in pension plans.

Fastow was originally indicted on 98 counts, including fraud, insider trading and money laundering. He pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy, admitting to running various schemes to hide Enron debt and inflate profits while enriching himself. He also surrendered nearly $30 million (â,¬23.6 million) in cash and property.

At their trial, Fastow testified Lay and Skilling were aware of fraudulent financial structures engineered by Fastow and his staff.

Skilling and Lay were convicted in May of conspiracy and fraud. Lay's attorneys are working to erase his convictions since his July 5 death from heart disease. Skilling is to be sentenced next month.

Fastow's wife, Lea, pleaded guilty in 2004 to a misdemeanor tax crime and served a year in prison for helping him hide ill-gotten gains from his schemes.

Fastow Accuses Enron Bankers (FT)

By Ben White And Sheila McNulty

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

Andrew Fastow, the former chief financial officer of Enron, has accused 10 leading investment banks of helping the now-bankrupt energy group falsify its books in return for big advisory fees.

The accusations came in a 24-page legal declaration filed by Mr Fastow in support of a class action lawsuit against the banks brought on behalf of Enron's shareholders.

The declaration from Mr Fastow, who was sentenced on Tuesday to six years in prison for his role in Enron's collapse, could put new pressure on banks that have not yet settled in the class-action case.

In his statement, Mr Fastow said he viewed Enron's bankers as well-paid "problem-solvers" who knowingly helped Enron created financial structures that made the energy trading company seem more profitable than it really was.

Mr Fastow singled out Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, RBS and Barclays as especially involved with creating what he described as deceptive structures.

Attorneys for Enron shareholders, led by Lerach Coughlin, have already won $8bn in settlements from a group of banks including Citigroup, Bank of America and JP Morgan Chase.

A federal judge has previously dismissed Deutsche Bank and Barclays from the class action suit. But William Lerach, the lead attorney in the case, plans to ask that the two banks be reinstated in light of the declaration.

G. Paul Howes, an attorney for the Enron plaintiffs, spoke on Mr Fastow's behalf at the sentencing hearing in Houston on Thursday, asking for leniency to reflect his co-operation with the shareholders' suit.

Legal experts noted that Mr Fastow's statements were tainted by his desire for leniency and his admission of falsifying financial statements.

However, experts also said that Mr Fastow was well positioned to describe Enron's dealings. Mr Fastow was deeply involved in creating the off-balance-sheet partnerships that helped cloak Enron's mounting debt.

"He is in the best position to know exactly what was said or not said and what kinds of winks and nods were going on," said Henry Hu, professor of law and business at the University of Texas.

Mr Hu added that Mr Fastow's co-operation with the shareholders' suit would increase pressure on the remaining banks to settle.

Mr Lerach defended Mr Fastow's credibility: "Everything Fastow will say is documented by the damning and incredible e-mails these bankers wrote to each other when these schemes were going on," Mr Lerach said.

Mr Fastow, 44, broke down repeatedly when addressing the federal court, saying: "I wish I could undo what I did at Enron, but I can't."

Fastow Sentenced To Six Years In Federal Prison (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, September 27, 2006

After listening to a tearful Andrew Fastow, the former chief financial officer at Houston's Enron Corp., express remorse for his actions that led in part to the downfall of the energy company, U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt of Houston on Tuesday sentenced Fastow to six years in federal prison and two years of supervised release.

The sentencing, shortly after noon, came nearly three years after Fastow pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. The plea bargain he agreed to in January 2004 in United States of America v. Andrew S. Fastow called for a sentence of up to 10 years in prison.

After briefly hugging his wife, Lea, Fastow was handcuffed and led out of the courtroom, as Lea and other family members and friends watched. Hoyt turned down a request from Fastow's lawyers to let the 44-year-old voluntarily surrender to federal custody in October to give the former Enron CFO opportunity to give a deposition in Enron civil litigation.

In brief remarks to Hoyt, Fastow said he has been "consumed with despair and shame" for what he did at Enron. He has admitted to conspiring with other Enron executives to manipulate the company's financial reports and admitted to enriching himself. He forfeited about $24 million.

During the sentencing hearing, John Keker, a defense attorney for Fastow, asked Hoyt to sentence Fastow to five years in prison and three years of supervised release. Keker suggested that Fastow should spend those final three years doing full-time community service.

Keker told Hoyt during the hearing that Fastow has profoundly changed since Keker first met him, from a man in denial to a man who has faced what he's done.

"He is disgusted by it," Keker, a partner in Keker & Van Nest in San Francisco, told Hoyt.

Keker told Hoyt that Fastow has accepted responsibility for his actions and that Fastow's cooperation with federal prosecutors in criminal prosecutions of former Enron officials Kenneth Lay, Jeffrey Skilling and Richard Causey was "extraordinary." Keker also pointed out that Fastow has now pledged to help the plaintiffs in the shareholder securities class action filed by disgruntled Enron investors.

Tuesday, lawyers in the shareholder securities suit, In Re: Enron Corp. Securities Litigation filed a declaration from Fastow in connection with the civil litigation. In that declaration, Fastow alleges that some of the banks that did business with Enron when he was CFO "understood that some of the transactions were done primarily for generating certain accounting benefits and financial-reporting objections for Enron, including higher funds flow from operations, lower debt and increased [current period] income."

G. Paul Howes, a lawyer for the lead plaintiff in the securities litigation, told Hoyt during the hearing that Fastow has agreed to testify during the upcoming trial in the securities litigation and will provide crucial testimony to tie banks to the downfall of Enron.

Howes, a partner in plaintiffs firm Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins in San Diego, told Hoyt, "Mr. Fastow ... is the one person who can tell the story that hasn't been told: the role of the banks."

Howes, who said Fastow's testimony could help the plaintiffs recover billions of dollars from defendant banks in the shareholder securities suit, also urged Hoyt to allow Fastow to remain free from federal custody so he could give the civil deposition in October.

Prosecutor John Hueston, an Assistant U.S. Attorney who is a member of the Enron Task Force, told Hoyt that Fastow's decision to cooperate with the government in the Enron investigation was a "key breakthrough" that allowed the government to bring criminal charges against Causey, the former chief accounting officer; against Skilling, the former chief executive officer; and finally against Lay, the former chairman of Enron.

Causey pleaded guilty to a securities fraud charge and is awaiting sentencing.

Skilling and Lay were convicted in May of criminal charges. Lay was found guilty of one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud, two counts of wire fraud for making false and misleading statements and three counts of securities fraud. Skilling was found guilty on one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud, 12 counts of securities fraud, five counts of making false statements to auditors, and one count of insider trading. Lay died in July following a heart attack, but Skilling's sentencing is set for Oct. 23.

Fastow was "thoroughly debriefed" by the government, Hueston said.

Like Keker, Hueston told Hoyt that Fastow has changed immeasurably since the time when he was introduced to the Enron Task Force in 2003, and he's now "truly repentant."

In explaining his sentence, Hoyt said that Fastow received justice in court, but he also deserves mercy, because he is helping Enron shareholders in the civil litigation, because he was the subject of "great persecution" for the collapse of Enron, and because his family took a "particularly acrimonious hit" when his wife, Lea, was also prosecuted. Lea Fastow spent one year in prison after pleading guilty to one misdemeanor count of filing a false tax return.

"Seldom does a man's public fall cause an equally public fall for his wife," Hoyt noted.

Talking through tears, Fastow said, "I'm ashamed of what I did. I wish I could undo what I did at Enron, but I can't."

Ebbers Reports To Prison In Mercedes (USAT)

USA Today, September 27, 2006

Former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers — convicted in 2005 for his role in the company's $11 billion accounting fraud, the biggest in corporate history — reported Tuesday to a medium-security federal prison in Oakdale, La., to begin serving a 25-year sentence. Ebbers drove his Mercedes to prison.

Ebbers Starts 25-Year Term For Fraud At WorldCom (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters And Amy Joyce, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Former WorldCom Inc. chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers reported yesterday to a federal prison in central Louisiana to begin serving a 25-year sentence for his role in the $11 billion accounting fraud that laid low the nation's second-largest telecommunications company.

Ebbers, 65, arrived at 1:18 p.m. at the low-security facility in Oakdale, according to a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons. The facility, which has 1,400 inmates, is more than 200 miles from Ebbers's family's home outside Jackson, Miss. Officials said Ebbers will probably be housed in a double-bunk cell with a steel door.

For the onetime billionaire, prison marks the end of an extraordinary arc, and it left former WorldCom employees and investors wondering whether the weight of the punishment suited the crime. A former milkman and high school basketball coach, Ebbers built a tiny Mississippi long-distance company into a powerhouse and dazzled Wall Street with down-home rhetoric and extraordinary profit margins. During the late 1990s, rival phone companies were excoriated by Wall Street for failing to match WorldCom's dizzying growth.

But it all came crashing down when the company announced in June 2002 that its chief financial officer, Scott D. Sullivan, had been boosting the bottom line by secretly reclassifying the firm's operating expenses as capital expenditures. WorldCom filed for bankruptcy protection the next month, and eventually 20,000 jobs were wiped out, including 4,000 in the Washington region. Hundreds of thousands of investors lost billions of dollars, and the fraud -- along with the 2001 collapse of Enron Corp. -- helped spark a major revision of corporate accountability laws.

Ebbers will spend at least the next 21 years in prison. The federal system does not have parole, but inmates can receive up to 15 percent off their sentences for good behavior. Ebbers is appealing his conviction and sentence to the Supreme Court.

Sullivan, 45, cut a deal with prosecutors and became the chief government witness at Ebbers's 2005 trial. He is serving a five-year sentence at a medium-security facility in Jesup, Ga., and is scheduled to be released in 2010.

The contrast between Ebbers's sentence and that of Sullivan and other high profile white-collar felons, such as former Enron finance chief Andrew S. Fastow -- who was sentenced yesterday to six years in prison -- preoccupied Ebbers's attorney Reid H. Weingarten.

"A very, very sad day," Weingarten wrote in a brief e-mail. "That sullivan gets 5 and now fastow 6 and bernie faces 25 makes me crazy . . . somehow, someway justice will be done here."

Former WorldCom employee Gayle Dennis, 39, has mellowed somewhat in her views toward Ebbers in the years since the fraud was revealed, but she still says he belongs in prison.

"He may not have actively said, 'Book these fraudulent entries,' " she said. "But he created the environment and the culture to encourage that behavior and almost require that behavior."

Dennis, who worked in the company's finance unit from 1993 to 2006, estimates that she lost $50,000 to $100,000 in retirement savings and stock options. And after the fraud was uncovered, she spent a spent a year helping clean up the books, working seven days a week, often until midnight.

"During those times, I was very anti-Bernie as well as anti-Scott Sullivan," she said. "They weren't my favorite people at that time."

In Clinton, Miss., where WorldCom had its headquarters before the scandal and which once proudly claimed to be the smallest city to host a Fortune 500 company, Mayor Rosemary Aultman took a more charitable view.

"I feel for his family," she said, adding that Ebbers's sentence seemed excessive compared with the penalties handed to other top executives convicted of similar crimes.

Ebbers had originally asked to be sent to a prison in Yazoo City, Miss., which is much closer to his family's home in Ridgeland, just north of Jackson. But yesterday, he left his home in the gated community of Bridgewater shortly before 8 a.m. and reported to Oakdale Federal Correctional Institution a little more than five hours later.

In addition to serving a lengthy prison sentence, Ebbers has also been forced to forfeit assets to a restitution fund for WorldCom investors and former employees. Liquidating Ebbers's assets, including a timber farm and a variety of other businesses, has raised $40 million so far, according to lawyers who are preparing to distribute a fund totaling $6.2 billion. That fund also includes money from settlements with WorldCom's bankers, accountants and directors, along with assets forfeited by Sullivan.

A team of class-action lawyers led by John P. "Sean" Coffey has processed 1 million WorldCom claims and found about 700,000 to be valid. The checks are expected to start rolling out in late October or early November, Coffey said. Holders of WorldCom stock will receive only pennies on the dollar for their losses. Bondholders will do far better because WorldCom's underwriters paid large settlements to avoid being on the hook for the company's default. Some bondholders will receive as much as 66 cents on the dollar. WorldCom, which emerged from bankruptcy protection as MCI Inc., has since been bought by Verizon Communications Inc.

There is a second pot of settlement money: the $750 million recovered by the Securities and Exchange Commission as part of its settlement with WorldCom. The distribution plan for those funds has been challenged by a group of WorldCom creditors and is tied up in litigation, SEC spokesman John Nester said.

No matter how those claims are processed, former WorldCom employee Andy Sharp said he felt a sense of relief yesterday as he heard Ebbers was about to start serving his sentence. "I'm less bitter about it . . . and even a little less bitter today now that he's arriving at jail," he said.

Sharp started working for WorldCom subsidiary UUNet Technologies Inc. in 1997 and left in June 2003 because he worried every morning that he would be laid off. His wife, Kristen Stahl-Sharp, who also worked there, was let go in 2002.

Andy Sharp, who now works in business development for a software company in State College, Pa., said he has tried to forget about how much money the two of them lost. He views his tumultuous years with WorldCom more as an experience and less as a catastrophe.

"When things were good, they were good," he said. "It's just too bad it had to end the way it did."

Lawyers Discuss Scrushy's New-Trial Request (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

A federal judge ordered defense attorneys and prosecutors to a noon conference call today to discuss HealthSouth Corp. founder and former Chief Executive Richard M. Scrushy's request for a new trial on political-corruption charges.

Attorneys for Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman say their June convictions should be thrown out because some jury members may have communicated with one another via email outside the courtroom before and during deliberations. Defense attorneys also say the jurors improperly viewed articles and information on the Internet during deliberations.

Copies of the defense attorneys' motion, including copies of purported email exchanges, briefly appeared in the public online docket when filed Monday before U.S. District Court Judge Mark Fuller placed them under seal. The email copies and separate affidavits from a juror and his wife and pastor gave names and other details that made it possible to identify jurors.

Mr. Scrushy was convicted of six counts, including conspiracy, in connection with paying $500,000 in bribes in return for a spot on a state regulatory panel. Mr. Siegelman was convicted on 10 political-corruption counts, six related to Mr. Scrushy.

The Hurd And Dunn Show (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

Now leaks are a serious breach of board collegiality and confidentiality. In principle, something should be done about them. But you've heard nothing like the Hewlett-Packard saga before, and that's no accident.

GM Chief Rick Wagoner merely contented himself with venting to the L.A. Times a few weeks ago about his own leaking board, though the GM leaks were more manipulative than any that came from H-P. Coke's board, which then featured investing legend Warren Buffett, was a veritable leakfest two years ago during its hunt for a CEO, when one name after another surfaced in the press prematurely, including that of Gillette's James Kilts, who abruptly withdrew from consideration.

This produced tsk-tsks all around but no gumshoes to root out the offending parties.

Or take the case of Ira Stepanian, bounced from his job as Bank of Boston's chief. He showed up at the company's annual meetings for years afterward to make speeches about the need to investigate the board leaks that preceded his firing. His replacement CEO acknowledged the leak problem, said the board had discussed it, but concluded the bank's interests wouldn't be served by an investigation.

H-P followed a different wisdom. Its board chairwoman, Patricia Dunn, beset by leaks through four years of strategic and leadership turmoil, decided to get proactive. She sponsored private investigators to track down the leakers, leading to a boardroom rupture when it emerged that these sleuths had (in vernacular terms, if not legal terms) stolen the phone bills of directors and reporters in an attempt to discover who blabbed to whom.

A rule of journalism is that a story that on Day One is "man bites dog" must be flipped 180 degrees on Day Two: It must be given deeper significance. It must represent a trend: Men are biting dogs all over.

The H-P snafu is devoid of larger meaning, but the snafu now has its own consequences, hence the unusual suspense, and unusual stakes, of tomorrow's spectacle before a House committee concerned with data privacy.

The questions only begin with which executives will invoke the Fifth (likely only those directly involved in the record filching). Will Ms. Dunn take full responsibility for driving the investigation or seek to share it with CEO Mark Hurd? Until now, the markets have viewed the H-P scandal as a board scandal, and tellingly, of little relevance for the company's shares. Then an email revealed Mr. Hurd had given his blessing to a plan for a fake email leak to a reporter in hopes of ferreting out the real leakers.

His Friday press conference was not a triumph. He seemed to admit what he couldn't deny, and minimized: He approved the email scam but "doesn't recall" approving a tracking software attachment (though it's hard to see how the scheme made sense otherwise). He was in a meeting, "briefly"; he received a report but "didn't read it." He takes "full accountablity" for what happens next, not for what happened before.

But Mr. Hurd was new on the job, Ms. Dunn's investigation was already underway when he arrived, and he had his hands full turning around H-P's business (which he seems to have done admirably). Shareholders would not like to see him go. In the last two days, a unspoken deal has glimmered in the comments of the corporate governance crowd and its media helpmates. They see a chance to pleasure themselves by remaking the H-P board to their specifications as a test bed for various nostrums of "good governance." In return, they signal a willingness to treat the scandal as primarily a "board scandal." Expect Mr. Hurd to take them up in tomorrow's hearing.

Another element of suspense is Congress. Will it confine itself to what the H-P saga has to say about "pretexting" -- the scamming of phone companies and others into allowing unauthorized access to records?

This subject was on the committee's radar screen already. Or will H-P become an excuse to become even more prescriptive on corporate governance along the lines of the poorly considered Sarbanes-Oxley law in the wake of Enron?

That corporate snafus are evidence of a "crisis" of governance, calling for a straitjacket to be lowered over companies presumably to prevent future snafus and improve corporate performance, is already being brutally repudiated by reality as public companies and executive talent flee to private equity.

More SOX is the last thing America needs. Even a company that otherwise qualifies as a "monopoly" in the good or service it provides must compete with the entire world for investment dollars. There are 11,000 public companies in America, each competing with 10,999 others for investor interest. That's not including thousands of foreign companies, Danish housing bonds, unleaded gas futures and every other contender for investor cash.

The right answer to the question (a renewed favorite in the wake of the H-P shakeup) of whether the chairman's job and the CEO's job should be separate is: Yes, in the case of companies where separation is a good idea, and no, in cases where it's a bad idea.

Most corporate governance questions (including executive compensation questions) can be answered in the same vein. It depends. Companies should be left to figure out for themselves what's best, try one thing and then another, in the unceasing quest to gain the confidence of investors who have nearly infinite choice about where to put their money.

To Buy Or Not To Buy HP? A Question Of Ethics (WP)

By Rob Pegoraro

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Few corporations deserve to be equated to Richard Nixon's White House or Enron, but Hewlett-Packard seems richly entitled to that comparison. And unlike those two arch-villains, HP awaits your judgment the next time you walk into any computer or electronics store. What do you do?

In case you missed it, from March 2005 to May 2006 the onetime Silicon Valley icon engaged in an orgy of intrusive, probably illegal surveillance as it tried to find the source of leaks about its board meetings. It sicced investigators on its board members, its board members' families, its own spokespeople, its former chief executive, reporters and their spouses, and even one reporter's father.

HP's hired goons pursued those suspects in a variety of creepy ways. They employed pretexting -- a tool of identity thieves more generally known as lying -- to gather people's telephone records. They considered planting spies in the newsrooms of the Wall Street Journal and Cnet and even attempted to infect a journalist's computer with spyware that would record to whom she forwarded an attachment.

A public apology finally came on Friday, but the only person to be punished was Chairman Patricia Dunn: She had already agreed to quit, but HP kicked her out immediately instead of letting her stick around until January. Meanwhile, chief executive Mark Hurd -- who should have been aware of what was being done in his name but apparently was not -- was given Dunn's old job while keeping his current gig. Nice work if you can get it, huh?

So, Nixonian or Enronesque? You pick the adjective. And you pick the response: Do you give HP your business or not? Does its vile conduct outweigh the finer points of its products?

That question can come up in any consumer transaction -- whether it's deciding between buying a steak at Safeway, Whole Foods or the farmer's market or choosing between trekking out to Costco or Wal-Mart for the next bulk purchase of toilet paper -- but it has been coming up more often in the tech industry.

Just picking out a Web search engine can involve a complicated moral calculus. Google's Chinese subsidiary censors search results to suit the dictates of the Chinese government -- but Yahoo has turned over the names of Chinese dissidents who used its Web-mail service.

Lest you throw up your hands and say this is just business, not a moral issue, remember that most companies want to be judged on this level. That's why they go to the trouble of putting testimonials to their "corporate citizenship" and "core values" up on their Web sites and sponsoring NPR and local symphony orchestras. (For a cheap laugh, visit http://www.hp.com/hpinfo/globalcitizenship .) It's only fair to take up a company on such a clearly expressed offer and evaluate its character.

Not all corporate misdeeds require a consumer response. It's possible to like a product even when its manufacturer can act like a jerk at times. Apple has engaged in thuggish -- but, fortunately, unsuccessful -- lawsuits against Web sites that published leaked information about upcoming products, but that hasn't stopped the iPod from dominating the music-player market. And then there's Microsoft: Being nailed for repeated antitrust violations didn't seem to make any meaningful dent in its sales.

But some conduct begs for retribution at the cash register. The brain trust at HP let its megalomania outweigh any other considerations, like common decency or simply the desire not to look like felons when the whole sorry operation inevitably came to light. If this doesn't affect HP's bottom line, how much lower does a company have to sink before its customers rebel?

In one respect, HP faces more trouble than most companies that run afoul of the law. Like most manufacturers of Windows computers, it doesn't make anything that you can't easily get from another source. It builds commodity products with only a few minor tweaks. Replacing an HP with a Dell or a Sony entails far less distress than boycotting an airline, a vacation destination or a particular make of car.

Unfortunately, punishing HP or the next corporate criminal doesn't mean you can expect to move your business to a truly upstanding firm, as opposed to one that's merely less evil. The "my company right or wrong" mind-set rules too many corporations these days, and no place more decidedly than in their executive suites -- where leaders first demand to be compensated as if they alone deserve credit for the company's success, then cry about the unfairness of laws like Sarbanes-Oxley that hold them directly responsible for the company's misdeeds.

Go ahead, make HP your punching bag the next time you shop for a printer or a computer. Just don't overestimate the deterrent effect that might have on the rest of corporate America.

Options Probe Has Cost Investors $7.9 Billion In Market Value (BLOOM)

By Rick Green

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

Sept. 27 (Bloomberg) -- The scandal over backdating stock options, used by companies to reward top executives with shares granted at below-market prices, has so far cost investors at least $7.9 billion in market value.

More than two-thirds of 117 companies that announced investigations into their options grants by Aug. 31 fell in the stock market the next day, data compiled by Bloomberg show. The declines sliced an average 2.6 percent from their market value, 2.5 percentage points more than the average return on the same day for Standard & Poor's and Bloomberg indexes of similar companies.

The losses add grist to 220 investor lawsuits against 70 companies, including Apple Computer Inc. and Home Depot Inc., which demand restitution and damages. The inquiry into backdating and fortuitous timing of option grants rivals the probe three years ago into improper mutual-fund trading, which led to $4.3 billion in penalties.

``It's yesterday coming back to haunt you today," said Howard Silverblatt, equity market analyst at Standard & Poor's in New York. ``It's another blow against corporate governance and another reason why individuals will find it difficult to have trust and faith in management."

Companies grant options to give executives an incentive to boost the stock price. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department are looking at whether the companies backdated grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low, giving recipients a built-in profit, and cases where they may have failed to properly account for awards.

Probe Costs Jobs

Backdated options that aren't disclosed can hide compensation costs from shareholders, distort income taxes and earnings and thus obscure a company's financial statements, prosecutors and regulators said. At least 19 companies including Broadcom Corp. and Applied Micro Circuits Corp. already have restated profits by $2.5 billion. More than 30 companies have said they may revise earnings, among them Cablevision Systems Corp. and Cheesecake Factory Inc.

Probes also have cost about 20 executives and directors their jobs at more than a dozen companies, such as Gregory Reyes, chief executive officer at San Jose, California-based Brocade Communications Systems Inc., the world's largest maker of switches for storage networks, and Kent Roberts, general counsel at McAfee Inc., the Santa Clara, California-based maker of anti-virus software.

Five former executives at two companies face criminal charges, including Reyes and Kobi Alexander, ex-CEO of New York- based Comverse Technology Inc.

Peer Performance

Investment returns are based on a Bloomberg analysis of companies that disclosed probes from Jan. 1 to Aug. 31. Companies that announced probes before 2006 or after August weren't included. Stock prices were measured for a day, a week and a month, starting from the day the company first disclosed an investigation through Sept. 1.

The analysis then compared those returns to a peer group using an S&P index composed of similar companies. In three cases where an S&P peer group didn't match closely, a Bloomberg index was substituted. Houston-based Crown Castle International Corp. and Boston-based American Tower Inc., which own communications towers, were compared with the 110-member Bloomberg U.S. Communications Index. Stolt-Nielsen SA, a London-based shipping company, was compared with the 13-member Bloomberg Dry Ships Index.

Some of a stock's movement might have been explained by issues affecting the entire industry or market. To account for this, the calculation of how much a stock rose or fell, and how much its market value changed, was adjusted by subtracting the movement of market indexes of similar stocks on the same day.

Monster Decline

In the case of Monster Worldwide Inc., the New York-based job service, the stock's 8.1 percent loss on June 12 cut the company's market value by $433.9 million. Since its peers lost 1.8 percent that day, just 6.3 percentage points were attributed to the options announcement, reducing the loss of market value to $339.7 million, according to Bloomberg data.

The adjusted decline in market value totaled $7.9 billion for all companies on the first day of trading. Unadjusted, the total would have been $10.8 billion.

The review didn't consider the effect of accusations made by researchers, news reports and lawsuits -- many of them unsubstantiated -- which sent some stocks tumbling before formal announcements.

First-Day Trading

Shares of 78 of 117 companies fell in the first trading day, and 80 trailed their peers. The biggest declines included QuickLogic Corp., a Sunnyvale, California-based developer of low-power programmable microchips, on July 27, and SafeNet Inc., a Belcamp, Maryland-based maker of products to protect computer communications, on May 19. Their shares tumbled 22 percent on days when indexes of similar companies were little changed.

After a week, 62 of 114 stocks hadn't recovered and 71 of them lagged behind their peers. The entire group posted an average weekly loss of 2 percent, trailing their respective peers by 2.6 percentage points.

In addition to SafeNet and QuickLogic, the worst performers included Comverse, the world's largest maker of voice-mail software. Its shares fell more than 21 percent in the week following the company's March disclosure, and trailed the 115-member S&P Supercomposite Technology Hardware and Equipment Index by 26 percentage points.

The stocks slid an average 5.6 percent after a month, and trailed their peers by 4.3 percentage points. Shares of 53 of 79 companies that compiled 30-day records by the review's cut-off date sold for less than their pre-announcement levels, and 51 lagged behind their benchmarks.

Fleeting Damage

Vitesse Semiconductor Corp. fell the most, losing 52 percent in the 30 days after the Camarillo, California-based designer of microchips for computer networks said on April 18 it was investigating its options grants. The 39-member S&P Supercomposite Semiconductors Sub-Industry Index fell 4 percent, according to Bloomberg data.

For some companies, the damage proved fleeting. Asyst Technologies Inc., a company in Fremont, California, that makes semiconductor equipment, fell 4 percent June 14, a day when similar companies rose 1.7 percent. The gap with its peers widened to 8.6 percentage points after a week. By mid-July, though, Asyst shares were 11 percent above the pre-announcement level, and almost 13 percentage points ahead of its rivals.

The shock value of the revelations may also be wearing off. The average one-day loss for the first 30 companies to disclose investigations, from March 14 to May 25, was 2.9 percent, or 2.8 percentage points worse than their peers. The last 30 disclosures as of Aug. 31 prompted an average decline of 1 percent, trailing peers by 1.2 percentage points.

Hardest Hit

Some of the hardest-hit companies, including Comverse and Vitesse, have changed their top management. Alexander, Comverse's founder, became a fugitive after failing to appear to face charges in August stemming from the backdating probe. Vitesse, which fired CEO Louis Tomasetta and two other top officers on May 17, faces probes by an internal panel, the SEC and the Justice Department, more than a dozen investor lawsuits and pressure from hedge funds to repay debt immediately because it violated bond agreements.

Price declines reflect doubts by investors about management's integrity, said Charles Di Bona, a software analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. in New York. He said investors remain wary even after top executives have been replaced.

``Companies that are inclined to do this don't necessarily have shareholders' interests at heart," said Di Bona, ranked among the industry's top three analysts by Institutional Investor magazine. ``There are easier ways to make money than taking a gamble that conditions have changed."

Most Are Honest

The problems remind investors of ``greedy and venal" executives, said Bill Riegel, chief equity manager at New York-based TIAA-CREF, which oversees $380 billion of assets. ``It gives me some pause."

Most managers are honest, Riegel said, and that might make the declines of some companies a chance to buy. He cited shares of Apple Computer, the Cupertino, California-based maker of iPods and computers, which TIAA-CREF already owns.

Apple said June 29 it was investigating stock-option grants, including an award to CEO Steve Jobs. The stock dropped more than 6 percent in the next week. The stock has since gained 37 percent, compared with 9.7 percent for the S&P index that tracks computer and peripheral equipment makers.

``The market has a tendency to overshoot on fear," Riegel said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors In C.I.A. Leak Put Spending At $1.4 Million (AP)

The Associated Press, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 (AP) — Prosecutors said Tuesday that they had spent $1.44 million investigating the leak of a Central Intelligence Agency officer's identity in 2003.

Because the special prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and other lawyers in the case were already on the government payroll, most of the costs were covered as a "paper transfer" from one government account to another, Mr. Fitzgerald's office said.

The only additional cost to taxpayers was $333,000, mostly for travel and contractual services like research and court recorders. Investigators did not rent office space here, eliminating an expense that drove up costs for other investigations of top officials.

"We do believe we were very conscientious with the expenditure of taxpayer funds," a spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald's office, Randall Samborn, said.

Since 2003, Mr. Fitzgerald has been investigating the leak of the identity of Valerie Wilson, who says her name was disclosed as retribution for her husband's criticism of the Bush administration's intelligence before the Iraq invasion.

Nobody has been charged with leaking her name. The sole person charged in the case, I. Lewis Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, faces charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. Mr. Fitzgerald's costs were compiled and reported to the Government Accountability Office, which audits special prosecutors two times a year. The G.A.O. is expected to release a report Friday on Mr. Fitzgerald's spending for the last six months.

His office released the total, current through Aug. 31, in response to a request on Tuesday by The Associated Press.

For comparison, another independent counsel, David M. Barrett, spent more than $20 million in an investigation of former Housing Secretary Henry G. Cisneros that lasted a decade. The investigation of President Clinton's business dealings cost about $70 million after evolving into an examination of his sexual behavior that resulted in his impeachment.

Independent and special prosecutors are not required to include Federal Bureau of Investigation salaries in their figures. Neither the C.I.A. leak case nor the Cisneros investigation included those costs. The Clinton investigation totals included the F.B.I. salaries.

Mr. Libby is due in court on Wednesday for a closed hearing over whether he can use President Bush's daily terrorism briefings and other classified documents as evidence. He wants to show that he did not lie to the authorities, saying he simply did not remember because he had more weighty issues on his mind.

Prosecutors have said Mr. Libby is trying to sabotage the case by requesting so much classified information that the government will be forced to withhold it and let the case be dismissed.

CIA Leak Probe Relatively Inexpensive (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who investigated whether senior Bush administration officials illegally leaked the name of a CIA operative for political payback, has spent $1.4 million in his probe over the past three years, his office reported yesterday -- a figure that establishes him as remarkably frugal in the ranks of recent special investigators.

Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr's investigations of President Bill Clinton's affair with Monica S. Lewinsky and his ties to the failed Whitewater land investment cost $71.5 million and took eight years. Independent Counsel David M. Barrett's examination of Clinton housing secretary Henry G. Cisneros over an extramarital affair and potential illegal payments cost $21 million and lasted 10 years.

Nevertheless, some are already arguing about whether the parsimonious prosecutor's expenditures in the Valerie Plame case were worth the results.

DOJ_NMG_0070041

Fitzgerald's probe roiled the White House, laid bare an Oval Office intent on squelching a critic of the Iraq war and forced reporters to do the unthinkable -- name their confidential sources. Though Fitzgerald debated for months whether to charge Bush Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove with a crime, the investigation eventually led to no charges of a criminal leak.

Instead, Vice President Cheney's chief of staff was charged with obstruction of justice, perjury and lying to investigators. I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who resigned his post the day he was indicted in October 2005, is scheduled to stand trial in January.

The true cost to taxpayers of Fitzgerald's operation is actually $333,000, according to his spokesman Randall Samborn, because Fitzgerald has relied on a handful of federal prosecutors in Chicago, where he is the U.S. attorney, and in the Justice Department in Washington, and made use of government offices in both locations.

The government would pay rent and utilities for that office space anyway, and those prosecutors would be getting a government paycheck even if they weren't now spending their work hours marshaling evidence against Libby and duking it out with his defense lawyers in pretrial skirmishes. The probe's salary and building costs total $1.1 million.

Judge To Weigh Evidence In CIA Leak Case (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Associated Press, September 26, 2006

A closed-door hearing beginning Wednesday will deal with a crucial issue in the trial of a former White House aide: whether President Bush's daily terrorism briefings and other sensitive documents should be disclosed in the CIA leak case.

The hearing, which could last several days, will help establish what classified information is relevant to the case against Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

He is accused of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about his conversations in 2003 with reporters regarding CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Libby wants to use the daily intelligence briefings and terrorism threat assessments as evidence to show he had important things on his mind and honestly didn't remember details about his conversations with reporters.

Prosecutors have said Libby is trying to sabotage the case by requesting so much classified information that the government will be forced to withhold it and let the case be dismissed. It's a legal tactic known as "graymail."

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued in court papers filed late Monday that the intelligence briefings fall outside the rules of evidence and should not be allowed as evidence.

Fitzgerald was less opposed to Libby's request for records regarding former Ambassador Joseph Wilson's trip to Niger, saying they could be considered on a case-by-case basis. Wilson, Plame's husband, discounted reports that Saddam Hussein sought to buy uranium from the African country — a claim Bush later included in his State of the Union address.

After the hearing, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton will decide what documents should be allowed as evidence. He will then hold a second hearing, which also could take days, to decide how the documents should be blacked out or summarized to protect national security.

If, after those hearings, government officials still believe national security would be jeopardized, they can refuse to release the classified information. That could lead to the case being dismissed before trial starts in January.

Gotti Jurors Say They're Deadlocked (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The federal jury in the racketeering conspiracy trial of John A. Gotti sent a note to the judge this afternoon saying they were deadlocked and unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

Judge Shira A. Scheindlin read the panel the Allen charge, an instruction meant to encourage juries to continue working until they reach a verdict, and sent them back to continue deliberating.

It is unclear how long the jurors — seven women and five men — will continue to deliberate, but Judge Scheindlin told them if they felt they were close to reaching a verdict by later this afternoon that the court would pay for dinner and give them rides home.

If the jury is unable to reach a verdict, it would be the third mistrial on the racketeering charges in the past year for Mr. Gotti. This is the sixth day of this jury's deliberations. In Mr. Gotti's first trial, the jury deliberated for eight days. In the second, the deliberations lasted one and a half days.

"We have vigorously debated each charge," read the note from the jury to Judge Scheindlin. "We have been unable to reach a unanimous verdict."

The jurors did say that of the four counts Mr. Gotti is facing, they had been able to reach a decision on only part of one of the racketeering conspiracy charges: the kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and radio talk show host.

DOJ_NMG_0070042

The jury's note did not say what decision it had reached on that count.

Mr. Gotti, known as Junior, faces two racketeering counts, as well as counts of witness tampering and conspiracy to commit construction industry extortion.

During the deliberations, it became apparent from the notes seeking explanation from Judge Scheindlin that the jury was having a difficult time reaching a verdict on the key element of the case — whether Mr. Gotti had quit the Gambino organized-crime family at some point before July 1999.

If Mr. Gotti did withdraw from the crime family before that date, he would be immune from prosecution because the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges would have expired. Mr. Gotti's defense is that he did, in effect, resign from the mob in 1999 after receiving permission from his father, John J. Gotti, who was known as the Dapper Don. The elder Gotti, who was the boss of the Gambino family from the mid-1980's to the late 1990's, died in prison in 2002.

During the current trial for the younger Gotti, both the government and the defense played F.B.I. recordings of Mr. Gotti while he was serving a prison sentence on unrelated racketeering charges from 1999 to 2004 in Ray Brook federal penitentiary in upstate New York.

During some of the tapes, Mr. Gotti is heard telling visitors that he had left his previous life of crime behind. In others, it sounds as if Mr. Gotti still had a role in the Gambino family, even behind bars. Prosecutors said that Mr. Gotti was aware he was being recorded when he made remarks about having quit the Gambino family, but Mr. Gotti's lawyers said his remarks had been heartfelt.

After the jury's note was read today, prosecutors left the courtroom with grim faces, while Charles Carnesi, Mr. Gotti's lead lawyer, flashed a broad smile.

There has been a gag order during the trial, which bars lawyers from discussing the case.

Jury In 3rd Gotti Trial Deadlocked (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A jury deliberating the fate of John "Junior" Gotti at his third racketeering trial told the judge Tuesday it was unable to agree on a verdict. The judge asked the jury to try again.

The jury released a note after noon saying it had only been able to agree on one of two acts it must decide before reaching a verdict on the racketeering charge.

"We have been unable to reach a unanimous verdict on all charges," the jury said. "We feel we are deadlocked."

From the start, the jury has sought evidence aimed at deciding whether Gotti quit the Gambino crime family before July 1991, as he claims. If so, a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before prosecutors brought new racketeering charges in 2004.

The jury was in its sixth day of deliberations. It had asked for some evidence to be read back as it deliberated over the last week, but the panel has not been particularly noisy in a courthouse where jurors can sometimes be heard shouting at one another.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin encouraged the jurors to give it another try, saying the case would likely have to be tried again and it was unlikely that another jury would be better able to judge the evidence. Two previous juries in the last year wound up deadlocked, with resulting mistrials.

"I know it's been long but there's still no hurry," she said. "I ask you with great respect that you continue your deliberations and I await your word whatever it may be."

Defense lawyers say Gotti paid a large fine when he pleaded guilty to a racketeering charge in another case in 1999 and was permitted to keep the property and businesses which remained, regardless of where the money originated.

Gotti has also been accused of ordering two 1992 attacks on radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa, including one in which Sliwa was shot twice before he escaped out the window of a car.

Prosecutors have said Gotti was retaliating for on-air attacks against his father, John Gotti, who was sentenced in 1992 to life in prison without parole. He died in prison in 2002.

If convicted, Gotti could face up to 30 years in prison. He is free on $7 million bail.

DOJ Can Question Staffers In Crawford Probe (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

The Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee has agreed to turn over documents and allow three staffers to provide testimony to the Justice Department as part of the federal investigation into Lester Crawford, the former head of the Food and Drug Administration.

The U.S. attorney's office in the District of Columbia is conducting a probe into Crawford's statements about his financial holdings during confirmation hearings before the panel in 2005.

The Senate approved a resolution on Monday authorizing the committee to cooperate with the federal investigation. Under Senate rules, no evidence in the Senate's possession may be turned over to an outside body unless the full chamber approves it.

"Chairman [Mike] Enzi (R-Wyo.) and the committee staff are working to be helpful to the U.S. attorney's office and cooperating fully with their investigation at this point," said Craig Orfield, communications director for the panel.

Crawford resigned as head of the FDA in September 2005 after only two months on the job. Prior to his resignation, Crawford sold more than $50,000 in stock in a company regulated by the agency, according to The Associated Press. Crawford now works at the lobbying firm Policy Directions Inc.

Crawford, who held several senior posts at the FDA before becoming commissioner in July 2005, has refused to testify in a lawsuit that challenges the FDA's handling of the controversial contraceptive drug known as the "morning-after pill" or "Plan B," which is manufactured by Barr Pharmaceuticals.

Crawford's lawyer told reporters earlier this year that he would not testify in the case because it might incriminate him in a grand jury probe of his financial holdings. The attorney, Biz Van Gelder, could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 26, 2006

A nuclear engineer who formerly worked for Westinghouse Electric Corp. pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court to conspiracy and tax evasion.

Initially, Mark M. Kaushansky, 55, of Monroeville, was charged with helping Russia's former atomic energy minister steal more than $9 million in aid money from the U.S. Department of Energy.

But the plea before Senior U.S. District Judge Maurice B. Cohill included just nine of the original 20 counts against him, and they all related to tax evasion.

"He admitted there's some tax problems," said Mr. Kaushansky's defense attorney, Fred Thieman. "It's been our position from the beginning: We denied there was a scheme to skim money from the energy contracts with Russia."

Now the question will be how much money Mr. Kaushansky owes in unpaid taxes.

The government contends the amount is more than $5 million, dating to the mid-1990s. Mr. Thieman, believes, however, that the loss is "substantially lower."

"We intend to show it's neither the magnitude [nor] underlying scheme the government alleged," Mr. Thieman said.

He hopes to convince the judge at Mr. Kaushansky's sentencing hearing in February that the money the government alleges was involved in the case is not taxable in the United States.

At a loss between $2.5 million and $7 million, Mr. Kaushansky would likely face a prison term of 46 to 57 months.

The sentencing hearing, scheduled to begin on Feb. 5, is expected to last at least four days for both sides to dispute that figure.

Mr. Kaushansky came to the United States from Ukraine in 1979. He met his co-defendant, Dr. Yevgeny Adamov, in 1990 when acting as a translator for him in talks with Westinghouse officials.

According to the U.S. attorney's office, Mr. Kaushansky and Dr. Adamov began working together. They incorporated two businesses, one in Pennsylvania and another in Delaware, and used two shell investment companies, with accounts in the United States, France and Monaco, to divert some of the money earmarked for NIKIET, a Russian nuclear research institute headed by Dr. Adamov.

That institute was designed to modernize nuclear reactors in Russia and Eastern Europe like the one at Chernobyl where there was a meltdown in 1986. Sixteen different countries contributed funds to it, including the United States.

As part of his plea agreement, Mr. Kaushansky agreed to forfeit any proceeds in the bank accounts in Monaco. He did not, however, agree to cooperate in the government's case against Dr. Adamov.

The Adamov case has been put on an indefinite hold since Swiss officials ruled in December that Dr. Adamov would be returned to Russia to stand trial instead of being extradited to the United States.

Man With Russian Ties Pleads Guilty In Fraud (PTR)

DOJ_NMG_0070044

By Jason Cato

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 26, 2006

The Monroeville business partner of former Russian nuclear energy minister Yevgeny Adamov pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to conspiring to defraud the United States and to a litany of tax evasion charges, though he disagrees with prosecutors about how much he owes.

Mark Kaushansky, 55, will try to prove during a four-day hearing in February that he owes significantly less than the $5 million prosecutors say he owes. That could earn him significantly less time in prison than the approximately five years he faces if the government is right.

In pleading guilty to nine counts of conspiracy and tax evasion, Kaushansky avoided more serious offenses of money laundering and interstate transportation of stolen property. He maintains his long-standing argument that he was not involved in an international scheme to rip off the United States with Adamov.

"I just decided to admit that some irregularities were made," Kaushansky told U.S. District Judge Maurice Cohill when asked why he was pleading guilty. He originally pleaded innocent in May 2005, when he and Adamov were indicted and accused of stealing more than $9 million intended to upgrade security at Russian nuclear plants.

Prior to serving as Russia's nuclear energy minister from 1998 to 2001, Adamov headed a secret Russian energy technology institute known as NIKIET. The institute was to handle the international money earmarked for nuclear plant improvements.

Prosecutors say Kaushansky and Adamov routed $15 million provided by the United States and other countries to bank accounts in Pittsburgh, Delaware and Monaco between 1993 and 2003.

Kaushansky's lawyer, former U.S. Attorney Fred Thieman, said instability in Russia at the time caused his client and Adamov to move the money the way they did. Otherwise, it would have been at risk if kept in Russian banks.

Charges against Adamov will not be dropped, although prosecutors doubt he will ever come to the United States to stand trial.

Adamov, 67, was the main target of the federal investigation.

The U.S. had him arrested in Switzerland in May 2005, but lost an extradition battle with Russia. Adamov was returned to Moscow, where he faces fraud and abuse-of-office charges.

Kaushansky moved to the United States from the Soviet Union in 1979. He was working as a nuclear power plant engineer at Westinghouse Electric Corp. when he met Adamov in the early 1990s.

Man Pleads In Russia Nuclear Cash Case (WP/AP)

By Dan Nephin, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

PITTSBURGH -- A former nuclear engineer accused of helping a former Russian official steal more than $9 million earmarked for improving the safety of that country's Chernobyl-style reactors pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy and tax evasion.

Mark M. Kaushansky, of Monroeville, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government and eight tax evasion counts. Like former Russian nuclear energy minister Yevgeny Adamov, he also has been charged with additional conspiracy counts and money laundering, but Kaushansky's attorney, Fred Thieman, said he expected those charges to be dropped at sentencing.

Asked by the judge why he was pleading guilty, Kaushansky said, "I just decided to admit that some tax-related irregularities were made."

Kaushansky had a business partnership with Adamov, whom Russian President Vladimir Putin fired in 2001. Prosecutors allege the defendants stole $9 million from the U.S., other countries and corporations by setting up corporations in the U.S. to funnel money to themselves that was intended to improve Russia's nuclear safety.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said in a statement that the indictment alleges Adamov was primarily responsible for diverting the money, but that Kaushansky "was most directly involved with the concealment and expenditure of those funds."

U.S. prosecutors wanted to try Adamov here, but Russian officials said he should face trial in his home country. He has denied the charges against him and awaits trial in Russia.

Kaushansky, who emigrated from the Soviet Union in 1979, was working as a researcher at Westinghouse Electric Corp. and as a translator when he met Adamov, according to the indictment.

Kaushansky's sentencing hearing was scheduled for Feb. 5, but is expected to take several days because both sides will present evidence about the amount of income for which he tried to evade taxes. Prosecutors say the counts involve income of more than $5 million, but Thieman said it is a fraction of that figure.

In 1986, a shattered reactor at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant spewed radiation across much of Europe, contaminated 77,220 square miles and forced the Soviet government to permanently evacuate more than 300,000 people. Dozens died within months, and the U.N. health agency estimated last year that the ultimate death toll from Chernobyl-related cancers will be more than 9,000.

FBI Returns For More From Stevens' Office (ADN)

By RICHARD MAUER And LISA DEMER

Anchorage Daily News, September 27, 2006

FBI agents returned last week to the legislative office of Senate President Ben Stevens and seized more evidence, including a copy of a sworn statement that implicated Stevens in an alleged payment scheme involving fisheries legislation brought by his father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

Word of the second search, and what was taken by the FBI, came from Ben Stevens himself, who disclosed the information in a letter to the Daily News dated Sept. 22. In his letter, Stevens denied a request by the newspaper for a copy of any FBI search warrants which may have been served on him or his office, and the government's receipts for items seized. But Stevens provided what he said was a "complete listing of what was obtained from my legislative offices" on Aug. 31 and Sept. 18.

Stevens, a Republican who is not seeking re-election this year, said he voluntarily consented to the two FBI searches, though federal agents said they had a judge's warrant for the Aug. 31 search.

Among the material hauled off by agents, Stevens said, were binders on the proposed natural gas pipeline and revised oil taxes, as well as information on a board that doled out federal marketing money to fisheries companies, some of which paid him as a consultant. Stevens was chairman of that board until about six months ago.

The vast majority of items on Stevens' list were public records that could have been obtained by anyone, sometimes under a formal public information request, sometimes just for asking. For instance, the FBI seized the 2006 Legislative directory, the 2003 Legislative Ethics Training Manual, federal and state laws governing North Slope gas, and a "piece of paper" with the tax identification number for Stevens' consulting firm, Stevens and Associates.

Though much has been made of the FBI's apparent interest in the relationship between legislators and the politically active oil field service and construction company Veco -- the company itself was searched, and it was mentioned in other search warrants -- Stevens listed only a single Veco document taken by the FBI: an undated memo to Veco president Pete Leathard.

Stevens' list couldn't be independently verified and he wouldn't elaborate on anything. The FBI has said little about its investigation, aside from acknowledging serving 24 search warrants Aug. 31 and Sept. 1. The offices of six legislators were targeted Aug. 31, and Stevens is the only one the FBI returned to for a second round, said FBI spokesman Eric Gonzalez. No one has been charged.

It was also impossible to determine the significance of any particular item seized -- whether it was scooped up to determine its relevance later, or central to the inquiry. That's normal in a federal investigation, said former U.S. Attorney Wev Shea, now in private practice in Anchorage. FBI agents will seize records through a warrant rather than simply ask for them as public records to make sure they are getting everything, he said. Plus, the drama of the FBI raids themselves may have been designed to stir things up and get people talking as the investigation continues.

"They don't know what phones are tapped. Nor do they know who is wired," said Shea, who added that he doesn't have inside information of the case.

The FBI has been asking some state legislators about the debate on the gas pipeline and oil taxes, and those subjects make up the largest haul from Stevens' office Aug. 31.

The government also seized Stevens' Rolodex containing business cards and a phone log, made a copy of the hard drive of a Gateway computer, and took an 80-gigabyte hard drive, an untitled compact disc and something described as an "e-mail found on printer."

Some of the material goes beyond issues known to be important to Veco like the gas pipeline and touch on fishery subjects that involve Ben's father, long-time U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska. Since 2005, Ted Stevens has chaired the Senate Commerce Committee, through which all fisheries legislation passes. Before that, he chaired the Senate Appropriations Committee, one of the most powerful seats in Congress.

Among fishery-related items, Ben Stevens reported that in the second search, the FBI seized "Victor Smith affidavit" and a 2004 "UFA" letter -- United Fishermen of Alaska. Agents also took two April 2006 letters he wrote to the U.S. Department of Commerce regarding the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, which he headed from its creation by Ted Stevens in 2003 until his resignation earlier this year.

The second search also yielded a Jan. 23 fax to Ted Stevens along with "unknown documents of Ted Stevens with a cover page dated 6/5/06 bearing the United States Senate seal."

Through a spokesman, Ted Stevens said he had no comment.

Ben Stevens, a former crab-boat captain, has maintained an active fisheries consulting business since being named to a vacant Senate seat in 2001, disclosing $775,435 in income from nine companies and associations since then. He has never publicly said what he has done for the money.

Victor Smith, a former Southeast Alaska salmon fisherman who now operates a barge in north Puget Sound, said Monday he has signed three affidavits regarding Ben Stevens. The affidavits helped form the basis of complaints brought against Ben Stevens at the Alaska Public Offices Commission and other agencies by Ray Metcalfe, a government watchdog and founder of the independent Republican Moderate Party in Alaska.

It could not be determined which of Smith's affidavits the agents seized. In one, he reported attending a 2004 meeting of the Purse Seine Vessel Owners Association in which officials of that organization and the Southeast Alaska Seiners Association discussed how it would pay Ben Stevens after congressional passage of a $50 million loan program to reduce the seine fleet.

Smith said he learned Ben Stevens was supposed to be paid "through convoluted accounting" $5,000 a month to secure a plan, and $10,000 a month if successful, until he was paid $500,000.

While the loan program passed Congress and was enacted into law, fishermen complained it was too expensive for them to use.

Bob Thorstenson Jr., executive director of the seiners association and president of the United Fishermen of Alaska, denied paying Ben Stevens to lobby Ted Stevens. In an interview last year, he said the payments of $3,000 a month were made starting in June 2004 to an Anchorage company, Advance North, in which Stevens and one of his father's former aides, Trevor McCabe, were 50-50 partners. McCabe became sole owner of the company in October 2005.

In both searches of Stevens' offices, FBI agents seized documents involving the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board. The organization was created in 2003 in legislation by Ted Stevens to provide federal grants to companies to promote Alaska seafood. It has distributed between $5 million and nearly $10 million a year in grants.

At least three of the beneficiaries of grants from the board paid consulting fees to Ben Stevens. Metcalfe complained to the APOC last year that those fees were thinly disguised "kickbacks," but the commission only ruled on a technicality: Ben Stevens' failure to disclose his chairmanship of the board in 2004. It fined him $150.

Ben Stevens resigned from the marketing board about six months ago, according to its executive director, Bill Hines. Hines wouldn't say whether he has recently spoken to federal agents.

"I think that's between me and the FBI," said Hines, an employee of the U.S. Commerce Department.

Ben Stevens was a member of the Senate Ethics Committee and some of the seized documents were connected to that committee, including a 2003 ethics complaint against former Sen. Jerry Ward. An investigation concluded the complaint was without merit.

No Leniency: Ailing Gambino Captain Sent To Prison For 12 Years (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- An ailing 74-year-old Gambino crime family captain who once recommended an undercover FBI agent for mob membership asked a judge for leniency Tuesday but received more than 12 years in prison instead.

"Give me one more shot," Gregory DePalma, who uses a wheelchair, asked U.S. District Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein, who presided over a trial in which DePalma was convicted of racketeering.

"If you were in my shoes," the judge replied, "I don't think you would."

"You gotta do what you gotta do, so let's do it," DePalma then grumbled shortly before he was sentenced to 12 years and seven months in prison for crimes he committed after he was freed from prison in early 2003.

When the judge rejected the Department of Probation's suggestion that DePalma receive less than the minimum of 12 years called for by sentencing guidelines and imposed the sentence, DePalma said, "I'll be dead maybe in about five."

The judge, calling DePalma "a man thoroughly immersed in criminal activity," said he could not be lenient because leniency toward DePalma in the past had not led him to avoid crime when he was out of prison.

DePalma was convicted June 6 by a jury in a case that featured the exploits of Joaquin Garcia, a rotund FBI agent who capped a career of disguises by posing as "Big Jack" Falcone.

DePalma believed Garcia's act enough that he recommended he be made a member of the crime family. Before that could happen, DePalma and 31 others were arrested.

DePalma's lawyers had protested the government's use of sophisticated bugging devices placed in their client's cellular telephone that enabled investigators to listen to conversations even when the telephone was off.

Lawyer John L. Pollok had accused the government of turning DePalma into a "human microphone" with the eavesdropping devices.

The judge said the government received proper approval from courts as it steadily increased the scope of its audio surveillance, trying to destroy the new leadership of the crime family during a three-year probe.

The ruling cleared the way for the government's use of parts of 5,000 hours of taped conversations showing DePalma working energetically from 2003 to 2005 extorting restaurants, construction companies and a Bronx topless nightclub, where he was introduced to the undercover agent.

DePalma once was photographed with Frank Sinatra and enjoyed exaggerating or boasting of his connections.

On tapes, DePalma described getting a former manager for Liza Minnelli to finance a $12,000 eight-day trip for mob wives to Las Vegas. Prosecutors called the man one of DePalma's victims.

At a trial in which DePalma used an oxygen tube in his nose, prosecutors made his health an issue, telling jurors he had boasted after a 1999 racketeering guilty plea that he had duped the judge with an illness act worthy of an Academy Award.

They played tapes of him bragging that he wore an oxygen mask and did not shave for a week before sentencing, leading the judge to say he had never sentenced a man so sick.

On Tuesday, DePalma told the judge he wanted to show prosecutors his swollen legs to prove how ill he remained from heart and lung problems.

The judge disallowed it, but he did engage DePalma in conversation in which both of them alluded to their military careers and talked about the perils of aging.

DePalma said the 72-year-old judge seemed in better health than he was, a fact the judge did not deny.

"Then again," the judge told DePalma, "I haven't lived your life."

Judge Has No Mercy For Gambino Gabber (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 27, 2006

Gabby Gambino capo Greg DePalma had a few things to say before a Manhattan federal judge sentenced him to 12 years and seven months in prison on racketeering charges yesterday.

"Give me one more shot," DePalma said in asking for leniency.

"If you were in my shoes," Judge Alvin Hellerstein replied, "I don't think you would."

Hellerstein noted that DePalma, 74, had returned to a life of crime after pleading guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 and receiving a break at sentencing then.

DePalma, who in his salad days posed beside Frank Sinatra and fellow wiseguys for an infamous 1976 photo, was brought into court in a wheelchair, hooked up to an oxygen tank.

He has had a lung removed and suffers from a heart ailment that has left his legs swollen and cracked. Attorney John Meringolo asked that DePalma be allowed to show the judge his legs but was turned down.

"I'll be dead, maybe in about five [years]," DePalma predicted.

In addition to the prison time, Hellerstein ordered DePalma to pay some $70,000 in restitution to two extortion victims.

"How much?" DePalma asked. "Can I give them my Social Security check?"

DePalma's motor-mouth was intercepted by a bug the FBI placed in his cell phone with the help of undercover agent Joaquin Garcia, who so deeply infiltrated the mob that DePalma was ready to sponsor his Mafia induction.

Defense attorney Martin Geduldig told Hellerstein that his client could never again return to a life of crime because the recordings had implicated so many mobsters that DePalma's life was in jeopardy.

"Five thousand hours of recorded conversations had the effect of making him an informant for the FBI," Geduldig said. "He's put himself in a position where he can't go back to some of his old compatriots."

Politicos Mull Data Retention By Web Hosts, Registrars (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 27, 2006

Broadening their inquiry beyond ISPs, they ponder mandates for storage of user records to aid child porn investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0070048

WASHINGTON--Politicians on Tuesday urged domain name registries and Web hosting companies to do more to keep illicit child pornography off the Internet and indicated mandatory retention of user records is an option under consideration.

At a hearing here convened by a U.S. House of Representatives subcommittee on oversight and investigations, Michigan Rep. Bart Stupak, the panel's top-ranking Democrat, asked company representatives how they would feel about being subject to a law in the works that would require Internet service providers to retain customer records for one year.

"If we do compel data retention, is there any reason Web hosting sites should be treated differently than ISPs?" Stupak asked the general counsel for GoDaddy.com, which bills itself as the largest domain name registrar in the world, and the CEO of Blue Gravity Communications, a New Jersey-based Web hosting firm. Both executives were participants on a panel at the latest in a series of hearings on the topic of online child exploitation.

"A year might be a little long," replied Thomas Krwawecz, Blue Gravity's CEO, later adding: "It would be something we would definitely be open to if there were some guidelines for maintaining that data for a specific period of time."

Christine Jones, general counsel for GoDaddy, said requirements to maintain particular customer data for hosting companies and ISPs alike would be "productive" for law enforcement. But the data, she added, should be limited to identifying information about subscribers, such as IP addresses and credit card numbers, and should not include the content of their communications.

Privacy and industry groups have generally voiced opposition to calls for mandatory data retention, which have become a fixture on the congressional agenda ever since Attorney General Alberto Gonzales touted the practice's necessity earlier this year.

Opponents to the mandate argue that existing laws already provide law enforcement with ample tools. For instance, a 1996 federal law called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act requires a practice known as "data preservation"--that is, Internet providers must retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity." Another federal law requires Internet service providers to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding that report to the appropriate police agency.

Some companies, such as Comcast, already voluntarily retain user data for longer periods. Blue Gravity, which hosts primarily adult pornography sites, retains data for seven to 14 days but plans to increase that window to 30 days to keep up with prevailing industry practices, Krwawecz said.

Last week, Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, said she hoped to introduce by the end of this week a proposal that would require Internet service companies to retain customer records for a period of one year. She described the proposal, whose language is still not finalized, as requiring maintenance only of information useful in locating a customer, such as an IP address, and not about the content of his or her communications.

A DeGette spokesman said Tuesday that the congresswoman continues to negotiate the language with Republican Reps. Joe Barton and Ed Whitfield. He could not predict exactly when the bill would be introduced or what its precise language would be.

At least two possibilities could be in play. One form of data retention legislation could require Internet providers and perhaps social networking sites and search engines to record for a year or two which IP address is used by which user. The other form would be far broader, requiring companies to record data such as the identities of e-mail correspondents, logs of who sent and received instant messages (but not the content of those communications), and the addresses of Web pages visited.

With or without such a mandate, the hosting and domain name firms should conduct more self-policing of the sites that live on their servers, said Whitfield, chairman of the oversight and investigations subcommittee. "Is there any kind of technology to monitor (for child pornography sites) that would be available for either GoDaddy or Blue Gravity?" he asked. "Is there technology you could acquire to do this in a more proactive manner?"

"If I had a staff of 1,000 people that could go and review all of our hosted pages every day, we would," said GoDaddy's Jones, adding that the company did investigate nearly 2,000 customers over allegations of child pornography or inappropriate child modeling Web sites in the last year. "But at $1.99 per month for a hosting account, the economics are not really there for us to do that."

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 27, 2006

Police have seized computers and other electronics from the Dupont Circle home in Northwest Washington where lawyer Robert Wone was stabbed to death Aug. 2, according to an affidavit in a search warrant for the house that was recently made public.

DOJ_NMG_0070049

The evidence, which included two laptops, a desktop computer, diskettes and USB drives, was among the material police confiscated during their monthlong search of the home at 1509 Swann St. N.W.

Wone, 32, who was the general counsel for Radio Free Asia, was found shortly before midnight "showing no signs of life" in the second-floor bedroom of the house, owned by his college friend Joseph Price, a partner at Arent Fox, according to the Aug. 4 affidavit by Detective William Xanten III. Price's partner, Victor Zaborsky, a marketing manager at the International Dairy Foods Association, co-owns the house. A third man, Dylan Ward, also lived there. All three were home the night of the murder.

One of the occupants told police that an intruder had come through the back door, but police say there were no signs of forced entry.

After their initial search of the house, police asked the court for an additional search warrant for electronic equipment because Wone and "one of the occupants" had e-mailed before the visit and had made phone calls in the "recent time period before the decedent was killed," according to the affidavit. In a separate search warrant for Price's office computer, police say that Price had spoken with Wone before he was killed.

But the material collected by police has not led to any arrests. Police believe the crime scene was tampered with before they arrived and are awaiting the results of forensic tests that will identify the blood that appeared to have been cleaned up in the area where Wone was found.

Supreme Court Accepts Arizona Death Penalty Case (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, September 27, 2006

The Supreme Court accepted an appeal Tuesday from Arizona, which wants to execute a twice-convicted killer who says his lawyer didn't do enough to ward off a death sentence.

Justices said they would review a decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said a lower court should consider Jeffrey Landrigan's claims that his lawyer was ineffective.

Landrigan escaped from an Oklahoma prison in 1989, where he was serving a 20-year term for murdering an acquaintance. A month later, he killed Chester Dyer, who picked up men on the Phoenix streets by flashing large sums of money.

As Landrigan and the man were drinking beer in the victim's Phoenix apartment, Landrigan strangled Dyer with an electrical cord and repeatedly punctured him with a screwdriver. He was convicted of killing Dyer and sentenced to death.

Dale Baich, who represents Landrigan in his appeals, said his client might have won a life term instead of a death sentence if his trial lawyer had submitted evidence that he was predisposed to violence and suffered brain damage that made him unable to appreciate his crimes.

Landrigan's father, Darrel Wayne Hill, had been on death row in Arkansas until he died of natural causes last year.

Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said Landrigan told the trial judge he did not want his lawyer to introduce evidence that would have mitigated against a sentence of death.

The Arizona Supreme Court, a federal district judge and a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit all rejected Landrigan's claims before the full appellate decided otherwise in March.

The case is Schriro v. Landrigan, 05-1575.

Biker Brawl Trial Opens In Las Vegas (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-Videotape images show rival motorcycle gang members wielding guns, knives, wrenches and chairs in a brawl that killed three and injured at least a dozen in a southern Nevada casino in 2002.

The footage is among hundreds of hours of videotape jurors may view during the trial of 11 Hells Angels charged in the deadly casino brawl.

Federal prosecutors are expected on Tuesday to tell jurors that the bikers plotted to attack the rival Mongols gang at the Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino after years of friction erupted into violence at a crowded motorcycle rally.

They are the first of 42 men - from California, Washington, Arizona, Alaska and Nevada, and ranging in age from 28 to 63 - to stand trial in the brawl. All face the possibility of life in prison if convicted of the most serious charge, racketeering-attempted murder.

Each has pleaded not guilty, and defense lawyers say the men will argue they were attacked first.

"The tapes are going to reveal clearly that the Hells Angels were threatened and were engaged in lawful self-defense," said lawyer David Chesnoff, who represents defendant Calvin Schaefer of Chandler, Ariz.

Chesnoff has argued previously that police knew trouble was brewing and federal agents missed a chance to prevent violence at the 2002 Laughlin rally, an annual event that draws tens of thousands of motorcycle enthusiasts to the Colorado River resort town about 100 miles southeast of Las Vegas.

Two Hells Angels were shot to death and a Mongols member died of stab wounds at the event. Another Hells Angels member was later found shot to death near his wrecked Harley-Davidson motorcycle on Interstate 40 in California, about 100 miles from Laughlin.

Court officials say the trial could take three months or more, with 11 defense lawyers questioning witnesses.

Federal prosecutors declined comment Monday through a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Las Vegas.

One defendant in the case remains a fugitive.

How A Google Search Can Become A Security Threat (NYT)

By David Strom

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WHEN Ralph Nader wrote "Unsafe at Any Speed" in 1965, he exposed how certain design decisions had made some automobiles inherently unsafe. Much the same can be said for Web sites these days.

Many sites contain inherent design flaws that leave them ripe for exploitation. Unlike lack of seat belts in cars, these flaws are not immediately obvious and the fixes are not simple.

One widespread vulnerability can be exploited through a practice that has come to be known as Google hacking. The term refers to the use of an Internet search site — Yahoo, Ask, Google or any other — to uncover useful and compromising information that has been inadvertently left on a Web site.

"Some Web site owners may simply not understand that their sites aren't as secure as they think," said Jeff Williams, chief executive of a Columbia, Md., consulting company, Aspect Security. Mr. Williams is also the chairman of the Open Web Application Security Project, a Web site that describes many of the vulnerabilities and provides tips on how to prevent or fix them.

Examples of the material that can be uncovered include the locations of Web security cameras, administrator passwords for applications like payroll or other personnel matters, private phone numbers for company executives and even the contents of Internet commerce transactions.

In most cases, intruders can enter sites and extract data without leaving a trace because the information is already indexed and stored on the servers of various Internet search sites.

These hacks require no special tools and little skill.

All that is needed is a Web-connectedPC and a few keywords to look for, like "filetype:sql password" or "index.of.pass word."

"There is a lot of privileged informa- tion that wasn't supposed to be played out in the public that is available with these sorts of attacks," said Jeff Pettorino, a senior consultant in the Global Security Consulting department of VeriSign and a former police officer in Colorado.

Much of the data indexed by the search sites can be used for nefarious means, and site owners may not realize that sensitive or confidential information is so readily available as part of a search index.

"If you are dealing with sensitive data or data that you care about, you have to think about these exploits," said Michael Howard, a senior security program manager at Microsoft in Redmond, Wash.

As more businesses put up Web sites, the chances increase that more of this information is available.

"A business owner has risks even if they aren't doing e-commerce and if they just have a Web site," said Shena Crowe, an agent in the F.B.I.'s San Francisco field office who has helped prosecute cybercriminals who used Google hacks and other techniques. "Once you are plugged into the Web, your backyard can become open, and it is easy to have your information taken from you."

While it isn't the only way Web sites are exposed, it is one of the easiest and most common methods to gain unauthorized information.

"At any given time, you can find thousands of sites that are subject to Google hacks," says Howard Schmidt, a former White House cybersecurity adviser and now a private security consultant in Issaquah, Wash.

Johnny Long, a security researcher with the Computer Sciences Corporation in El Segundo, Calif., said he had found vulnerabilities "in every Web site and application I have audited."

Mr. Long, who maintains a Web site cataloging Web security vulnerabilities, johnny.ihackstuff.com, added, "Some Google hacking style vulnerabilities are more revealing than others, but it is a pervasive threat."

Google acknowledges that its index can be misused. "Search engines reflect what is on the Web," said Barry Schnitt, a Google spokesman. "We still work to try to prevent and stop exploits and encourage Webmasters to employ best practices and effective security for their Web sites." On Google's site you can find tips on how to remove sensitive data from its index, for example.

Law enforcement is just stepping up to the challenges presented by search-based Web site intrusions.

"This is very underreported," says Kevin Patten, network services manager with the Florida Department of Law Enforcement in Tallahassee. "There are far more site breaches that take place than are actually reported. It is an embarrassing incident, and to report it could be monetarily devastating for a company."

Google hacks are an issue for both large and small businesses, but for different reasons.

Smaller companies generally have simpler sites but may be less sophisticated when it comes to auditing their software. And smaller businesses often rely on independent Web contractors that may not have the ability to build secure applications.

Larger companies usually have better security practices, but they use hundreds or even thousands of Web applications, which must be maintained by more people — some of whom may try to get at sensitive information they shouldn't see.

"Google hacking can find application vulnerabilities in many applications at once, so it works better as a shotgun than a rifle," Mr. Williams of Aspect Security said. "These vulnerabilities can be found and exploited with a minimum of effort by relatively unskilled attackers."

One way for businesses to protect themselves is to try the Google hacking methods themselves, using tips at johnny.ihackstuff.com and on the Owasp.org sites.

There are also free scanning tools that are available from numerous sites, including SPIdynamics.com, Qualys.com and ScanAlert.com. The tools check for open ports that allow outside communication with particular software programs or points of entry that could be used to compromise a Web site.

But using scanners is just the first step.

Business owners need to specifically address the security audits and testing services when they hire outside programmers to build their sites.

"What you have to get across," said Mr. Schmidt the security consultant, "is that 'I am not buying a service, I am buying a secure service.' " The Owasp site, he said, offers boilerplate contract language that can be used in dealing with programmers.

And the vigilance must be continuous. "It is always an arms race between security professionals and cybercriminals," said Scott Larson, a former F.B.I. computer intrusion manager who now works at Stroz Friedberg, a technical services firm in New York.

Even after "Unsafe at Any Speed" shook up the automobile industry, it took a while for Detroit to make safety a priority in designing cars. "And it's going to take years for the software industry to start building applications that adequately address security," said Mr. Williams of Aspect Security.

For wary business owners, it's time to buckle up.

Surging Losses, But Few Victims In Data Breaches (NYT)

By Steve Lohr

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

THE theft last May seemed scary. The personal information of more than 26 million military veterans was stolen from the home of an employee at the Department of Veterans Affairs. The personal details on the worker's laptop and an extra hard drive included veterans' names, birth dates and Social Security numbers — the nuggets most sought after by identity thieves.

Privacy groups warned darkly that 26 million people could become victims, politicians voiced outrage, and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales vowed to show "zero tolerance" in cases of identity theft traced to the lost data of veterans.

Last month, the case was solved, when three teenagers were charged in what proved to be a routine residential burglary in suburban Maryland. They had taken jewelry and cash, along with the laptop and hard drive. "They were a bunch of young thieves breaking into homes," said Lt. Mike Mancuso, deputy director for the major crime division of the Montgomery County Police Department. "They didn't know what they had."

The veterans' laptop episode underscores the crucial distinction between data loss and malicious data theft — a distinction that has often been glossed over or ignored in the recent wave of alarming disclosures of data breaches at government agencies, universities, companies and hospitals. In most cases, the consequences — financial and otherwise — of the data losses have been slight.

In the last 12 months alone, the personal records of nearly 73 million people, from Social Security numbers to credit-card accounts, have been lost or stolen, in reported incidents compiled by ID Analytics, a San Diego company that provides fraud-detection services to banks, cellphone operators and other companies. The total is the equivalent of nearly one in four Americans.

But while high-profile data breaches are common, there is no evidence of a surge in identity theft or financial fraud as a result. In fact, there is scant evidence that identity theft and financial fraud have increased at all. Even when computer networks are cracked into, and troves of personal information intentionally stolen, fraudsters can typically exploit only a tiny fraction of it.

Credit-card fraud is the most common crime of identity thieves, accounting for about two-thirds of cases. Banks and credit-card systems like Visa and MasterCard say they have seen surprisingly little fraud traceable to incidents of computer data lost or stolen.

"The threat of identity theft from data losses is being greatly exaggerated," said Fred H. Cate, the director of the Center for Applied Cybersecurity Research at Indiana University in Bloomington. "And that's because a lot of people have fallen into the trap of equating data loss with identity theft."

There may be a longer-than-expected lag between data breaches and online crime, law enforcement authorities concede. But all the personal information lost or stolen recently, they warn, is an ominous development. "We don't have the correlation to crime yet, but the potential is certainly there," said Raul Roldan, a special agent at the Federal Bureau of Investigation and section chief at the government's Internet Crime Complaint Center.

"Look at the crime on the Internet," Mr. Roldan said. "Most all of it is initiated by misusing identity information to disguise, mislead or impersonate someone else" — from pornography to phishing, a common fraud that usually involves using phony e-mail messages or Web sites to get a person's bank account or credit-card numbers.

One explanation as to why there has not been more crime recently, some computer security experts say, is that the volume of personal information lost or stolen might not have increased much over the last year or two. What has changed, they contend, is the attention given to data breaches.

The environment changed after the disclosure in February 2005 that thieves had duped the world's largest commercial data broker, ChoicePoint, into handing over personal information on more than 150,000 consumers.

In the aftermath, anxiety about the security of private consumer information rose, as did political pressure to take steps to help consumers. There has been a proliferation of state laws requiring companies to publicly disclose security breaches. By now, laws requiring companies to notify consumers when personal data has been lost or stolen have been adopted in 32 states.

"What's happened in the last 18 months is not an explosion in data loss and data theft," said Mark Rasch, a former Justice Department prosecutor who is now a legal consultant in Bethesda, Md., specializing in computer security. "It's an explosion of laws requiring notification of data loss."

Identity theft is not predominantly a computer crime, at least not yet. The most common forms of data loss, surveys say, are lost or stolen credit cards, wallets or checkbooks. In the majority of cases, identity thieves are family members, relatives, neighbors and co-workers. It seems that toxic social networks — not leaky computer networks — are the real hazard.

"Even if you solve the data breach problem, you will solve only a small part of the identity theft problem," said Mike Cook, a co-founder of ID Analytics.

Yet Mr. Cook, like other security experts, predicts a looming problem as more commerce moves to the Internet, a virtual marketplace of faceless transactions and instant credit. Lost and stolen consumer records, he said, can only worsen the problem.

Data breaches vary considerably, and so does the risk that financial fraud or identity theft may result. Customer or employee records on a computer disk or tape that have simply been lost in shipment — fallen off a truck, for example — are at little risk, computer security experts note.

Not all thefts are the same, either. Criminals who are after computer hardware, as in the Veterans Affairs case, are unlikely to exploit the personal information that happens to be stored inside. But the thefts that carry more risk, security experts say, involve criminals whose target is personal information, as in the ChoicePoint incident. Or when computer hackers last year got the account information of 40 million credit-card holders from CardSystems Solutions, a payment processor.

The kind of personal information stolen is also important. Pilfered credit-card accounts can be used to make fraudulent purchases, but those numbers alone are not enough to create false identities to open new credit or bank accounts. Federal law limits a consumer's liability to $50 for purchases made with a stolen credit card, and major card companies, including Visa, MasterCard and American Express, have zero liability policies.

Regardless of the data breach, a rise in financial fraud has not surfaced. Visa and MasterCard report that about 2 percent of the card accounts lost or stolen in the last 18 months have been used to make fraudulent purchases. That is within the range of the 1.5 percent and 4 percent of consumers who reported being victims of financial fraud or identity theft, surveys say.

Card companies say that fraud losses in 2005 over all were about 6 cents per $100 for merchandise bought on credit, a low level that has varied little in the last few years. (Numbers were much higher years ago; for example, in 1992, losses accounted for nearly 16 cents per $100 for merchandise bought on credit.)

"The amount of fraud from these data breaches is remarkably small," said Chris Thom, the chief risk officer for MasterCard.

In recent years, the card companies have used increasingly sophisticated computer technologies — like predictive modeling and neural network software — to track and curb fraud. Such tools can spot suspicious purchasing patterns, even as the purchases are being made. A result is that fraud rates have been cut by more than half over the years. "Despite the data breaches, we've been able to keep fraud at very low levels," said Nancy Hilgers, the vice president of processing and emerging products at Visa. "That shows that the technologies we use to control fraud are working."

Credit-card fraud cost banks in the United States $1.1 billion last year, according to bank reports compiled by The Nilson Report, a card-industry newsletter. That is a large but manageable number for the banking world, and it is a figure that raises questions about some alarming estimates of the nation's losses from identity theft, like a study issued by the Federal Trade Commission in 2003 that placed the annual loss at $48 billion.

Not all financial losses from identity theft are credit-card fraud. Merchant losses from fraud, for example, are estimated to be more than banks' losses, perhaps up to twice as much. But most industry analysts are skeptical that the actual losses are near the $48 billion estimate, which is widely quoted.

A study earlier this year by the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics came up with a far lower figure: $3.2 billion in identity theft losses during the six-month period it studied.

The data breaches of the past year or so still point to a worrying vulnerability. "It shows that punks and the criminal fraternity do have the ability to steal personal information," said Mr. Thom, the risk specialist at MasterCard.

There are already illicit Web sites that trade and sell stolen credit-card and personal information. The fear is that this cottage industry in crime will develop rapidly — exploiting the low costs and global reach of the Internet — into a broader, deeper and highly efficient worldwide market for fraud, said Naomi B. Lefkovitz, a lawyer with the F.T.C.'s division of privacy and identity protection. Combating the threat, she said, will require steady improvement in industry countermeasures, law enforcement and consumer awareness.

Even today's skeptics have qualms. "I do think the challenge to the future of computer security is tremendous," said Mr. Cate of Indiana University's cybersecurity center. "My concern is that by overstating the current problem, we will end up paying less attention and responding less effectively when far more serious problems do surface. It's like the boy who cried wolf."

Execution Sought For Two D.C. Men (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Federal prosecutors have filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty against two D.C. men charged with running a violent drug gang in Southeast.

The men, Antwuan Ball and David Wilson, reportedly led the Congress Park Crew, which authorities say dealt hundreds of kilograms of crack cocaine in Southeast for more than a decade. The gang resorted to homicide, assault and armed robbery, authorities said.

The move to seek the death penalty marks the second time in a year that the U.S. Department of Justice has declared it will seek capital punishment in the District.

In the other case, Larry Gooch, described as an enforcer in the M Street Crew in Northeast, has been charged in five killings and is expected to go to trial in January.

Only two capital murder cases have gone to trial in the District since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976. The District has no statute for the death penalty, but capital punishment can be pursued in federal cases if authorized by the U.S. attorney general.

However, there are questions about whether the move to seek the death penalty against Ball and Wilson came too late.

Last week, U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts issued a ruling barring the death penalty in the case.

Judge Roberts wrote that the Justice Department did not comply with his order setting a Sept. 15 deadline for a decision on whether to seek capital punishment. On Monday, the U.S. attorney's office filed the notice to seek the death penalty and asked Judge Roberts to reconsider.

"The process took as long as it did not because the government was insensitive to the speedy trial rights of the defendants, but because we were giving additional and extra careful consideration to defendants' interests," Assistant U.S. Attorneys Glenn S. Leon and Ann H. Petalas told Judge Roberts in a memo.

The filings also state that additional deliberations in the case and the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks contributed to the delay.

Attorneys for Ball and Wilson could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the District-based nonprofit Death Penalty Information Center, said yesterday that the Bush administration seems to have pursued death-penalty cases in jurisdictions where capital punishment is banned.

"There is a lot of discretion," Mr. Dieter said. "The current distraction appears more aggressive than the prior administration in seeking the death penalty in jurisdictions that don't have their own death penalty."

Mr. Dieter also said gang-related cases seem to be getting more attention in recent years.

"Gangs are not just one of the highlighted areas in the federal system, but states are looking at them, too," he said.

In Greenbelt, federal prosecutors have begun putting on trial those suspected of belonging to the MS-13 gang, including nine defendants facing the death penalty.

In the District, prosecutors filed charges against Ball, Wilson and more than a dozen other Congress Park Crew suspects under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, which was passed more than 30 years ago to target organized crime. The indictment includes four first-degree murder charges.

Prosecutors said Ball fatally shot Troy Lewis on Jan. 23, 1996. Ball and Wilson also are accused of conspiring to kill members of a rival gang, the 10th Place/Trenton Place Crew. Authorities said the two gangs have fought turf wars since the mid-1990s.

In addition, prosecutors said Ball used "intimidation and physical force" to keep witnesses to slayings silent.

Prosecutors said Ball used to be a lieutenant in the 1-5 Mob, whose leader, Tommy Edelin, faced the death penalty but was sentenced to life in prison in 2004.

The only other death-penalty case to go to trial in the District ended last year with the defendants sentenced to life in prison. Jurors deadlocked on giving the death penalty to Murder Inc. gang members Kevin L. Gray and Rodney Moore.

US Arrest Threat To Gambling Executives (FT)

By Andrew Ward And Roger Blitz

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

Louisiana police have warned all online gambling companies to stop accepting bets in the state or risk having their executives and directors arrested if they visit the US.

The police official responsible for the arrest of Peter Dicks, former chairman of Sportingbet, on a Louisiana warrant in New York three weeks ago, said the state was pressing ahead with its clampdown, in spite of what appears to be a rethink about the case in other political jurisdictions.

In his first interview since the arrest, Captain Joe Lentini, head of the casino section of Louisiana's Police Gaming Enforcement division, said the state had issued four arrest warrants for individuals associated with Sportingbet, including Mr Dicks.

He would not name the other three but said it was reasonable to assume they were executives or directors.

Other online gambling companies were also under investigation and their executives and directors were also at risk of arrest, said Mr Lentini, without naming which companies.

It is understood Louisiana has sealed warrants against more than 50 people working or connected to at least a dozen online gambling or related companies.

"We have agents all over the state working this daily," he said. "There are other sites we're looking into."

Louisiana is one of several US states that has its own laws prohibiting internet gambling.

Mr Lentini's comments came as lawyers continued to wrangle over the fate of Mr Dicks, who is scheduled to appear in a New York court on Thursday to learn whether he will be extradited to Louisiana.

Mr Dicks was allowed to return to the UK on bail two weeks ago to give New York and Louisiana authorities time to examine questions about the legitimacy of the arrest warrant.

George Pataki, governor of New York, has withdrawn the New York warrant required for his arrest and extradition. The case has also reached the office of Kathleen Blanco, governor of Louisiana, which last week said it was "doing due diligence on the case and reviewing the entire situation".

The New York hearing comes at a critical time for the industry, as the US Senate prepares to decide whether to pass a bill tightening federal laws against online gambling. The bill is being championed by Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, who is trying to get an online gambling provision attached to a weighty bill, such as defence or security.

Mr Lentini said the hold-up in the Dicks case was caused by a "glitch" in New York state laws that appeared to allow extradition only in cases where the alleged crime was committed in one of the two states involved.

Mr Dicks' lawyers have argued that their client cannot be extradited because he has not been in Louisiana for more than 20 years and therefore cannot have committed a crime there.

But Mr Lentini said his agency would press ahead with its pursuit of online gambling companies, even if Mr Dicks wins his bid to avoid extradition.

Gang Named In Violent Spell (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 27, 2006

2 alleged members of growing Hispanic group on trial for conspiracy

Mata, viola, controla.

The Spanish words for "murder," "rape" and "control" are the battle cry for La Mara Salvatrucha, a violent street gang known as MS-13 and responsible for a recent wave of attacks across Southern Maryland, according to federal prosecutors.

The racketeering conspiracy trial against two alleged MS-13 members -- Edgar Alberto Ayala, known as "Pony," and Oscar Ramos Velasquez, known as "Casper" -- started Tuesday with allegations that the men participated in a well-oiled criminal organization responsible for at least six homicides and five attempted killings.

Formed in California by Salva doran immigrants who have spread eastward, MS-13 "is without any doubt a criminal enterprise," Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson told jurors Tuesday. "The objective of this gang is to kill people."

Dubbed one of the nation's most violent and fastest-growing gangs, MS-13 has a relatively low profile outside of the Washington suburbs. But experts say its strength is growing throughout Maryland as the overall Hispanic population expands its reach beyond Prince George's and Montgomery counties.

"We know that they've moved up into the Laurel area," said Gaithersburg police Detective Patrick Word, president of the Mid-Atlantic Regional Gang Investigators Network. "They keep inching their way north."

Last month, Baltimore County police charged four suspected MS-13 gang members, accusing them in the stabbing deaths of two men whose bodies were found near a school in Arbutus in January. Officials say the killings are the first related to MS-13 activity in the county.

Substantial signs of the gang's activity have also been seen in Howard County. Anne Arundel, Baltimore and Harford counties recently formed new efforts to combat gang activity, concerned in part about MS-13 as well as other violent street groups moving in.

The federal trial under way in Greenbelt is expected to last up to two months, and the inner workings of MS-13 in Maryland might be exposed in a courtroom for the first time. Prosecutors indicted nearly two dozen suspects in the case, including a Baltimore carpenter. Three have pleaded guilty.

The lead prosecutor Tuesday described Velasquez and Ayala as integral players -- or at least knowing bystanders -- in murders, rapes and assaults against gang rivals as well as new recruits between 2001 and this year.

Wilkinson promised to show jurors over the course of the trial how the gang operated nationally and locally.

Showing jurors pictures of both men supposedly flashing gang hand signs in the shape of a claw, Wilkinson described the pair as members of different cliques but bonded by a similar MS-13 mission.

"The cliques are nothing more than franchises," Wilkinson said.

They all pledge allegiance to the gang by attacking sworn rivals, wearing gang colors of blue and white, paying dues, attending meetings and initiating new members through a violent beating ritual that lasts 13 seconds. The head of each clique, the prosecutors said, is known as "the word."

Neither Velasquez nor Ayala was identified as a leader, but Wilkinson said witnesses for the prosecution would finger them as participants or observers in retaliatory murders and gang rapes of teenage girls.

Defense attorneys told jurors Tuesday that being gang members would not be enough to prove the conspiracy charges outlined in the seven-count rack eteering indictment.

"My client never killed any one," Ayala's attorney Gary Ticknor said. "My client has never raped anyone."

The defense lawyers also drew comparisons in the case to a pope who had been a member of the Hitler Youth and a presi dent who had been a member of the Ku Klux Klan, saying that all members are not necessarily guilty of all crimes committed in a group's name.

MS-13's Primary Goal Is Killing, Prosecutor Says At Start Of Trial (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Members of the MS-13 street gang live by the motto "We kill, we rape, we control" and follow the orders of leaders known as "The Word," a prosecutor said yesterday as the federal racketeering trial of two alleged gang members began.

MS-13, a violent Latino gang also known as Mara Salvatrucha, has rules that include a standing edict to kill rival gang members, Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson said in her opening statement in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt.

"The objective of the gang is to kill people," Wilkinson said.

Prosecutors said in court papers that the gang has 10,000 members in 10 states and the District, as well as in El Salvador, Honduras and Mexico. Wilkinson said MS-13 has many cliques, which she compared to business franchises.

Each clique has a leader, "The Word," and each leader has a top lieutenant, "The Second," Wilkinson said.

The defendants, Oscar Ramos "Casper" Velasquez, 21, of Baltimore and Edgar Alberto "Pony" Ayala, 28, of Suitland, are the first two of 19 scheduled to go on trial. They are being tried under the federal RICO law, which was enacted in the early 1970s to target Mafia groups.

MS-13 gang members have conspired to commit murder, rape, kidnapping and robbery and to obstruct justice by attacking or intimidating witnesses, federal prosecutors allege in their original indictment and two superseding indictments.

The original indictment charges the gang with six homicides and four attempted murders between April 2003 and June 2005. Eight of the attacks were in Prince George's County, the other two in Montgomery County.

A superseding murder indictment handed up last week cites an additional case, from January 2005, when, it alleges, two MS-13 gang members fired into a group of youths sitting outside an apartment building in Fairfax County. One man was killed and two juveniles were wounded in that assault.

Neither Velasquez nor Ayala is charged with murder. Neither faces the possibility of the death penalty if convicted, although nine defendants do.

In their opening arguments, defense attorneys for Velasquez and Ayala said prosecutors were trying to convict their clients for the actions of others.

Gary A. Ticknor, Ayala's defense attorney, told jurors that President Harry S. Truman was a member of the Ku Klux Klan for a time. "You can be a member of a horrible organization and be a decent human being," he said.

Richard C. Bittner, Velasquez's attorney, said the government's case against his client amounts to "guilt by association."

According to prosecutors, Velasquez and others accused of being MS-13 members sexually assaulted two teenage girls at a "skipping party" -- in which students ditch school -- May 12, 2003. In her opening statement, Wilkinson said Velasquez wielded a gun during the assault, adding that the victims were 15 and 16 at the time.

Velasquez is also accused of helping assault rival gang members outside a Langley Park nightclub in September 2004 and of attending an MS-13 meeting at which dues were paid.

Ayala is accused of driving with fellow gang members to the Fairfax County apartment building where a man was fatally shot. Ayala is also accused of giving false testimony to a Prince George's grand jury that investigated the beating death of Ashley Antonio Urias in May 2004. Wilkinson said in her initial statement that Ayala was covering up for MS-13 members.

Deaths Of 3 D.C. Teens Shock City (WP)

By Allison Klein And Martin Weil

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

First there was a 14-year-old shot in the back in a public housing complex. About 13 hours later, police found a lifeless 15-year-old at a construction site. And seven hours after that, a 16-year-old died after he was shot in the head.

The teenagers were found dead in a 24-hour span in the District on Sunday and Monday, raising alarm across the city. D.C. police said none of the three cases appears to be related, but all three are homicides. That raises to 15 the number of slayings of victims in the city this year who were younger than 18. In all of last year there were 12.

Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said last night that a man, about 50, had been taken into custody in the death of the 15-year-old, Dominick A. Dixon. Ramsey said the man had made a statement about the killing to police.

No arrests have been reported in the other two killings. Police said last night that Dixon's death was a homicide. But they did not say how he was slain, and autopsy results had not been released.

After a search near where Dixon's body was found Monday, police discovered a knife late last night. The youth's mother, Gloria Dixon, said police indicated to her that the small folding knife was "part of the crime."

The teenager's body was found in boxer shorts at a work site near his home. His mother has said she thought he had been strangled. Even after the discovery of the knife last night, she said she had not seen knife wounds on her son's body.

Dixon also said police indicated to her that the man whom they were questioning apparently had been at an abandoned house near where the body was found.

She said she believed she had spoken to the man yesterday. She said the man had expressed sympathy for her son's death and told her, " 'I don't know who could have done this.' "

She added: "Maybe me talking to him made him" give a statement to police

Ramsey said he could not recall a 24-hour period that claimed so many young lives. "You hope it's something that's just an aberration," said Ramsey, in his ninth year as chief.

DOJ_NMG_0070057

All but two of this year's juvenile victims were teenagers. The others were a 2-year-old boy and a five-month-old boy. Only one victim was female: Cynthia Gray, 17, killed last month after shielding her godson from bullets on a Southeast Washington street.

The uptick in juvenile homicides echoes the horrific toll of 2004, when 24 youths were slain in the city, causing great concern among residents, community activists, D.C. police and the D.C. Council, which held a hearing that explored the root causes of youth violence.

Two adults were slain in the same 24-hour stretch this week.

The burst of violence comes toward the end of the city's crime emergency, which was declared in July after a spike in homicides and robberies. As part of the emergency, the city pushed back its juvenile curfew to 10 p.m., and police got $8 million for overtime and increased patrols across the city.

Ramsey and other police officials said the steps have had an impact on street violence. But he said he is not ready to ask for the crime emergency to be prolonged and added: "This runs a whole lot deeper than police deployment."

Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) said yesterday that he expects to extend the earlier curfew hours when they expire tomorrow and to introduce legislation to extend other provisions of the crime emergency legislation.

Council member Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), the Democratic mayoral nominee, said in a statement that he wants more than short-term fixes. He voted last summer against the crime emergency package.

Council member Marion Barry (D-Ward 8) is planning a candlelight vigil tonight at the site of the first in the spate of homicides, which happened Sunday night in the 3400 block of 13th Place SE.

Police said 14-year-old Andre Pee and 32-year-old Curtis Watkins were fatally shot about 11 p.m. on the dead-end block, which is notorious for drug dealing and gunfire. A 15-year-old was slain on the same block on New Year's Eve.

Pee had just started his first year at Ballou Senior High School. Police said they had picked him up twice this year for curfew violations.

On Monday, while authorities were sorting out what happened to Pee and Watkins, police were called to the work site near 51st Street and Sheriff Road NE, and found Dixon. He had been missing since Saturday. A family friend had found him with purple marks around his neck and wrists.

Dixon began the school year at Ronald H. Brown Middle School but was to start classes this week at Spingarn Senior High.

Police have released few details about his death.

The third juvenile victim was CeQuawn Brown, 16, who was found shot in his head in the 5300 block of Astor Place SE at 7:20 Monday night.

His mother, Nika Brown, said she had moved her son out of that neighborhood about a year earlier because she didn't think it was a safe place for him. But he went back there because that's where his friends were, she said.

Brown said she believes her son, an 11th-grader at Eastern High School, was targeted by someone in the neighborhood with whom he had an ongoing dispute.

"I just think that society is going against one another and taking matters into their own hands," Brown said.

The fifth killing in the 24-hour stretch happened Monday night, when William Downing, 25, of the 300 block of 44th Street SE was discovered in the 1900 block of 17th Street about 11:40 p.m.

Ronald Moten, co-founder of Peaceoholics, said yesterday that he thinks school being back in session is contributing to the violence. "A lot of people are clashing with each other, they are seeing each other again," he said. "When school starts up, they have to cross different paths and things are ignited once again."

Copper Thieves Get Killed Cutting Into Power Lines (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, September 27, 2006

At least seven men in five states have been fatally electrocuted since July while hacking through power lines to steal wire made of copper, which has been commanding near-record prices, police say.

“It is a growing problem with the rise in the price of metals,” says Lt. Shea Smith of the Greenville County Sheriff's Office in South Carolina. Smith says one thief died Aug. 30 and another July 7. Both were found with wire cutters and other tools that suggested their intent. He says at least 30 more copper thefts have occurred in the county so far this year.

“It's surprising to find two deaths in such a short time frame,” Shea says. “Most people who steal copper find the easiest way to do it,” such as taking it from a construction site.

DOJ_NMG_0070058

"It's three (deaths) this year alone" in Detroit, says 2nd Deputy Chief James Tate of the city's police. On Monday, he says, the body of Walter Marihugh, 24, was discovered after he apparently tried to cut cables from a public lighting box in a vacant lot. Tate says a similar electrocution occurred two months ago and a third earlier in the year.

Police have reported three deaths since July in Fort Worth, Pineville, W.Va., and Aurora, Colo. There are no national figures, but the number of copper thefts and related deaths is "probably at the highest level it's ever been," says Kenneth Geremia, spokesman for the Copper Development Association, a trade group. He says copper is completely recyclable and can sell for $3 a pound at scrap yards. Demand from China, India and other countries for copper for use in housing and industry has doubled the metal's value in a year.

Thieves don't always take precautions.

"It's a Russian roulette kind of situation. If they cut the wrong wire, they're at risk," says Stan Partlow, director of physical security for American Electric Power, a utility with 5 million customers in 11 states.

He says a rise in thefts from its power lines and substations has left the public and utility workers with power outages, loose wires or exposed equipment and has caused the deaths of two thieves in Boone County, W.Va., and Pike County, Ky.

"It's very difficult" to tell if scrap copper is stolen, because much of it is very commonly used material, says Bryan McGannon, spokesman for the Institute of Scrap Recycling Industries, an association of 3,000 scrap yards. He says workers are trained to look for stolen items, and his group alerts scrap dealers by e-mail of large thefts.

Man Charged In Fake-robbery Scams (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 27, 2006

A Philadelphia man was charged yesterday with staging fake armed robberies in scams that netted $385,000 from the state's victim-assistance program.

David Toomer, 36, is accused of staging robberies from 2000 to 2002, then enlisting the help of a former accomplice, an unnamed chiropractor, to help him stage fake accidents this year.

The money Toomer netted was about half of the $385,000 he sought to fraudulently obtain, said U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan, who announced the charges yesterday at a news conference outside the state victim-assistance office on Cherry Street.

"When you steal from this program, you contribute to the suffering of crime victims," Meehan said. "The compensation program exists to ease the burden of those victims."

The state crime victim-assistance program was created in 1976 and offers up to $35,000 to help victims and their families cope with injuries.

Toomer's first alleged scam occurred in September 2000, when he told Philadelphia police that he had been robbed of $10,000 worth of jewelry and $1,000 in cash. He obtained $35,000 from the victim-assistance fund.

In April 2001, authorities said, Toomer repeated the crime, enlisting three others to act as additional victims. Each received $35,000 from the victim fund.

In April 2002, Toomer allegedly staged his third crime - a mugging at gunpoint in which he and four others were supposedly beaten. Each supposed victim netted $35,000.

Toomer was arrested by the FBI on April 28 in the parking lot of the Holiday Inn on Packer Avenue as he allegedly conspired with an unnamed chiropractor to stage a fake accident.

By then, the chiropractor had begun cooperating with authorities, according to an affidavit by FBI Agent Therese Nestor, and had been audiotaped and videotaped discussing the scam.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Lewis D. Lappen filed a criminal information against Toomer yesterday, a process prosecutors often use when a defendant is expected to plead guilty.

Also yesterday, federal authorities charged a mortgage broker with defrauding mortgage companies. Nicholas Piscitelli, 39, of Broomall, owns Old City Mortgage in Philadelphia.

He was accused of creating a fake company to give mortgage companies the false impression that certain customers had good credit.

Feds Charge Repeat 'Victim' (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 27, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday charged a Philadelphia man with staging fake armed robberies to defraud the state's Crime Victims Compensation Assistance Program to the tune of $175,000.

The program reimburses crime victims for medical expenses not paid by health insurers for injuries suffered in the crime.

The feds alleged that David Toomer, 36, of Watkins Street near S. 22nd Street, faked four robberies in which he claimed he and others were the victims.

Toomer, who used at least two aliases during the alleged scheme, was charged with mail fraud and health-care fraud. His attorney said yesterday that Toomer plans to plead guilty.

The scheme lasted from September 2000 until April 28 this year, the feds said.

In September 2000, Toomer allegedly told cops that two armed men rear-ended his car and robbed him of $10,000 in jewelry, $1,000 cash and credit cards.

On another occasion, in April 2001, Toomer used an alias, "David Garvin," and allegedly told cops that he and three companions had been accosted by seven males outside a bar and robbed of cash and jewelry. He told officers that one of the perps had wielded a gun, the charging papers said.

Toomer would report the fake armed robberies to police, who then processed the necessary paperwork to support his claims.

He would then file claims with the victims-compensation fund to recover medical expenses for injuries he claimed to have suffered in the fake crimes.

The state fund caps individual benefits at $35,000.

The feds said Toomer aimed to collect $385,000 in benefits intended for real crime victims, but the scheme actually netted about $175,000.

"When you steal from this program, you contribute to the suffering of crime victims," said U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan. "The compensation program exists to ease the burden of those victims. This is a theft against them."

The feds said Toomer also arranged to stage two fake vehicle accidents involving numerous "victims" in a separate scheme in April to defraud insurance companies.

Toomer used various healthcare providers including three doctors and at least one hospital, the feds said. The providers were identified only by their initials.

Unbeknownst to Toomer, one provider was a local chiropractor cooperating in the investigation.

Toomer made arrangements with the chiropractor to bill insurers for medical treatment that purportedly would be provided to the phony accident victims.

According to the feds, Toomer agreed to split the proceeds with the chiropractor.

Toomer later arranged to obtain two vehicles and auto insurance for the scheme. When he couldn't get the second vehicle, Toomer had the chiropractor deliver a vehicle to him. That's when FBI agents arrested him.

Authorities said the investigation is continuing. Toomer is out on bail.

Feds: Seven Scammed Katrina Aid (DEN)

Detroit News, September 27, 2006

About $30K in relief funds were accepted by residents of Metro area to buy drugs, cars, U.S. says.

Five Detroit-area women, an Indiana man and a Mississippi woman fraudulently obtained nearly $30,000 in relief money intended for Hurricane Katrina victims and used the cash to buy cars, narcotics and other items, the federal government alleged in criminal complaints filed Tuesday.

"Disasters and crises of this nature most often bring out the best in people," said Detroit U.S. Postal Inspector D.L. Carter, whose agency investigated the alleged crimes.

"Unfortunately, they also bring out the worst."

Charged with fraud are: Pamela L. Reason, 45, of Detroit; Krystal P. Hubbard, 23, of Southfield; Curtisine Ingram, 52, of Detroit; Krystal J. Young, 21, of Detroit; Andrea J. Johnson Reason, 53, who recently moved from Detroit to Indiana; Dwight V. Reason, 35, of Bloomington, Ind.; and Patricia A. Hubbard, 48, of Bude, Miss.

None was directly affected by the Aug. 29, 2005, storm that slammed the Gulf Coast, killing more than 1,800 people and leaving tens of thousands homeless, the government alleges.

But each obtained between $2,000 and $12,750 in Federal Emergency Management Agency aid, mainly by falsely claiming they lived in New Orleans when the storm hit, according to complaints filed in U.S. District Court.

Two of the women -- Johnson Reason and Ingram -- told investigators they used some of the Katrina money to buy narcotics, according to the complaints and Carter.

Other items allegedly purchased with the $28,182 include two cars, clothing, eyeglasses and food.

Young, who said she used some of the $12,750 she received to buy a car and pay living expenses, told The Detroit News she got involved in the fraud because others she knew were doing it.

"Everybody was in my ear," about obtaining the benefits, she said after her arraignment.

"I feel bad for what I did."

The accused were released and ordered to return to court Oct. 16.

7 Charged With Obtaining Fraudulent Katrina Relief From FEMA (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

DETROIT -- Seven people have been charged with fraudulently obtaining nearly $30,000 in relief money intended for Hurricane Katrina victims.

In criminal complaints filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Detroit, federal authorities accused the suspects of using the money from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to buy cars, clothing, drugs and other items.

"Disasters and crises of this nature most often bring out the best in people," said U.S. Postal Inspector D.L. Carter, whose agency investigated the case. "Unfortunately, they also bring out the worst," he told The Detroit News.

Among those charged with fraud are: Pamela L. Reason, 45, of Detroit; Krystal P. Hubbard, 23, of Southfield; Curtisine Ingram, 52, of Detroit; Krystal J. Young, 21, of Detroit; Andrea J. Johnson Reason, 53, who recently moved from Detroit to Bloomington, Ind.; Dwight V. Reason, 35, of Bloomington, Ind.; and Patricia A. Hubbard, 48, of Bude, Miss.

Authorities said none of the suspects was directly affected by the Aug. 29, 2005, hurricane that slammed the Gulf Coast, killing more than 1,800 people and leaving tens of thousands homeless. But each obtained between $2,000 and $12,750 in FEMA aid, mainly by falsely claiming they lived in New Orleans when the storm hit, according to the complaints.

The suspects were ordered to return to court Oct. 16.

Ex-paper Chief Sent To Prison (NSDY)

Former head of American Tissue in Hauppauge gets 15 years for $300M fraud that cost 4,700 jobs

The former head of a Hauppauge-based national paper manufacturing conglomerate was sentenced yesterday to 15 years in prison for a $300-million fraud involving his firm, American Tissue, which was once the nation's fourth-largest producer of paper towels, tissues and toilet paper.

Mehdi Gabayzadeh, 62, of Great Neck also was ordered to make restitution of $65 million and serve five years' supervised release by U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert in Central Islip.

Gabayzadeh was convicted last year of fraud, conspiracy to commit perjury, and obstruction of justice in the scheme, which cost investors and suppliers $193million - after his company's assets were liquidated in bankruptcy - and resulted in the loss of 4,700 jobs, 800 on Long Island.

"I'm very sorry for my family and the United States of America for my criminal conduct," Gabayzadeh said before he was sentenced.

Gabayzadeh, a paper manufacturer in his native Iran, fled that country after the fall of the shah in the 1970s and began a relatively small operation in Hauppauge, which mushroomed in size, acquiring many small paper manufacturers around the country and selling $1-billion worth of goods a year. One of the companies he took over, AmPad, is credited with inventing the yellow legal pad.

But a drop in paper prices resulted in sharp financial losses that Gabayzadeh attempted to cover up by lying to lenders, and then to creditors after the company was forced into bankruptcy, according to prosecutors.

Among the scams: moving huge toilet-paper manufacturing machines between Mexican and U.S. locations, ahead of creditors seeking to seize them; fabricating fraudulent sales and inventory documents to obtain loans; and lying as well as getting employees to lie to investigators.

Gabayzadeh could have theoretically been sentenced to life in prison because of the large monetary loss to investors and suppliers under advisory sentencing guidelines.

Federal prosecutors and probation officials had recommended that Gabayzadeh be sentenced to 20 years. Defense attorneys urged 10 years on the grounds that Gabayzadeh was ill with heart problems, diabetes and bipolar disorder.

A number of his former employees wrote to the court asking for the stiffest possible sentence for Gabayzadeh.

One of them, Gerard Coulombe of New Berlin, N.H., said that after Gabayzadeh's former paper mill there was forced to close, a number of his 800 employees went bankrupt themselves and were forced to sell their homes. Several also found that they owed tens of thousands of dollars in medical bills, Coulombe said. They had been paying medical premiums to the mill's self-insurance plan, but there were no funds after the bankruptcy, Coulombe said, adding that the small town itself has been devastated by the loss of workers who have been forced to find employment elsewhere.

A new firm has taken over the plant's operation, but it employs only 350 workers, said Coulombe, who was a millwright at the plant and is now the head of the local chapter of the United Steel, Paper and Forestry Workers union.

In imposing the sentence, Seybert said that the federal prison was capable of caring for Gabayzadeh's illnesses. "The purpose of this sentence is to [show] that white-collar crime hurts as much as blue-collar crime," Seybert said.

Afterward, Gabayzadeh's attorneys, Raymond Perini and Benjamin Brafman, said he might consider an appeal.

Brafman said he found the sentence too harsh, "but post-Enron we have come to expect double-digit sentences in white-collar crimes."

Federal prosecutors James Miskiewicz and John Martin declined to comment.

In a telephone interview, after the sentence was imposed, Coulombe said: "For what he did, 20 years was not enough. He should have gotten life."

He Destroyed North Country Mills, Now He's In Jail (MANUL)

By Lorna Colquhoun, Union Leader Correspondent

Manchester Union-Leader, September 27, 2006

Berlin – Five years after he declared bankruptcy that forced the closure of two North Country paper mills, the CEO of what was once the fourth largest tissue maker in the country was sentenced yesterday in a New York court for a $300 million fraud scheme.

Mehdi Gabayzadeh, 61, who was simply known in the region with a bite of disdain and loathing as "Mehdi," was the owner of the pulp mill in Berlin and the paper mill in Gorham.

He will spend the next 15 years in a federal penitentiary, must make $65 million in restitution and will be on probation for five years after he serves his prison term. He could have faced up to 60 years.

"It's not enough time, but we have to put it behind us and move on," said Gorham Town Manager Bill Jackson.

"It was more than I expected him to get, but it wasn't enough," said Berlin Mayor Bob Danderson. "I'd like to see him spend the rest of his life there because that's what he deserves. He exemplifies the worst of American greed."

Gabayzadeh was convicted in April 2005 in U.S. District Court in Islip, N.Y., on eight counts of bank and securities fraud and conspiracy.

His sentencing hearing was postponed a number of times for health reasons. His attorneys said Gabayzadeh suffered diabetes, high cholesterol, depression and bipolar schizophrenia that caused him to lose 60 pounds after his trial and had asked for leniency in sentencing.

"To think this guy is depressed," U.S. District Court Judge Joanna Seybert said of Gabayzadeh. "He has no idea what depressed is."

The summer of 2001 was one of uncertainty and apprehension in Berlin and Gorham, communities whose roots are in the paper industry. Paychecks and tax payments bounced and other financial obligations were not met. Gabayzadeh was accused of inflating sales and inventory to obtain loans to keep the company going.

In late August 2001, the pulp mill, followed by the paper mill, shut down, putting nearly 900 people out of work.

Yesterday's sentencing was a relief, said Gerry Coulombe, president of the paper workers union.

"At least he got something," he said. "I wish he had gotten more time."

Prior to sentencing yesterday, Gabayzadeh apologized, according Newsday.

"I'm very sorry to my family and to the United States of America," he said. "I'm very embarrassed; I beg for mercy." The newspaper also reported that the court received more than 100 letters from millworkers and others before the sentencing hearing.

Jackson wrote two of those letters, on behalf of the town of Gorham; Coulombe wrote another last May.

"My fellow brothers and sisters were devastated by Mehdi and his illegal actions of lying and stealing their medical insurance, vacation pay and other monies owed to them," Coulombe wrote. "This man was responsible for the breakdown of so many people's lives here in the North Country."

The union workers were among 2,700 people in Wisconsin, Vermont and Tennessee who lost their jobs when the mills closed.

The mills in Berlin and Gorham were bought by Fraser Paper in May 2002 and eventually both reopened, with a smaller work force. The pulp mill, which had dominated the economy and landscape of Berlin, closed permanently last May.

"We had hoped the judge would not show any leniency because of the damage he has done to families in Berlin and Gorham," Jackson said. "They deserved that satisfaction. He never apologized."

Defense attorney Raymond Perini portrayed Gabayzadeh as a hard-working Iranian immigrant duped by others, but Assistant U.S. Attorney John G. Martin said in his closing arguments it was "simply unreasonable to believe, to accept or even consider that the CEO ... simply steps back and doesn't get involved."

Coulombe said yesterday afternoon that there has been great anticipation around Gabayzadeh's sentencing.

"People have been very curious -- people have been stopping me on the street to ask about it," he said. "This is something that affected the whole city and the whole North Country. It has finally come to an end. I wish he could have gotten more time."

Danderson was curious to know where Gabayzadeh would serve his prison time. One of the initiatives that came about after the closure of the mills in 2001 was bringing a federal prison to Berlin, a project that could break ground at the beginning of the year.

Former American Tissue CEO Sentenced To 15 Years (AP)

By Frank Eltman, The Associated Press

AP, September 27, 2006

CENTRAL ISLIP, N.Y. – The former CEO of one of the nation's largest makers of paper products was sentenced Monday to 15 years in prison after being convicted last year of engineering a $300 million fraud in a fruitless bid to save the failing company from bankruptcy.

In seeking a stiff sentence, prosecutors had compared Mehdi Gabayzadeh's misdeeds to those of better-known white-collar corporate criminals, including Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas and former WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers.

"The purpose of this sentence is to demonstrate that white-collar crime hurts just as much as blue-collar crime," said U.S. District Court Judge Joanna Seybert.

Gabayzadeh was convicted in April 2005 of all charges in an eight-count indictment, including bank and securities fraud and conspiracy, following a nine-week trial on Long Island.

His sentencing had been delayed numerous times because Gabayzadeh suffers from several ailments, his attorneys said.

They sought to have his sentence reduced because of his health. Those efforts continued Monday with defense attorneys saying that Gabayzadeh suffers from diabetes, high cholesterol and bipolar schizophrenia, and that he has lost more than 60 pounds since his conviction.

But Seybert said to him, "I can't predict how long you're going to live any more than the court could predict how long Mr. Rigas would live, any more than anyone could have predicted how long Mr. Lay was going to live."

Kenneth Lay, the disgraced founder of Enron, died in July, several weeks after being convicted of fraud.

Gabayzadeh was ordered to pay $65 million in restitution and sentenced to five years' probation after his prison term.

Gabayzadeh, 61, of Great Neck, was accused of swindling banks, financial institutions and investors of nearly $300 million while he was chief executive officer of American Tissue Inc., once the nation's fourth-largest maker of toilet tissue and other paper products.

He was accused of inflating American Tissue sales and inventory in an effort to defraud a group of banks that loaned the company $145 million, and bondholders who in 1999 purchased $165 million in American Tissue bonds.

The company's failure caused mills in Berlin and Gorham, N.H., to close in September 2001.

Prosecutors estimated 2,700 people across the country, including Wisconsin, Vermont and Tennessee, lost their jobs.

"I'm very sorry to my family and to the United States of America," Gabayzadeh said before being sentenced. "I'm very embarrassed; I beg for mercy."

Another company reopened the mills in June 2002, but in May 2006, the Berlin mill was permanently closed after the operator cited rising costs of wood, energy and chemicals.

The mill workers' union and others wrote to the judge, hoping she understood how Gabayzadeh's crimes affected individual workers and their families.

Seybert, who said she received more than 100 letters, alluded to one from a single mother who said she was being evicted from her home and wondered how she would feed her children after losing her job at one of Gabayzadeh's plants.

"To think this guy is depressed," Seybert said of Gabayzadeh. "He has no idea what depressed is."

Gabayzadeh's participation in a series of complex deals – including the creation of phony documents indicating the company had sold million-dollar pulp contracts that didn't exist – ultimately led to American Tissue's collapse.

"Like Gabayzadeh, Rigas lied to public investors about Adelphia's financial and operational performance," U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf wrote in a pre-sentencing letter. "Like Gabayzadeh, Ebbers claimed at trial that the frauds at his company were perpetrated solely by his employees, including the company's CFO, and that he was unaware of them."

Defense attorney Raymond Perini portrayed Gabayzadeh as a hardworking Iranian immigrant duped by others, but Assistant U.S. Attorney John G. Martin said in his closing arguments it was "simply unreasonable to believe, to accept or even consider that the CEO . . . simply steps back and doesn't get involved."

The bogus deals were documented in part to help American Tissue keep open a revolving line of credit it enjoyed with LaSalle Bank of Chicago, prosecutors said.

Without the line of credit, the company was doomed to fail, according to Ed Stein, the company's former chief financial officer who testified for the prosecution after pleading guilty to two federal charges of securities and bank fraud in 2003.

Ex-Paper Chief Gets 15-Year Term In Fraud (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The former chief executive of American Tissue, Mehdi Gabayzadeh, was sentenced yesterday to 15 years in prison for organizing a fraud that cost banks and investors almost $300 million when the paper manufacturer collapsed.

Judge Joanna Seybert of Federal District Court in Central Islip, N.Y., who sentenced Mr. Gabayzadeh, also ordered him to pay $65 million. Mr. Gabayzadeh was convicted of eight criminal charges, including conspiracy and wire fraud, after a 10-week trial last year.

"This case involved a massive corporate fraud and breach of trust that led to the bankruptcy of a major corporation, hundreds of millions of dollars in losses to lenders and investors and the elimination of jobs for thousands of former employees," Roslynn R. Mauskopf, a United States attorney in Brooklyn, said in a statement.

Prosecutors said Mr. Gabayzadeh, 61, inflated American Tissue's accounts receivable and net income in an effort to defraud both a group of banks that loaned the company $145 million and the purchasers of $165 million in bonds from American Tissue, based in Hauppauge, N.Y.

Mr. Gabayzadeh's lawyer, Raymond Perini, did not return a call seeking comment.

Money Laundering Conspiracy Sends Man To Prison (LYNNA)

Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, September 27, 2006

A New York man will serve one year and eight months in prison for his role in an investment scheme that bilked a Lynchburg resident out of more than $385,000.

Dennis Testa, 47, of Queens, was convicted in March of conspiracy to commit money laundering. He was sentenced Friday in U.S. District Court in Charlottesville.

Testa will be ordered to pay some restitution, but the exact amount hasn't yet been set, according to Heidi Coy, spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney John Brownlee.

A co-conspirator, Nicholas Lanza, 44, of Staten Island, was convicted in March of the same offense. He was sentenced Sept. 1 to 2½ years in prison and ordered to pay $30,000 in restitution.

The pair's scheme began in 1997, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. They used a bank account, mailing service and phone-answering service to fool people into thinking they were purchasing stock for a New York company.

The company didn't exist. Checks sent in by the victims paid for the services used to keep up the ruse while the rest were made out to cash or to the defendants.

The Lynchburg resident was the biggest victim of the scam. In all, the pair took more than $400,000 from seven people in five states.

How A Reviled Court System Has Outlasted Many Critics (NYT)

By William Glaberson

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

"A farce in these days," Gov. Alfred E. Smith pronounced New York State's town and village courts in 1926.

"An outworn system," said his successor, Franklin D. Roosevelt, not long after a state commission called it "a feeble office respected by no one." A few years after that, another commission said the local court system had "lost all contact with reality."

In all, at least nine commissions, conferences or other state bodies — including representatives of both major political parties and all three branches of government — have denounced the local courts over the last century, joined by at least two governors and several senior judges.

Their language has often been blistering, and their point has been the same: These courts, with their often primitive trappings and amateur judges, are an anachronism that desperately needs to be overhauled or discarded.

Although they are key institutions of justice in more than 1,000 small towns and suburbs across New York, trying misdemeanor cases and lawsuits, a vast majority of the justices who run them are not lawyers, and receive only a few days' legal training. The justices are often elected in low-turnout races, keep few records and operate largely without supervision — leaving a long trail of injustices and mangled rulings.

Yet these justice courts, as they are known, remain essentially as they were when New Yorkers started complaining nearly a century ago. In recent weeks, state officials have decided to take some steps to increase training, supervision and record-keeping. But the cries for any sweeping change have all but died out over the last few decades, even as the abuses have continued.

One way to understand why a much-criticized institution has come to seem so entrenched is to revisit three big battles over the justice courts. In each, the people seeking to change the system tried in a different arena: the Legislature, the voting booths and the higher courts. And each time, their defeat was so stinging that it effectively killed any further discussion there:

¶In 1962, state leaders accomplished something they had been trying to do for more than a century, revamping a state court system that was badly out of date. But in several back-room political maneuvers, they left the justice courts untouched, passed the task of altering the system to local governments, and added a maze of procedural barriers that made any major change difficult.

¶In 1967, local activists took up the cause in Rockland County, one of the few counties where a push to replace the justice courts made some headway; a referendum was held on the issue. But a fiercely emotional campaign vanquished the proposal, and helped create a sense in other counties that fighting the system was futile.

¶And in 1983, a challenge to the system's constitutionality reached the state's highest court, the Court of Appeals. Attorneys for an upstate teenager facing a jail sentence argued that the right to a lawyer, guaranteed by the Constitution, was meaningless if the judge lacked the training to understand the lawyer's arguments.

That appeal failed by a single vote. New Yorkers, the majority on the seven-member court decreed, do not have to be tried by a judge schooled in the law — a ruling that has stood ever since.

In interviews, people who were deeply involved in these episodes — including political deal-making that took place out of public view and was never reported — pointed to a battery of forces that have doomed change: The powerful idea that communities should choose their own destinies, including their own judges. The considerable costs of updating courtrooms and hiring lawyers to preside. The always-popular calls to keep lawyers out of people's lives. And, not least, the power of the justices, who are often important players in local politics, wired into the same party mechanisms that produce the state's lawmakers, judges and governors.

Dale C. Robbins, a former Republican supervisor of Busti, a small town in western New York, said he and others who tried to replace the justice courts in the 1990's ran into a buzz saw of resistance from local justices fighting for their jobs, and something of a populist uprising fueled by suspicion of the lawyers who would be judges in any new system.

He said the defeat was typical of the gridlock on many big issues in New York. "Nothing gets done," he said. "Who wants to face this battle when there are so many other battles you have to fight?"

A Moment in Albany

It was January 1959. The new governor and political star, Nelson A. Rockefeller, was making his first address to the Legislature in Albany. "The highest priority" of his administration, he promised, would be modernizing the state court system.

Court reform, he knew, was a popular issue he could ride, yellowing papers in the Rockefeller archive show. People across the state were sick of the slow, confusingly organized system and the patronage appointees — many of them unqualified, unresponsive or corrupt — who filled it from top to bottom. Complaints that had been pouring in for decades had reached critical mass in recent years, as the latest state panel to tackle court reform, known as the Tweed Commission, drew up detailed proposals for change.

Soon after his speech to lawmakers, Governor Rockefeller appointed his young counsel, Robert MacCrate, to draw up amendments to the State Constitution that would be needed to reorganize the courts, and then to marshal support in the Legislature.

But Mr. MacCrate quickly learned that the lowliest part of the court system posed one of the highest political hurdles.

Governor Rockefeller, with his elite background and downstate roots, had to be careful not to offend the rural upstate powers in his own party, whom he was trying to convince that he was a real Republican. And, Mr. MacCrate said in an interview for this article, any effort to change the justice courts, a prime source of the party's patronage, would be "really shaking the tree."

Upstate Republicans often spoke as if criticism of the system was an attack on a way of life. "You boys from New York City have never seen a justice court," State Senator Austin W. Erwin, a central player in the courts battle, said during a debate that year. "These justices are the backbone of honest-to-God human justice in our state."

Governor Rockefeller, for all his talk of change, was surrounded by staunch defenders of the justice courts. Many were former justices, including Senator Erwin and L. Judson Morhouse, then the state Republican chairman and one of the governor's earliest supporters.

The justices of the peace "were inside the system," Elizabeth T. Schack, who led the League of Women Voters' lobbying for court reform, said in an interview. Back in the legislators' districts, too, the justices were powers to be reckoned with. "They were often people of importance and influence" who knew the lawmakers personally, Mrs. Schack said. "And you don't like to go up against your friends."

Most important, Mr. MacCrate said, upstate Republicans held such power in the Legislature that the administration knew that court reform could not pass without them. "We would find a way to bring them around," he said.

They didn't have to find a way; it came to them. Mr. MacCrate said that Fred Young, an influential state Court of Claims judge whom Governor Rockefeller would later choose as state Republican chairman, soon approached with an offer.

"Bob, if you take out that provision about abolishing the justices of the peace," Mr. MacCrate recalled him saying, "I'll have the votes for you" to approve statewide court reform that day or the next.

The deal was made.

That breakthrough would allow the entire court structure in New York to be streamlined and brought for the first time under centralized control. Yet while it included a requirement that local justices receive some basic training, it largely ensured there would be no other change in the biggest piece of the system: the hundreds of town and village courts.

"That was a turning point in terms of understanding how strong the opposition was," recalled Fern Schair, the former chairwoman of the state's leading court-reform group, the Committee for Modern Courts.

But the justices and their supporters did not stop there. To keep future legislatures from tampering with the system, they persuaded the administration to adopt language requiring a local referendum for any move to replace the town courts with more professional district courts. And for that referendum to pass, a simple majority of votes would not suffice; whether in a county or part of one, the proposal would have to win separate majorities in both urban and rural areas, so city dwellers could not impose modern courts on their country neighbors.

Even that, it turned out, was not enough. A year later, as Mr. MacCrate moved to secure approval from lawmakers, supporters of the justice courts demanded a provision requiring a majority vote in each town, Mr. MacCrate wrote in a memo. Towns where the referendum was defeated would be left out of any new system — a complication that would further discourage any reform effort.

They got their provision.

New Yorkers approved the court-reform amendment at the polls, and to this day, those protections for the justice courts are enshrined in the State Constitution. No place in New York has replaced its town and village courts since western Suffolk County began a district court system in 1962 — the year Governor Rockefeller signed his reforms into law.

A Showdown in Rockland

"If you oppose 'school busing,' Expanded Welfare, Down zoning, Charter Government, Mob rule legislation, Crime in the Street, Black Power," vote no on Proposition No. 1, said the newspaper advertisement by the Conservative Party.

But Proposition No. 1 was not about any of those things. It was a ballot proposal to replace justice courts with a system of district courts in which the judges would be lawyers. After all the battles in Albany, it was the people's turn to decide.

This was 1967 in Rockland County, a rural place fast becoming a suburb as new residents arrived by the carload from nearby New York City. Some newcomers were alarmed by their encounters with eccentric justices who could wield sweeping powers over people's lives.

"The feeling was, they weren't professionals and they were too closely connected to people who brought their cases to court," Gloria English, a New City resident who worked for the proposal as a member of the League of Women Voters, said in a recent interview. "They often heard their friends' cases."

The league had several potent allies, including the county bar association and some leaders of both major political parties. The Democratic Party sponsored an ad saying it was high time the courts were modernized. The leading newspaper in the county ran editorials urging that the justice courts be brought into the 20th century.

On the other side were the justices and their supporters, including leaders of the county Conservative Party. They warned that the fancy new courts and their lawyer judges would cost more. The bar association estimated that expense at about $200,000 a year countywide, about $50,000 more than justice courts cost at the time. "I used that to bring to the attention of people: 'It's just another boondoggle,' " William E. Vines, then a justice in Clarkstown with a local insurance business, recalled in a recent interview.

There was also grass-roots backing for the justice courts, particularly among longtime residents. Arnold Becker, who was county public defender, said some people felt that familiar local justices would be more lenient than professional district judges.

But the campaign also played on emotions that had little to do with law or money.

The referendum's opponents were not shy about fanning resentment toward outsiders. The warnings about mob rule and black power spoke to fears about turmoil in the cities, and about the city people moving in. There were stirring appeals to patriotism.

"Justice courts are as much of your American heritage as those Stars and Stripes," one justice told a group of Jaycees two weeks before the election. "Don't let them take it away."

Adele Garber, then a young mother who had moved up from Queens and gone door to door on behalf of the ballot proposal, said that kind of passion easily overpowered her side's arguments about fairness and efficiency. Voters without a vested interest in the justice courts, she said, did not seem to care much.

"It's not a nice, sexy issue," she said.

The referendum lost by a 2-to-1 ratio.

Mrs. Garber said the experience left her cynical, and she was not the only one. The Rockland vote and similar defeats in other counties helped create the impression that such fights are impossible to win.

Because of a change in state policy since then, if a county adopted a district court system today, the state would pick up the cost. Statewide, that expense could be significant, perhaps tens of millions of dollars.

County governments, though, might save millions by consolidating their many justice courts into fewer, more centralized district courts. But change has been stymied.

Keith D. Ahlstrom, chairman of the Chautauqua County Legislature, said that while he and others have long seen a need to modernize the courts there, the referendum process was so cumbersome it would almost certainly fail. For now, he and other officials are backing a state bill that would permit a few justice courts to merge to cut costs.

"We need to have a small success," he said.

A Near-Miss in Court

The case was unremarkable: a teenager was arrested in Conesus, near Rochester, in 1981 and charged with menacing and trespassing. He was identified only as Charles F. because he was a minor. He faced up to a year in jail.

But his lawyer, J. Michael Jones, saw that the case had the potential to bring down the justice-court system in New York, and possibly in other states. The United States Supreme Court had ruled 20 years earlier that any defendant facing a jail sentence was entitled to a lawyer. But what good was that right, he asked, if the judge — like the town justice Charles F. faced — could not follow the lawyer's arguments?

In a recent interview, Mr. Jones recalled that he spent thousands of dollars out of his own pocket taking the case through the appeals courts. "I thought this was a perfect opportunity for us to upgrade the local court system," he said.

The time seemed ripe. In recent years, there had been a nationwide movement to recognize defendants' rights. Justice courts around the country had been revamped after a 1967 presidential crime commission noted their long record of "incompetence."

Some of the biggest changes were prompted by the courts. In 1974, the California Supreme Court ruled that imprisonment by a judge who did not have legal training was a violation of due process, and essentially ordered an end to the state's justice courts.

"It seemed there was an opportunity, a movement afoot that was going to provide a court remedy where there had never been a legislative solution," said Rene H. Reixach Jr., a Rochester lawyer who wrote a friend-of-the-court brief in the Charles F. case for the New York Civil Liberties Union.

A United States Supreme Court ruling in 1976 appeared to offer the means for challenging New York's system. The court upheld the jailing of a Kentucky man by a justice who was a coal miner with no legal training, but only because state law guaranteed defendants tried by nonlawyer justices the automatic right to a new trial before a judge who was a lawyer.

In New York, however, there is no such right. A defendant can ask a county judge to take the case, but the judge can refuse — as happened in the Charles F. case.

When the case reached the state's top court, the Court of Appeals, in 1983, Charles F.'s lawyers argued that in an era of increasingly complex legal protections for defendants, it was basic fairness that a person facing jail should have a judge trained to understand those protections. At the court's chamber in Albany, Mr. Jones remembered, "we had lawyers from New York City who couldn't believe we had this system."

The court, which was developing a reputation for protecting defendants' rights, seemed receptive. On it was the state's chief judge at the time, Lawrence H. Cooke, and the two judges who would succeed him: Sol Wachtler and Judith S. Kaye.

Mr. Wachtler, in a recent interview, said the three strongly agreed that the state's use of justices without law schooling was a problem. "There was unquestionably a sentiment on our parts that this is just not right," he said.

But when the vote came, they were on the losing side of a 4-to-3 decision. New Yorkers, the majority ruled, had no absolute right to be heard by a judge trained in the law.

Richard D. Simons, the only surviving judge in that majority, said in an interview that the case posed a narrow legal issue: whether New York provided sufficient opportunity for a higher-court trial. The larger matter of the justice courts' fairness, he said, was for the Legislature to decide.

Mr. Wachtler said he believed that the case would have gone the other way if it had come to the Court of Appeals just a year or two later, given changes in the court's makeup and stance on defendants' rights.

But the court has not grappled with the issue since. Mr. Reixach, the Rochester lawyer, said the ruling discouraged him and others from raising further challenges. "The Charles F. case, whether you agreed with it or not," he said, "sealed the fate of the justice-court system in the state for a very long time."

Judge Kaye, who wrote the dissenting opinion, has since become a champion of court reform as New York's chief judge, heading the Court of Appeals and the administration of all the courts. But the legislation she has proposed to modernize the system since taking office in 1993 has consistently omitted the justice courts.

Only this summer did Judge Kaye address problems in the local courts, after the state comptroller warned that they could be mishandling millions of dollars, and after a commission she created to study legal services for the poor reported that those courts were routinely trampling on people's rights.

Her office has said that while it has limited control over the justice courts, it would begin trying to remedy some of their flaws, with measures that do not require legislative approval.

Those steps are the most ambitious attempted in several decades, but their very nature underscores the courts' deficiencies: Justices, according to the state's plan, will get two weeks of initial training instead of six days. For the first time, all justices will be given computers, fax machines and tape recorders, and be required to tape proceedings. A supervising judge will be named in each judicial district to oversee them.

And the improvements do not touch what critics of the justice courts have repeatedly said are their gravest defects: the use of part-time justices who are not lawyers, the reliance on towns and villages to finance the courts, and the state's weak authority over the courts.

Tackling those issues would involve the Legislature — and invite another battle. Judge Kaye declined requests for an interview.

One of the justice courts' most powerful defenders has been the State Association of Towns. Its executive director, G. Jeffrey Haber, said the group would be ready for another fight.

"If it came up," he said, "we would take the same position that we did before."

Forensic Skills Seek To Uncover Hidden Patterns Of Elder Abuse (NYT)

By Jane Gross

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. — The elderly man in the emergency room was covered with bruises, some purple and others fading to yellow. Despite signs of dementia, he told the same story over and over: His wife's burly home health aide had beaten him. But the health aide and the wife insisted he had fallen. Now it was up to the members of Orange County's Elder Abuse Forensic Center to decide which story was true.

As the man lay on a gurney, he was interviewed by a team from the center: a geriatrician, a social worker and an investigator from the sheriff's office. The bruises on the man's chest, they determined, were the result of being punched. There were bloody outlines of a shoe on the man's leg. His clear, consistent story, and cognitive tests, persuaded the prosecutor to charge the aide with a felony.

At the center here, public health and law enforcement officials are learning to speak the same language and using the same forensic techniques as those popularized on the three C.S.I. television series to diagnose elder abuse and neglect. For decades, the techniques have been the state-of-the-art approach for investigating child abuse and domestic violence. But elder abuse has lagged far behind, suffering from a lack of financing, research and data.

Now change is in the air, and forensic techniques are just one of many new initiatives nationwide to protect the elderly. Geriatricians at the Baylor College of Medicine in Houston, for example, review county autopsy reports looking for suspicious themes. Bank tellers at Wachovia branches nationwide are learning to detect irregular transactions in the accounts of elderly customers.

Congress is also expected to consider, before the October recess, the Elder Justice Act of 2006, which would create the first nationwide database on elder abuse, replacing inconsistent or unavailable data. The legislation, which has bipartisan support, also assigns a federal official to coordinate projects and technical assistance and helps replicate programs like Orange County's.

The legislation moved from committee to the full Senate on a unanimous vote within days of a celebrity scandal involving elder abuse accusations against the son of Brooke Astor, 104, the grand dame of New York society. The accusations against Mrs. Astor's son, Anthony D. Marshall, himself 82, include mismanagement of her fortune for his own enrichment and neglect as a result of cutting back on her care. Mr. Marshall has denied those accusations.

Mrs. Astor's situation is not exceptional. She is a member of the fastest-growing segment of the American population, those 85 and older. Half in that age group suffer from dementia and are often incapable of informed consent. The fact that the elderly control 70 percent of the nation's wealth makes them tempting targets for greedy relatives or swindlers.

Those are the circumstances that set the stage for most elder abuse, experts say. The most common form is physical neglect, like untended bedsores, dehydration or the reek of urine. A family member who is providing care, most often an adult child, is usually the guilty party. Greed is generally the motive, whether there is a multimillion-dollar inheritance or a monthly Social Security check at stake.

All this was well known to the assorted professionals in Orange County, but before the forensic center was established, each had to improvise without easy access to others' expertise. A social worker might need a public guardian to sort out conflicting claims from adult children over who had power of attorney. The social worker might also need advice from a detective about securing evidence, but calls to colleagues often went unreturned for weeks, and there was likely to be no doctor to consult because few were trained to detect elder abuse.

Now, in Orange County, such professionals meet face-to-face at least once a week, with a doctor at the helm, and often speak daily.

"It's a no-brainer," said Rebecca Guider, the director of adult services and assistance programs in Orange County. "Almost every case benefits from this approach."

Some 6,000 cases of elder abuse are reported annually in Orange County. In California, 100,000 reports were filed in 2003, accounting for 20 percent of the 500,000 reports nationwide. But there is widespread agreement among professionals that those numbers may be low. In a 1996 study, only one in 14 cases of physical abuse and neglect were reported and one in 100 of financial exploitation.

In Orange County, Craig M. Cazares, a deputy district attorney, reviews about 120 cases a year that are considered potential crimes, twice the number before the creation of the forensic team. Half of the cases are prosecuted, Mr. Cazares said, with a 90 percent conviction rate including plea deals.

The team approach, he said, can lead to pitched battles because doctors and social workers "don't understand that not everything they want to be criminal is criminal."

Nevertheless, Mr. Cazares added, "we can make borderline cases better" because of shared information and, most important, the medical expertise to assess physical injury and mental capacity.

Confidentiality laws prohibit outsiders at team meetings at the Elder Abuse Forensic Center. But in interviews, members discussed three cases, one involving neglect, one abuse and one financial exploitation.

In the neglect case a 60-year-old woman had been providing substandard care to her 96-year-old husband, who has heart disease and dementia and uses a wheelchair. After home visits by a physician, a social worker, a detective, a public guardian, a mental health expert and an array of outside social service agencies, no criminal charges were filed.

When the team took the case, reported by a neighbor, the husband had an open wound on his thigh from a kitchen accident and showed signs of malnourishment. But Dr. Lisa Gibbs said the wife had not intended harm. "So we worked with her, educated her, sent in a lot of social services and she is trying to do a better job," Dr. Gibbs said.

In the abuse case, involving the elderly man in the emergency room, the home health aide first accepted a plea deal that would send him to jail for a year, but is now vacillating. If found guilty at trial, the aide could be sentenced to up to nine years in state prison.

The financial exploitation case, a classic sweetheart scam, ended when Jennifer Mitchell was sentenced to four years in a state prison and her husband, Anthony, an accessory, was given 12 months in the Orange County jail. Ms. Mitchell, described by investigators as "an attractive young woman," was convicted of defrauding three elderly men of a total of $300,000 by feigning romantic interest in them. Dr. Laura Mosqueda and Dr. Gibbs established that mental impairment, depression and isolation had made all three men vulnerable.

The couple was charged with multiple counts of financial abuse, which carry heavy prison sentences. But the judge offered a plea deal demanding full restitution.

"This case wasn't about the sentence," said Kenneth W. Johns, the deputy public guardian for Orange County. "These men needed their money back so they can be taken care of."

DOJ_NMG_0070069

Some members of the team, including Kenneth Smith, a veteran investigator, say the typical abuser tends to be the "weak link" in a family, without a career or a home. The abuser often has mental health or substance abuse problems.

Mr. Smith said other family members were relieved to delegate the task of caring for an elderly person and turned a blind eye to incompetence and other factors that raised the risk of abuse, like the need for money.

Dr. Mosqueda fiercely objects to that stereotype, which ignores the stress on those taking care of the elderly. A police investigator may never encounter loving and attentive adult children driven to the brink, she said, because the police work at the margins of society, after other interventions have failed.

Dr. Mosqueda said she saw caretakers in her office every day and asked them, directly, if they had ever yelled at or struck the person in their care or even been afraid they might.

"If your mother has Alzheimer's," Dr. Mosqueda said, "and she's belittling you all the time, screaming, asking the same questions over and over, and you have a husband and kids and a job, at some point you're going to say, 'If she asks me that same damn question one more time, I'm going to hit her.' "

Dr. Mosqueda continued, " 'I'm doing the best I can' isn't an excuse, but sometimes it's really true, and it's our job to know the difference and help families solve it so it doesn't ever get to the team at the forensic center."

Old-fashioned Land Scams Go High-tech (USAT)

By Haya El Nasser

USA Today, September 27, 2006

An elderly woman from the East Coast roams the Arizona desert in search of her land. She's looking for a tidy lot in a subdivision and instead finds an arid wasteland in the middle of nowhere. She gets lost, runs out of gas and water and has to be rescued by a rancher.

She had bought the land on the Internet, sight unseen, according to Mary Utley, spokeswoman with the Arizona Department of Real Estate.

The Internet is reviving a grand old American tradition: land scams. Thousands of lots in phantom subdivisions that were sold decades ago to people who hoped to build retirement homes in warm states are reappearing on online sites such as the Internet giant eBay.

The new wave of land scams has the potential to snooker millions more around the world because of the Internet's broad and instantaneous reach.

Many of the lots being sold have never been developed because they are on swampland in Florida or isolated desert ranchland in Texas and Arizona. There is no road access, water or power. The land might be developed someday, but county officials who are busy processing a surge in deed transfers are skeptical.

"If someone does buy one of these parcels thinking they're going to build their dream home on it now, that's really a problem," says Bart Medley, attorney for Texas' Jeff Davis County.

Land scams are surfacing in:

·Florida. The state has a long history of bogus land deals. In Flagler County, a scam that began in the 1970s was revived recently when the same lots in a subdivision that has yet to be built appeared on eBay. Some paid $5,000 for parcels worth $500, Daytona Beach land-use lawyer Glenn Storch says.

·West Texas. Land there is plentiful, but not always hospitable. Arid acreage in Jeff Davis, Hudspeth and Culberson counties has been auctioned online to some unsuspecting buyers.

"Much of the property was advertised with photos showing things like running water, green trees and green grass — things that simply don't exist in that particular location," Medley says.

·Arizona. "A huge problem," says Utley, whose agency monitors real estate agents and developers. "We actually don't even have enough staff to address it."

Most online land auctions are legitimate and much of the land sold can be developed. Interspersed among those listings, however, are offers for 2-acre and 5-acre lots tagged as "investment property."

Online sites say they just provide the vehicle to list properties. "The actual transaction happens directly between the buyer and seller," says Catherine England, spokeswoman for eBay, which lists and auctions properties in its real estate section.

In the 1960s, large land companies set up sales kiosks in cities around the world such as Hong Kong or Singapore, Storch says, "but you had to come to the kiosk to hear the sales pitch." Now, all of it can be done online from the comfort of home and at any hour in any time zone.

Medley has gotten calls from as far away as Belgium.

There is nothing illegal about selling worthless land to someone who's willing to pay. The key is to tell them what they're getting, Storch says.

DOJ_NMG_0070070

West Texas is particularly attractive to land-scam artists. There is plenty of land, and county governments are small and ill-equipped to crack down.

The county clerk in Jeff Davis County is processing dozens of deed transfers on ranchland that can't be reached by car. The same lots were sold years ago to unsuspecting buyers who stopped paying property taxes when they realized they owned a worthless patch of dirt. The county took possession and sold the lots in one chunk. The new owner is selling the lots online.

"We're going to wind up taking some of these plots back," Medley says. "Eventually, we'll have to clean up the mess. … These scams are defrauding people out of their hard-earned money."

Kit Bramblett, county attorney in neighboring Hudspeth County, says cracking down on bad sales is tough.

"Even though I can't find your land out there, I can't find any laws that will allow me to jump on anybody," he says. "I can't make a criminal act out of that."

Some of the Internet sales listings make it clear that the land can't be built on unless the owners find a way to supply water, sewer service and electricity. Others don't. Many tantalize with beautiful descriptions and pictures.

Medley cites the old adage that beauty is in the eye of the beholder, but "I want to meet the person who looks at this (land) and thinks it's beautiful."

Arizona state law requires anyone selling more than five lots in a subdivision to file an application and public report listing details such as road access and utilities.

"A lot of times, one lot will be sold three or four times over the Internet," Utley says. The agency is investigating numerous complaints filed in the past two years.

A Texas law prohibits subdividing land for residential use into small parcels without providing water, sewer, electricity and road access, Medley says.

"Many of these people are reselling these plots for the third or fourth time and they have absolutely no idea they're breaking the law," Medley says — especially someone in another country.

Until there's a complaint, he says, he can't get an injunction to stop the transactions.

The government scrutinizes companies that do large-scale developments more closely than individuals who sell single plots, says Tom Collier of the Better Business Bureau of Southern Arizona.

"That's when the buyer really, really needs to beware," Collier says. "People fancy themselves out on their porch watching the deer and antelope play."

'Girls Gone Wild' Filmmaker Fined $2.1 Million (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

The founder and owner of "Girls Gone Wild" has pleaded guilty to charges of failing to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers in his sexually explicit films.

Joseph Francis entered the guilty plea Monday before U.S. District Judge Margaret Morrow in Los Angeles. Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said Francis pleaded guilty to two counts filed under a law passed by Congress to prevent sexual exploitation of children.

The law protects against the use of minors in the production of sexually explicit material by requiring producers to create and maintain age and identity records for every performer.

Under the agreements, she said, Francis agreed to pay the maximum fine of $500,000 and his two companies agreed to pay an additional $1.6 million in fines and restitution.

Santa Monica-based Mantra Films Inc., which is owned and operated by Francis, entered a plea agreement on Sept. 12 at U.S. District Court in Panama City, Fla. A related company, MRA Holdings Inc., also entered a deferred prosecution agreement the same day. Sentencing in the case is scheduled for Dec. 18.

Mrs. Fisher said Francis, Mantra and MRA Holdings will make a public acknowledgment of criminal wrongdoing and have agreed to fully comply with the record-keeping laws.

MRA Holdings also agreed that for three years it will employ an independent, outside monitor selected by the government who will have complete access to the books, records and production facilities to ensure the company's compliance with federal law.

In statements filed in court, Francis admitted that "Girls Gone Wild," acting under his direction, filmed performers engaging in sexually explicit conduct and produced and distributed sexually explicit video materials during all of 2002 and part of 2003 while violating the record-keeping and labeling laws.

In May, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales asked the FBI to begin conducting regular inspections of records kept by producers of sexually explicit material.

Producers are required to keep records on performers that include true name and date of birth and to produce these records on demand, in order to prevent the hiring of minors.

BWXT Worker Pleads Guilty (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield, Satterfield@knews.com

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), September 27, 2006

Man sentenced to 1-year probation for removing classified data from Y-12

Stupid? Probably.

Spy? Never.

Retired U.S. Navy man Everett Ashley Blauvelt Jr. had no intention of betraying his country when he played fast and loose with "secret restricted data" at the Y-12 National Security Complex in Oak Ridge, defense attorney Tom Dillard said Tuesday.

"It was just a bad mistake," Dillard said.

Blauvelt, 61, pleaded guilty before U.S. Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton to a misdemeanor charge he removed classified information from Y-12, where components for the country's nuclear weapons arsenal are made, while working there as an employee of contractor BWXT in 2000.

Guyton sentenced Blauvelt to a one-year probationary term.

"He's relieved that his six-year ordeal is over," Dillard said after the hearing. "He's certainly sorry for what happened."

According to documents filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court by Assistant U.S. Attorney David Dake, Blauvelt worked for BWXT as a "shift technical adviser" and "held secret and Q-security clearances."

His job gave him access to classified information including documents labeled "secret restricted data" because of references to nuclear weapon making and the potential to cause "serious damage" to national security, Dake told Guyton.

The exact nature of the information at issue in Blauvelt's case was not disclosed in court records, although some of it apparently involved data on fellow employees.

"Mr. Blauvelt was familiar with the rules and regulations concerning access to and possession, use and storage of classified information," Dake wrote. "He served in the United States Navy for 27 years, held a security clearance and dealt with classified information."

At some point in late 2000, an allegation was made to Blauvelt's bosses that he had "compiled a database containing detailed personal and sensitive information about co-workers," Dake wrote.

A search of Blauvelt's office revealed "two diskettes containing personal and potentially compromising information," including "information classified at the secret restricted data level," according to court records.

The search also yielded "the presence of an unauthorized device on an unclassified and networked computer that would permit sending and receiving emails outside of the authorized and monitored system," Dake wrote. "Classified information was also found on this unclassified and networked computer, a strictly forbidden practice."

According to court records, Blauvelt was escorted off the Y-12 complex on Dec. 12, 2000. When agents with the FBI and the Department of Energy's Counterintelligence Unit showed up at his home armed with a search warrant, they found Blauvelt "attempting to erase data from his computer," Dake wrote.

It's not clear why Blauvelt broke the security rules, but Dillard insisted -- and the Justice Department agreed in allowing a misdemeanor plea -- that there is no proof that Blauvelt intended to market the classified information.

San Diego And The SEC (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

San Diego is approaching the bitter end-game on its pension-fund scandal, with the Securities and Exchange Commission expected to release its own report on the city council's decade-long bender of overpromising benefits and underfunding its pension fund. The SEC is likely to require the city's government to take steps to ensure that the fiasco isn't repeated, allowing it to re-enter the municipal-bond market.

But the nightmare won't end there for San Diego taxpayers, who are left holding the bag for the misfeasance of the city council. For them, two big issues remain: Will the extravagant promises to city employees be honored without regard to their cost or the improprieties involved in making those promises? Second, will the city council be held accountable for creating this mess?

Michael Aguirre, the pugnacious city attorney, has brought suit in federal court to have some of the benefits granted since 1996 rolled back on grounds that they violated federal conflict-of-interest laws. A self-described liberal Democrat, Mr. Aguirre deserves kudos for risking the wrath of the public-sector unions, but his prospects for success are uncertain.

If he loses, reining in the liabilities will become a matter of negotiation with the unions. Good luck with that. A victory, on the other hand, would send a signal that unfunded promises for public-sector employees are not etched in stone, which would be a valuable signal for other state and local governments grappling with extravagant retirement packages for public employees. As Mr. Aguirre points out, current retirees "are drawing 100 cents on the dollar from a pension fund that is only 60% funded." If this were a private company, creditors would demand a haircut for those lucky few. But it's a municipal government, so they're getting away with it.

The city council is another matter. Four of its current members were identified by name as "negligent" in the report on San Diego finances issued by former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt last month: Toni Atkins, James Madaffer, Brian Maienshein and Council President Scott Peters. Mr. Aguirre argues that Mr. Levitt didn't go far enough, and contends that the council members may be criminally culpable for ratcheting up pension benefits and intentionally withholding legally required contributions to the fund to pay for those benefits.

Both men would like to see those council members called to account, but the mechanism for doing so is less than clear. The SEC seems to be taking the position that it has little authority to discipline local politicians, and it may have a point. But San Diego needs access to the capital markets to issue bonds, and this gives the SEC a lever. At the moment, according to those who have reviewed the SEC's draft order, the pension underfunding is described as something that happened, not something that specific people caused to happen through deliberate acts. "They don't name names and that's wrong," Mr. Levitt told us. "These actions didn't occur by themselves."

Fingering the council members would at least offer a small measure of personal accountability. The SEC is justifiably wary of taking unprecedented steps against a local government, but the present system offers no enforcement mechanism at all against local politicians who have put their taxpayers on the hook for over $1 billion in unfunded liabilities. Identifying the culprits would at least signal that this sort of dereliction is as serious when it occurs at a public institution as it would be if it had happened at a private company.

San Diego's pension fund is now underfunded by some $1.5 billion, or about 30%. And its liabilities will grow by 8% a year for the foreseeable future, so it will take a great deal of money in addition to some stellar investment performance if San Diego is ever to climb out of the hole its city council has dug. Mr. Aguirre estimates that his lawsuit could reduce that liability by $500 million, but that still leaves a chasm in the budget. At the moment, 30% of San Diego's budget is going toward retirement benefits, a figure that could rise to 40% over time. Fingering the guilty is the first step back toward honest local government.

CIVIL LAW:

Justices To Decide On Use Of Union Fees For Politics (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The Supreme Court announced yesterday that it will decide whether states may require organized labor to ask some workers for permission to spend their union fees on political activity.

The case addresses the agency fees that some states require workers to pay to labor organizations for representation, even if they chose not to join the unions. The court said it would review a Washington state Supreme Court ruling that struck down a state law barring the use of those fees for political purposes without workers' consent.

The case pits the state of Washington and national right-to-work advocates, backed by campaign finance reformers, against organized labor. At stake, potentially, is much of the money that unions rely on to help fund their state-level political activities.

The law had been adopted by Washington voters as part of a referendum on campaign finance reform. But the state's high court ruled 6 to 3 earlier this year that the law violated unions' First Amendment rights because it presumes workers would object to labor leaders' spending choices.

Washington's state government and a group of five teachers appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. They argue the real free-speech violation lies in spending teachers' mandatory contributions to their union on candidates or causes they do not necessarily support -- and Washington's law is an appropriate means of preventing that.

The teachers in the case do not belong to the Washington Education Association, but they are represented by the union in collective bargaining and they receive the benefits and pay called for in the union's contract with the state's public schools. For that reason, Washington law requires them to pay the union an "agency fee" in lieu of union dues.

The specific question in the case is what the union must do before it spends those nonmember "agency fees" on politics.

The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld agency fee arrangements in general. But it ruled in 1986 that unions must tell those who pay an agency fee how much of it goes to non-collective-bargaining purposes and offer them a refund for that amount.

DOJ_NMG_0070073

Washington's law, though, goes further, in that it places the burden on unions, not individual workers, to make sure that no agency fees are being used contrary to fee-payers' wishes.

That was the feature of the law that the Washington Supreme Court majority found unconstitutional.

The Washington Education Association, urging the court not to review that decision, said its impact would not extend beyond the state.

But a friend-of-the-court brief filed by the Campaign Legal Center, a D.C.-based nonprofit group that supports campaign-finance regulation, argued that the Washington decision, if left in place and followed by other state courts, could be used "as authority to strike down state law 'opt-in' restrictions on labor union political activity" in 14 other states.

The court will hear two consolidated cases, Washington v. Washington Education Association , No. 05-1657, and Davenport v. Washington Education Association , No. 05-1589. Oral argument is expected to take place in December, and a decision should come by July.

Top Court To Hear Union Fees Case (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

The Supreme Court said yesterday that it will decide whether a teachers union can collect fees from nonunion members and spend their money on political activity without their prior permission.

The court also agreed to hear a case that could determine whether the government may deport up to 8,000 criminal aliens, and accepted an appeal from Arizona to reinstate the death penalty against a two-time killer who says his attorney was ineffective.

In the union case, the court will decide whether the Washington Education Association (WEA) can spend money, collected from 3,000 nonunion teachers, on political activity without their prior consent. The teachers are required to pay fees to the union even if they don't belong to it because they are deemed to benefit from collective bargaining.

Washington state's Supreme Court ruled that the requirement is unconstitutional because it puts too much burden on the union to check with every nonmember.

The dispute actually involves two cases. One is an appeal by the state's attorney general defending the law, and the other is an appeal on behalf of teachers.

Stefan Gleason, vice president of the Fairfax-based National Right to Work Foundation, which is working on behalf of the teachers, said the case has big stakes because the state court's ruling could be seen to create a right to collect money even from nonunion teachers.

"We're trying to get the state Supreme Court overturned not necessarily because the underlying law is all that helpful, but particularly because of the bad precedent that was created," he said.

Charles Hasse, president of WEA, said that opponents are trying to turn the case "into a cause celebre" but that the union has taken steps to segregate nonmembers' fees so they don't pay for political activity. He said that means even if the high court overturns the state court ruling, the outcome will not penalize the union.

"We feel confident the courts will find we complied with the law as best anyone can with such a poorly worded initiative," he said.

The Supreme Court also agreed to hear a challenge to an appeals court ruling that the government says could prevent deportation of up to 8,000 criminal aliens. The case involves a Peruvian citizen who holds a green card, signifying legal permanent residence in the United States, and turns on whether aiding in a theft is a serious enough crime to warrant deportation.

In the death penalty appeal, the court said it would hear the case of a man who was serving time for murder in Oklahoma, escaped prison and a month later killed a man in Phoenix.

His death sentence was overturned on appeal when a court ruled his attorney should have made a better effort to submit evidence that he was predisposed to violence and suffered brain damage that made him unable to understand the criminal nature of his acts. But Arizona argued that the man, Jeffrey Landrigan, told the trial court that he didn't want to introduce evidence that would have argued against a death sentence.

Both the criminal alien and death penalty disputes are appeals of cases decided in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, as is another set of cases the court agreed to hear -- on whether companies are doing enough to notify customers about penalties or rate increases they assess because of adverse information in credit reports.

Justices To Hear Case On Use Of Union Fees (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

DOJ_NMG_0070074

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — The Supreme Court on Tuesday began the months-long process of filling in its calendar for the new term that begins next week, selecting nine cases from among the nearly 2,000 that accumulated over the summer recess.

The most prominent among the nine cases, which will be argued in December and January, is a constitutional dispute over anti-union measures known as "paycheck protection" laws, which restrict how labor unions can use the fees that nonmembers are often required to pay.

The court's precedents make clear that nonmembers who object to their fees being used for politics may request a rebate of the amount spent on those activities. The question in the new case, from Washington State, is whether a state may go further and require affirmative consent from nonmembers before the union can spend any part of their fees on political activity.

From the labor unions' point of view, the difference between permitting nonmembers to "opt out" and requiring them to "opt in" is substantial. They argue that it is burdensome to have to seek permission from nonmembers, and that nonmembers who do not exercise their opt-out rights should be seen as acquiescing in the expenditures.

Washington adopted the consent requirement in a voter initiative in 1992, the first such measure to be adopted in the country. Last year, after a heated campaign, California voters narrowly defeated a similar provision that would have applied only to public employee unions.

The Washington Supreme Court, finding that the affirmative consent requirement imposed an "extremely costly" and "significant" burden on a labor union's political activities, declared it unconstitutional in March. By establishing a "presumption of dissent," the court ruled, the measure violated the First Amendment rights of free speech and association.

The justices agreed on Tuesday to hear two appeals from that ruling, consolidated for a single argument. One, Washington v. Washington Education Association, No. 05-1657, was filed by the state, which had brought an enforcement action against the union that is the exclusive bargaining agent for 70,000 teachers.

Of those teachers, some 3,500 have chosen not to join the union, and therefore pay "agency fees" rather than union dues. The state sued the Washington Education Association in response to a complaint that the union was violating the 1992 law by failing to get authorization from the nonmembers before using part of their fees for political activities.

The second appeal, Davenport v. Washington Education Association, No. 05-1589, was filed by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation on behalf of five teachers who had brought a class-action lawsuit to recover fees they alleged the union had spent improperly.

The foundation, which describes itself as dedicated to fighting "the abuses of compulsory unionism," told the justices in its appeal that "while the power to persuade is protected by the First Amendment, the power to compel conformity (and financial support) is not."

The union told the justices that the rights of objecting nonmembers were "fully protected" by advising them of their right to opt out.

The initiative added the labor union provision to Washington's campaign finance law. Washington permits unions to use their general treasuries for political activities. Federal law, by contrast, requires labor unions to set up special segregated funds for political activity, to which members may make voluntary contributions.

The Supreme Court's decision, consequently, will have no impact on the federal campaign law. According to one of the briefs in the case, five other states — Idaho, Michigan, Ohio, Utah and Wyoming — have laws prohibiting the use of union members' dues for political purposes without their affirmative consent.

Another of the new cases the justices accepted on Tuesday was an appeal filed by the State of Arizona of a federal appeals court's decision to permit a death row inmate to challenge his sentence on the ground that he had not received the effective assistance of counsel.

The state argues that the decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to permit the defendant, Jeffrey Landrigan, to proceed with his habeas corpus petition failed to give proper deference to the Arizona courts' finding that it was Mr. Landrigan himself who had obstructed his lawyer's effort to present mitigating evidence that might have spared his life.

Mr. Landrigan was convicted of killing a man in Phoenix in 1989, after escaping from an Oklahoma prison where he was serving a term for murder. His lawyer had called Mr. Landrigan's mother and his former wife to testify on his behalf during the sentencing phase. But Mr. Landrigan instructed them not to testify, telling the judge: "I think if you want to give me the death penalty, just bring it right on. I'm ready for it."

When the judge tried to clarify his position, Mr. Landrigan asserted that he did not want to present any mitigating evidence.

The question in the appeal, Schriro v. Landrigan, No. 05-1575, is whether the Ninth Circuit exceeded its authority under a 1996 federal law, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, in reopening the case rather than deferring to the Arizona courts' conclusion that Mr. Landrigan's complaint about his lawyer's performance was "frivolous."

Wacky Tobacco Lawsuit (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

AN APPEALS COURT MUST DECIDE whether, as a matter of law, a federal judge in Brooklyn erred in refusing to block a class-action racketeering lawsuit against tobacco companies on behalf of millions of smokers of "light" cigarettes. But lay people are likely to scratch their heads over District Judge Jack B. Weinstein's decision to let this lawsuit proceed — especially when they learn that the damage supposedly caused by the tobacco industry was to smokers' wallets, not their lungs.

That's right, the lawsuit certified by Weinstein alleges not that smokers of "light" cigarettes were made sick by the cigarettes they purchased but that they were misled into thinking that "light" and "low tar" cigarette designations meant they were safer. It's much easier to allege that people were duped by marketing than to show that they got sick from smoking. The lawyers bringing the suit seek to force tobacco companies to disgorge their "ill-gotten gains."

In allowing the suit to proceed, Weinstein referred to the plaintiffs' legal theory as "elegant." That's an understatement. How do you prove that millions of people bought a specific kind of cigarette because of a specific claim made on its behalf? And how do you hold tobacco companies liable for marketing campaigns that were regulated by the government? Such questions led the Illinois Supreme Court to throw out a $10-billion verdict against Philip Morris USA Inc. in a similar case last December.

Because this is a class-action suit, most "victims" will not have to come forward to explain how they specifically were snookered into paying for cigarettes that were more harmful than advertised.

If Weinstein isn't overruled, his decision will be a windfall for lawyers, a disaster for tobacco companies — which already have agreed to pay out billions of dollars as part of a settlement with state attorneys general — and a travesty for the cause of due process.

This case has little to do with ameliorating the health effects of smoking. In a refreshingly candid section of his opinion, Weinstein noted that "this, and other suits like it, probably have had only a minimal value in reducing what even defendants now concede are the enormous costs to public health of widespread cigarette smoking. More effective in alleviating smoking dangers are probably such legislative and administrative efforts as prohibiting smoking in public and commercial areas and raising prices, primarily through taxes."

Private litigation is a poor excuse for enlightened legislation. If elected representatives are unwilling to do more than they have done already to discourage smoking, federal courts shouldn't be expected to pick up the slack — especially on the basis of "elegant" theories like this one.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales Asked To Probe Prosecution Of Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher yesterday asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to investigate what he called "the exceedingly harsh prosecution" of two U.S. Border Patrol agents now facing 20 years in prison for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks.

"This proceeding has garnered national attention calling into question the administration's commitment to secure our borders," said Mr. Rohrabacher, adding that the two agents -- Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean -- "were simply doing their jobs to guard our homeland by attempting to apprehend an illegal drug smuggler."

The California Republican's letter also called for the agents' sentencing next month to be postponed "due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding" their prosecution.

Mr. Rohrabacher joins a growing list of Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill who have asked for congressional hearings and reviews by the White House and Justice Department into the prosecution.

"It appears the facts do not add up or justify the length of the sentences for these agents, let alone their conviction on multiple counts," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, said in a letter last month to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, requesting a full hearing into the matter.

"Undue prosecution of Border Patrol agents could have a chilling effect on their ability to carry out their duties," she said.

In March, a federal jury convicted Ramos, 37, and Compean, 28, of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence, and a civil rights violation. The shooting occurred Feb. 17, 2005, near Fabens, Texas, about 30 miles southeast of El Paso.

DOJ_NMG_0070076

Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, was wounded as he ran from the agents along the Rio Grande. The agents said Mr. Aldrete-Davila had pointed at them what appeared to be a gun. Nearly 800 pounds of marijuana, worth $1 million, was found in the van Mr. Aldrete-Davila abandoned at the river's edge, the Border Patrol said.

Mr. Aldrete-Davila, who was given immunity by prosecutors to testify in the case, received care at William Beaumont Army Medical Center in El Paso. He is suing the government for $5 million for violating his civil rights.

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, has called for a congressional investigation and open hearings on the case. The investigation is expected to begin before the end of the year.

Rep. John Hostettler, Indiana Republican and chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee on immigration, border security and claims, has said that if the arrest, trial and conviction of the agents resulted in a chilling effect on others, "then it's definitely something we should know about."

Records show that after Mr. Aldrete-Davila was spotted in his van near the Rio Grande, Ramos gave chase while Compean circled around to head off the suspect. When Mr. Aldrete-Davila jumped out of the van and ran south to the river, he was confronted by Compean, who was thrown to the ground as the two men fought. Ramos said that when he arrived, he saw Compean on the ground and chased Mr. Aldrete-Davila to the river, where the suspect suddenly turned toward him and pointed what looked like a gun.

Ramos said he did not think the suspect was hit. He said Mr. Aldrete-Davila ran through the bush, jumped into an awaiting van in Mexico and sped off.

An investigator from the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General found Mr. Aldrete-Davila in Mexico, where he was offered immunity in exchange for testimony.

"This case represents the worst kind of distorted and upside-down values," Mr. Rohrabacher said. "The drug smugglers are treated like innocent victims and the good guys protecting our borders are given the harshest possible punishment."

She Took Badge To Nab Hub Officer (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 27, 2006

Woman says she was forced to have sex

A 19-year-old prostitute feared that no one would believe her if she said an off-duty Boston police officer kept forcing her to perform sex in his car. So one night, she fled his car with a key piece of evidence: his badge.

It was a bold move, the woman's lawyer said yesterday. And later, the lawyer said, when Officer Michael LoPriore called the woman to get his badge back, the FBI was listening, too.

LoPriore, 37, of Everett, was charged in federal court yesterday with depriving the woman of her rights by using his position as a police officer to coerce her to perform sex in September 2004.

According to a plea agreement filed with the court by the US attorney's public corruption unit, LoPriore, a 12-year Boston police veteran, will plead guilty, resign from the department, and never seek another job as a police officer in Massachusetts.

Prosecutors will recommend that he serve a year in prison, but LoPriore's lawyer may seek probation. A plea date has not yet been set.

His lawyer, Thomas Drechsler, declined to comment on the case yesterday, saying only, ``I hope the matter will be resolved shortly."

Boston lawyer John Swomley, who represents the woman, said she came to his office in the fall of 2004. She is not identified in court documents.

``She plopped down a badge in a black leather case and said, ``Oh, my God, what do I do?" Swomley said.

He said she told him that ``this guy has been making me give him [oral sex] whenever he sees me, and I just got sick of it. . . . When his pants were down around his ankles, I just took his badge."

The woman said LoPriore, who was assigned to East Boston, stopped her in Boston's Combat Zone while he was off duty. He was driving in his personal car with a child's car seat strapped in the back.

He flashed his badge, ordered her into the car, and drove her to various locations, where he forced her to perform oral sex, Swomley said.

His client was very troubled, too, that the officer refused to wear a condom, the lawyer said.

Swomley said he gave the black leather case containing LoPriore's badge, police identification photo, license to carry a firearm, and Social Security card to the FBI. Later, he said, agents secretly recorded the telephone call between his client and LoPriore.

Albert Goslin, the Police Department's acting commissioner, said that the FBI notified the department about the allegations in October 2004 and that LoPriore was placed on restricted duty, performing clerical work inside a station without a firearm.

While the FBI investigation was underway, LoPriore was charged with felony larceny in state court for allegedly forging signatures on timecards and collecting $1,102 pay for detail shifts he never worked at an East Boston construction site in 2004. That case, brought by Suffolk District Attorney Daniel F. Conley, is pending.

``Obviously it is important to us that I get someone of this ilk removed from the Police Department," said Goslin, adding that Boston police worked with federal authorities to craft language in the plea agreement that says LoPriore will waive all rights to reinstatement, appeal, or lost pay associated with his resignation.

He said the department, which worked with the FBI during the probe, was restricted by law from suspending LoPriore while the investigation into the sexual allegations was ongoing.

LoPriore, whose resignation becomes effective today, has had a history of complaints involving women.

While on duty in March 2002 , LoPriore transported an intoxicated woman in his cruiser without notifying operations or a supervisor, according to Boston Police Department records.

And in August 2002, LoPriore and another officer were outside their assigned patrol area when they saw a disturbance involving an intoxicated woman outside a club. The officers took the woman into their cruiser, drove her to Charlestown, and left her there, according to police records.

Under an agreement that settled both complaints, LoPriore served 20 days of a 60-day suspension.

In a statement announcing yesterday's charges against LoPriore, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan called the officer's conduct ``reprehensible."

``While only a minuscule percentage of law enforcement officers abuse their power," Sullivan said, ``such incidents unfairly taint the reputation of law enforcement professionals everywhere."

Disgraced Cop Quits Force (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet And Michele McPhee

Boston Herald, September 27, 2006

A Boston cop awaiting trial on charges of cashing in on details he reportedly never worked resigned yesterday after pleading guilty to using his badge to bargain for sex.

Sources said the alleged trysts between Michael Lopriore, 37, and a woman identified only as “JT” are believed to have occurred in September 2004 while he was both on duty and off.

“Getting rid of characters of his ilk can’t be done quick enough,” acting Boston police Commissioner Albert Goslin said. “We don’t make excuses for anybody.”

In exchange for no more than one year in prison, Lopriore, a 12-year veteran of the force who was assigned to East Boston, admitted to a federal charge of violating JT’s civil rights. He will be formally sentenced at a later date.

The disgraced cop was not charged with rape.

“It is a misdemeanor,” said Lopriore’s attorney, Thomas Drechsler. “I’m hoping the matter will be resolved quickly.”

Meanwhile, Lopriore still faces a 2005 state charge of larceny for allegedly pocketing $1,102 for detail jobs he never showed up for.

Because Lopriore was never indicted, Goslin said he was placed on desk duty at District A-7, where a supervisor could keep an eye on him.

Lopriore has been a habitual thorn in the department’s side, personnel records indicate.

In 2003, he was suspended for 20 days after it was found he had picked up a drunk clubgoer in his cruiser and gave her a lift to Charlestown without notifying the department.

In 1995, while still a rookie, he was suspended for three days for violating multiple department rules and procedures.

Boston Police Officer Facing Civil Rights Charges (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

BOSTON— A 12-year veteran of the Boston Police Department was charged in federal court Tuesday with violating the civil rights of a woman he allegedly coerced to perform a sex act.

Michael Lopriore, 37, of Everett allegedly misused his official authority as an officer, prosecutors said.

He has agreed to plead guilty, resign, and never seek another job as a police officer in Massachusetts, according to a plea agreement filed with U.S. attorney's office, The Boston Globe reported on its Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0070078

An attorney for Lopriore did not immediately return telephone messages Monday night. A telephone listing for Lopriore could not immediately be found.

Lopriore had been placed on administrative leave, acting Boston Police Commissioner Albert Goslin said in a statement.

Lopriore faces a maximum of one year in prison.

Forced Labor Case Expanded (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 27, 2006

Two managers of a Kansas City ice cream company were indicted Wednesday on new charges related to the alleged forced labor of Russian students who drove ice cream trucks.

David L. Carslake, 55, and David H. Mackintosh, 45, were among five men charged Monday in U.S. District Court in Kansas City with violating federal human trafficking laws.

On Wednesday, a grand jury in Springfield indicted Carslake and Mackintosh on a charge of document servitude for allegedly confiscating the passports and other identification documents of the eight young Russian men identified as victims in the human trafficking case.

Carslake was also indicted on a charge of visa fraud for allegedly making false statements in federal immigration documents concerning the status of the Russian students.

Federal prosecutors allege that the college-age students were forced to work long hours for little pay driving ice cream trucks for Kansas City-based Frosty Treats. The men were led to believe that they would suffer “serious harm” if they did not do as they were told, according to the indictment and supporting documents.

Carl Long, CEO of Frosty Treats, which operates ice cream trucks in cities throughout the country, said Wednesday that he was confident the company will be cleared of wrongdoing.

“We have a dispute over the factual pleadings brought forward by the government,” Long said.

The company has provided jobs to foreign students for many years, he said, and has never had problems before.

The other defendants named in the indictment are Jeffrey S. Guinn, 45, of Kansas City, and Evgeny Filimonov, 20, and Vadim Aleksandvovich-Tokarev, 21, both citizens of Russia.

Men Charged With Forced Labor Of Russian Students (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, September 27, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Three Kansas City men and two Russian nationals were charged in federal court with forcing eight Russian students to deliver ice cream for a local truck company, U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman said Tuesday.

David L. Carslake, 55, David H. Mackintosh, 45, and Jeffrey S. Guinn, 45, all of Kansas City, and Evgeny Sergeyevich Filimonov, 20, and Vadim Aleksandvovich-Tokarev, 21, both Russian citizens, were charged in a criminal complaint unsealed Tuesday after their arrest, Schlozman said in a news release.

Authorities said the men collaborated to force the students to work for Frosty Treats ice cream truck company of Kansas City by telling them they would be seriously harmed if they refused.

All five are charged with aiding and abetting each other from Jan. 1 to Sept. 17 to obtain forced labor. Schlozman said the case would go before a federal jury.

The eight students from Voronozh, Russia, were recruited under a summer work program run by the Russian company InterAir, according to an affidavit filed in support of the case. Frosty Treats employee Filimonov allegedly worked in Russia with Aleksandvovich-Tokarev to recruit the students, none of whom had traveled to the U.S. before and some of whom spoke no English, Schlozman said.

The students signed employment contracts to get work visas and each borrowed $2,500 to pay for their trips, Schlozman said.

Carslake and Mackintosh, the managers of Frosty Treats, are accused of threatening the students both psychologically and financially once they came to Missouri, forcing them to deliver ice cream. Guinn, the maintenance worker at the complex where the students lived, allegedly monitored their activities in the apartments.

The students were promised a "financially rewarding summer," but were forced to work 13 hours a day, seven days a week, sometimes for just 87 cents per hour, the affidavit said. The defendants forced six of them to live in a one-bedroom apartment, where they weren't allowed to use the telephone, Schlozman said.

Cambodia Gets Tough On Child Sex Trade (CSM)

By Adam Piore

DOJ_NMG_0070079

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

PHNOM PENH, CAMBODIA

Cambodian police this year have arrested at least 12 foreigners on charges of sexually abusing children - more than twice the amount snagged all of last year.

In addition to three Americans, they've caught four Germans, an elderly Swiss man, a Belgium national, and at least three Vietnamese nationals who helped the foreigners procure children.

For those who have long fought pedophilia here, the spike is actually cause for celebration. Most agree the increase from just five arrests last year probably has little to do with the prevalence of the crimes. Rather it's a function of increased political will, effort, and skill - encouraged by foreign governments like the US - on the part of Cambodia's police, who have for years been accused of allowing foreign pedophiles to operate with impunity.

"They are more reactive, more willing to work on this," says Beatrice Magnier, director of Action Pour Les Enfants, (APLE), a French nongovernmental organization that works to combat the child sex trade.

Khieu Sopheak, spokesman for the Ministry of Interior, says, "The authorities have increased their knowledge and skills after cooperation with NGOs. The implementation of the law gets better from one day to the next."

It's a trend that's been in the offing since at least 2000, when Cambodia first launched a major initiative funded by foreign donors aimed at targeting the exploitation of women and children and set up a hotline to receive tips. In 2002, Cambodia established a department in the Ministry of Interior specifically devoted to combating human trafficking and protecting at-risk juveniles.

But obstacles of apathy, corruption, and poverty prove to be constant challenges, NGO workers say. After all, many of the former leaders of the genocidal Khmer Rouge regime continue to live freely in Cambodia's northwestern provinces, unrepentant for crimes that killed 2 million Cambodians between the years 1975-1979. In Phnom Penh, angry mobs routinely beat thieves to death on the streets, because few trust the police to prosecute them. And corruption can often buy freedom for even the most heinous crimes.

But in recent years, foreign governments have gotten more serious about cracking down on the problem, and made it more difficult for Cambodian authorities to ignore.

In 2003, the US Congress passed the Child Protect Act, which allows the US to prosecute American citizens in the US for crimes against children committed overseas. Penalties can reach 30 years in prison. Canada, among others, recently enacted a similar law.

Since 2003, Cambodia has arrested and deported at least six Americans to face charges there, under the new law. One was Michael John Koklich, a California native who fled Cambodian police on his motorbike in February, before crashing into a barricade, and taking down Phnom Penh's deputy municipal antitrafficking police chief in the process.

"Cambodia has become a valuable ally in arresting the worst of all sexual predators, pedophiles," US Ambassador Joseph Mussomeli says. "We are very pleased with the excellent cooperation we have received."

And there are other encouraging signs. For years, pedophiles flocked to Svay Pak, the brothel village on the outskirts of Phnom Penh, bragging about exploits at coffeehouses and bars. NGOs and foreign governments tried in vain to convince Cambodia to do something about the child prostitution, which operated with impunity there. The government shut it down in 2004.

Nowadays in the countryside, even in remote areas, signs abound bearing the hotline number and the slogan: "Turn a sex tourist into an ex-tourist." The signs show a white hand holding the hand of a child in one picture, and the white hand in hand cuffs next.

Still, most agree there is a lot of work to be done. Even as Cambodia has taken steps forward, some point to recent missteps. Police arrested Terry Darrell Smith on July 31 and, according to the International Justice Mission (IJM), found evidence he was involved with two Vietnamese girls in their early teens.

But earlier this month, a Cambodian court released him and, says IJM, a US group working to end the underage sex trade, he disappeared for weeks. Police rearrested him last Wednesday following public outcry and diplomatic pressure, according to local newspaper reports. Authorities now plan to deport him to his home state of Oregon where he will face criminal charges. "The policies are improving, but the court is still very weak," says APLE's Mr. Magnier.

Recently, Cambodia apparently granted citizenship to Thomas Frank White, a millionaire from San Francisco currently in a Mexican jail on child sex charges. He's also wanted in the US for violating the Protect Act and has been accused by Thai officials of abusing children there.

Suspected pedophiles often come to Cambodia hoping to find anonymity. Fifteen years ago in Oregon, Mr. Smith had been "convicted of multiple charges that he used children in displays of sexual acts," The Oregonian reported last week. Belgian national Bessape Philippe, also arrested recently, had spent three years in a Belgian prison for abusing three Belgian boys aged 14 to 16.

APLE's Magnier says it's difficult to stop pedophiles operating in remote provinces. Perpetrators are often residents or long-term tourists who insinuate themselves into the lives of families, and develop the role of financial benefactors. They will prey on the child and use their financial leverage to prevent the family from taking action, he says.

Many of the recent cases came to light only because the perpetrators were careless and reported by groups like APLE, or cruel enough to make a scene. In the others, NGO workers used detective work: following tips, tracking suspects, interviewing victims, and turning cases over to the police.

Hate Crimes Wake Charles's Sleeping Giant (WP)

By Philip Rucker And William Wan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Rash of Race-Based Incidents Stems From Anger Over Shift in Demographics, Some Residents Say

A wave of offensive graffiti and vandalism in the past seven weeks has opened a public dialogue about the impact of a dramatic demographic shift in Charles County and has led officials to begin combating what some residents say has existed for years: a race relations problem.

As Charles transforms from a land of sprawling tobacco farms to a far-flung exurb of Washington, few have spoken openly about what one black resident calls "the browning of Charles County" -- the movement of large numbers of middle-class black families to an area that not long ago was predominantly white.

"There have been underlying feelings about racism in this county for many years," said Sandra Washington, a black woman who has lived in the Southern Maryland county for 25 years and helps run an alliance of African American ministers.

"So much of that has been bottled up in people," Washington said. "These are things that are exploding now."

At least 10 incidences of racist graffiti or vandalism, all classified as hate crimes, have occurred in Charles since mid-August. This month, police found "KKK" and disturbing symbols spray-painted on the doors and sign of a predominantly black Baptist church.

"When they're spraying 'white pride' and 'KKK,' that's not a perception problem. That's a real problem, and it's something that needs to be stopped," said Sheriff Frederick E. Davis, a Republican who is running for reelection.

FBI agents are planning to join authorities in their search for the vandals at the request of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the House Democratic whip, whose district includes Southern Maryland.

Wayne Cooper (D), president of the county Board of Commissioners, asked Hoyer last week to help get the federal government involved. "This is too much, and it's happening too fast," Cooper said.

State legislators representing Charles have pledged to review Maryland's hate crime laws, and county leaders plan town hall forums to promote racial tolerance and encourage discussion.

Charles is the fastest-growing Maryland county in the Washington region, and its growth has been fueled almost exclusively by blacks and other minorities.

Although the white population remained relatively stagnant between 2000 and 2005 -- decreasing by about 1,300 people -- the black population increased by more than 50 percent, jumping from about 31,000 to 47,500, according to census estimates. African Americans make up about 34 percent of Charles's approximately 139,000 residents.

Many of the new black residents are prosperous professionals who have left Prince George's County, Charles's neighbor to the north. Drawn by the county's relatively affordable homes, schools and rural character, many of these new residents have bought half-million-dollar homes in subdivisions that have sprouted on land where tobacco used to grow and slavery once thrived.

"There's the browning of Charles County. It's happening, and everybody's not on board with it happening," said Washington, executive director of Lifestyles Inc., a nonprofit community services organization based in La Plata.

Some leaders think the recent vandalism -- coupled with memories of the 2004 arson that destroyed or damaged 27 new houses in the Hunters Brooke subdivision, many of them bought by black families -- threatens to thwart the county's aggressive efforts to woo businesses and higher-paying jobs.

"It's a very urgent problem," Commissioner Candice Quinn Kelly (R-La Plata) said of the lingering notion of Charles as racist. "We're working hard to shed that image."

"Who would want to bring their company or business to a place where their employees may feel unrest?" Commissioner Edith J. Patterson (D-Pomfret) asked. "Who would want to move here if they're afraid they'll open their doors at night and be attacked either by graffiti or other means? . . .

DOJ_NMG_0070081

"We need to send a resounding message that this is not Charles County, this is not who we are and this is not what we want to represent."

The recent crimes have frustrated law enforcement officials. It takes only seconds to spray-paint the letters "KKK" on a building, authorities say, and, in a county where homes and churches are sometimes separated by miles, officers can cover only so much territory.

The county commissioners are offering $5,000 to find the vandals, and the sheriff's office is offering $1,000, but police have named suspects in only one incident.

The county sheriff's department announced yesterday the arrests of two 15-year-old Waldorf boys in a Sept. 9 incident. Authorities charged the juveniles, both of whom are white, with multiple counts of hate crime and malicious destruction of property in the spray-painting of two residences and a vehicle with racist graffiti in Waldorf.

Authorities said they do not believe that incident is related to the others.

When Zion Baptist Church was vandalized in rural Welcome on Sept. 10, officers said, they responded within 12 minutes of a triggered burglar alarm. They canvassed the neighborhood but found no suspects or significant clues.

"It's a frustrating kind of investigation," Davis said. "In some cases where they're spray-painting 'white pride' on the road, these people could just pull over . . . jump back in and get going in less than a minute."

Motives for the crimes are just as elusive. No known members of the Ku Klux Klan are in the county, said Capt. Joseph C. Montminy of the sheriff's office. The vandals could be members of radical organizations, he said, or they could be neighborhood teenagers.

"Some may be copycats, seeing someone who did this a few weeks ago and deciding to do it, too," Montminy said. "But until we're able to make any arrests, we just don't know."

The crimes have alarmed many residents. Patterson, who became the county's first black commissioner last year and is one of two African American candidates for the five-member board this fall, said unrest over hate crimes "is in its own way a form of terrorism."

William Braxton, the local NAACP president, moved to Charles from Prince George's in 1973. When he arrived, he said, "the 'N-word' was common to use."

White residents didn't know how to react to their new black neighbors and hoped that any awkwardness would go away if they stayed quiet, he said.

He said racial tensions have remained in the county and likened them to a "sleeping giant."

For white residents, some say, it took awhile for the migration of black families to the county in the late 1990s and early 2000s to sink in -- and even longer before people discussed it.

"They started looking around the restaurants, and a majority of the people eating there were black," Braxton said. "When they went to the mall and looked around and there were African Americans everywhere. It's like one day they just woke up, and there it was."

Change in a community is always difficult to handle, Kelly said.

"You have the newcomer thing going on, plus the fact that the newcomers are of a different race," Kelly said. "I'm sure there is a certain interpersonal struggle that takes place when you see the place you were born and raised changing. That's just the reality."

Judge Says St. Landry School Case On Target (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess, Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 27, 2006

LAFAYETTE — The St. Landry Parish school system is on track to be released from federal oversight by the end of next year, the federal judge handling the parish's desegregation case said Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge Tucker Melancon made the comments during a quarterly meeting in Lafayette with St. Landry Parish school system officials and School Board members.

"My intention in this case is to get it over as soon as possible," Melancon said. "… Barring some unforeseen circumstance, it's going to happen next December (2007)."

Melancon said he hopes to convene court in Opelousas — the St. Landry Parish seat — for the formal hearing to declare the school system "unitary," or free from discrimination.

Several legal hurdles remain.

To be freed from federal oversight, school officials must show discrimination has been eliminated in six areas.

Melancon ruled last year that three areas were unitary: transportation, faculty assignment and extracurricular activities.

The school system still must show discrimination does not affect decisions on the quality of education offered to students, the quality of facilities and student assignment.

A hearing was set for Tuesday on a motion by the School Board for unitary status in the area of quality of education.

That hearing was delayed to allow Justice Department attorneys time to review a forthcoming report from the state with information about racial balance in special-education programs, an issue raised in St. Landry Parish.

The hearing is expected to be taken up later this year.

In other business, school system officials reported $8 million has been spent on new construction and renovation to meet goals in a school facilities plan outlined in the desegregation case.

House Passes Abortion Bill On Minors (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 (AP) — Accompanying a minor across a state line to obtain an abortion and avoid parental notification in the girl's home state would become a federal crime under a bill the House passed Tuesday on a vote of 264 to 153.

Supporters of the legislation argued that it made no sense that minors who need parental permission to get an aspirin at school or to go on field trips can get an abortion without telling their parents.

The bill's sponsor, Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Republican of Florida, said, "It protects minors from exploitation from the abortion industry, it promotes strong family ties and it helps foster respect for state laws."

Opponents argued that it would result in the arrests of grandparents and others who were trying to shield girls from abusive parents.

Chances are slim that the House and the Senate, which approved a more limited version of the bill in July, will devise a compromise they can send to the president before the end of this session of Congress. But the House vote gives conservatives something to showcase when they return home next week to campaign for the midterm elections.

The interstate abortion bill, long a priority of anti-abortion groups, was one of the top items on conservative agendas this year, along with stem cell research.

The House on Tuesday passed another bill on that agenda, a measure that would cut off financial awards to plaintiffs who bring successful lawsuits against expressions of religion like Christmas displays on government grounds. The aim of the measure, approved 244 to 173, is to discourage lawsuits against local, state and federal governments over issues of separation of church and state.

There is no companion Senate bill and little chance the Senate will consider the House bill this session. The House vote was a reminder to the Republican Party's conservative base, however, that their issues were not being ignored.

Despite intense partisan divisions over the course of the Iraq war, the House on Tuesday easily approved $70 billion more for military operations there and in Afghanistan. Lawmakers also adopted a record $448 billion budget for the Pentagon.

With Iraq alone costing about $8 billion a month, another infusion of money will be needed next spring.

The House passed the Pentagon appropriations bill by a 394-to-22 vote Tuesday night, and the Senate is expected to act before adjourning this weekend.

Abortion Vote In House May Be Too Late To Boost GOP (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Scrambling to pass anti-abortion legislation before they recess for fall congressional elections, House Republicans on Tuesday won passage of a bill that would make it a federal crime to evade one state's parental consent laws by taking a minor to another state for an abortion.

But in a mark of the majority party's struggles with its "values" agenda, Senate Republicans may run out of time to vote on the measure before lawmakers leave town at the end of the week.

That would leave Republicans with few trophies to show their socially conservative base as they try to motivate voters in the final six weeks of the fiercely contested 2006 campaign.

Some strategists fear that failure to win final passage of the bill could hamper efforts to spur turnout of a reliably Republican voting bloc — which might mean the difference in key races around the country.

"This could be a problem," said Marjorie Dannenfelser, president of the Susan B. Anthony List, an anti-abortion group that is working to mobilize female voters opposed to abortion in six states seen as central to the fight for control of Congress.

Dannenfelser's warning came just days after national evangelical leaders met in Washington to intensify their push to persuade conservative voters to look past Republican legislative failures and go to the polls in November to support the party's candidates.

The bill that the House passed Tuesday by a vote of 264 to 153 was the latest initiative in a more than decade-long campaign to chip away at abortion rights.

But aides to senior Senate Republicans said Tuesday that they could not be sure the measure would make it to the floor for a vote.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who is fending off attacks by Democrats that he has presided over a "do-nothing" Congress, is under pressure in the session's waning days to pass crucial legislation funding the military, setting up tribunals for suspected terrorists and strengthening border security.

Faced with these priorities, consideration of the parental consent bill may have to wait until a lame-duck session after November's election.

Republican congressional leaders had not planned to be in this position six weeks before election day. In the aftermath of the party's 2004 electoral triumphs, in which socially conservative voters played a large role, the GOP agenda included initiatives to ban gay marriage and flag burning and to further limit abortions.

But the Bush administration focused on other issues in 2005. This year, a bid to ban gay marriage through a constitutional amendment foundered in June, as moderate Republicans in the Senate joined Democrats to block a vote on the issue.

Later that month, the Senate by one vote rejected a constitutional amendment that would have given Congress the power to ban flag burning.

The campaign to restrict access to abortions, meanwhile, has produced fewer successes than many conservatives had hoped.

"Have we had victories? Not enough," said Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio), a leading abortion foe who championed congressional passage of the controversial ban on what opponents term "partial birth" abortion three years ago.

Chabot said he could point to only two major legislative accomplishments since 1994, when Republicans took control of Congress: the abortion ban, which has been tied up in the courts, and a 2002 measure that requires a doctor who performs an abortion in which the fetus survives to turn the case over to another doctor or call 911 to have the baby transferred to a hospital.

Backers of the parental consent measure remain optimistic that it will become law, if not quite as quickly as they had hoped.

For years, state legislatures have been passing laws that require pregnant minors to notify or seek permission from a parent before they get an abortion.

About 35 states have a version of the measure on the books, which supporters say appropriately involves parents in the significant reproductive decisions of their children. Californians last year narrowly rejected such a law; Proposition 85 will put the issue before voters again in November.

Despite the proliferation of the notification measures, abortion opponents complain that some adults are helping an unknown number of minors skirt the laws by taking them to states that do not have the requirements.

In July, the Senate passed legislation that would criminalize that practice. President Bush said that he would sign the measure.

Instead of accepting the Senate bill, however, the House passed a modified version. Its author, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), said that she wanted a stronger version of the measure.

Along with making it a crime for anyone to take a minor across state lines for an abortion without parental consent, the House bill added a provision requiring the abortion provider to give one of the girl's parents or a legal guardian 24 hours' notice before the operation is performed.

The change means the bill cannot become law without going back to the Senate for another vote.

On Tuesday, abortion opponents converged on Capitol Hill to urge the Senate to act.

"We've never been this close. I see victory," said Ros-Lehtinen, who sent Frist and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) a strongly worded plea to agree to have a Senate vote before Congress recesses.

The plea was echoed by the president of the Family Research Council, Tony Perkins, who said in a statement: "This is the only pro-life legislation considered by Congress this session, and the Senate must get it done."

Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, charged that House Republicans were pushing the bill as a political ploy.

"It's clear that anti-choice congressional leaders are using this controversial legislation to rally their far-right base only a few weeks before the midterm election," Keenan said.

DOJ_NMG_0070084

Critics of the bill said family problems make it difficult for some minors who want an abortion to communicate with their parents.

Joining 215 Republicans in voting for the bill were 49 Democrats; opposing it were 143 Democrats, nine Republicans and one independent.

All 20 Republican members of California's House delegation supported the measure. All of the state's 33 Democrats opposed the bill except Reps. Dennis Cardoza of Atwater and Jim Costa of Fresno, who supported it, and Juanita Millender-McDonald of Carson, who did not vote.

GOP Pushes 'Values' Legislation (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

House Republican leaders yesterday sought to invigorate their conservative base with election-year legislation aimed at protecting both the religious freedom of municipalities and a parent's role in a minor's abortion decision.

The House passed a revised parental-notification bill and legislation limiting legal damages against cities and towns that lose lawsuits for violating the Constitution's ban on the establishment of religion.

"They help our members back home," a House Republican leadership aide said of the two bills. "Some of our members have constituents in their districts who really want this legislation."

The parental-notification bill, approved 264-153, would establish fines or up to a year in prison for anyone who knowingly skirts a state's parental-notification or parental-consent law by taking a pregnant minor to another state to have an abortion.

Both chambers approved different versions of the bill earlier this year, but Senate Democrats have blocked the final negotiations, seeking, among other things, changes to limit the notification rights of fathers who rape their daughters.

It was not clear yesterday whether the Senate would act on the bill this week, but if it does, the bill would likely pass and could then go on to President Bush, supporters said.

The House also approved, on a 244-173 vote, another element of the Republican "American Values Agenda" -- the Public Expression of Religion Act, which would deny legal fees to groups who win lawsuits against cities or towns found to have violated separation of church and state.

Supporters said municipalities currently feel pressured to remove public displays of religion such as monuments of the Ten Commandments from city halls because they would need to spend "millions" in taxpayer dollars to defend themselves.

If the Public Expression of Religion Act were to become law, groups like the American Civil Liberties Union would be barred from receiving legal fees if they prevail in a court battle.

"It would be a win for those that understand our Constitution guarantees freedom of religion, not freedom from religion," said Rep. Joe Pitts, Pennsylvania Republican.

The ACLU said it would discourage enforcement of the religious element of the Bill of Rights.

"This legislation would in fact weaken the very freedom they claim to be protecting," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office.

Meanwhile, Tom McClusky, vice president for government affairs at the Family Research Council, said the Election Day motivation of the Republican base is "mixed" right now, and it would help if Congress were to approve these two bills.

He said it would also help if language being negotiated in the defense authorization bill would allow military chaplains to publicly pray as they see fit, including using Jesus' name.

"They help with the base," he said of the bills. "It helps them to know Congress is caring about the issues they care about."

Democrats said Republicans are rightfully scared that they'll lose their majority in November, but added their efforts are too little too late.

"It's not going to work. They're looking for a lifesaver," said Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat.

He said that, unlike a few years ago, Republicans now face a public that's unhappy about the Iraq war, the handling of Hurricane Katrina and a large budget deficit. "If saying that you appreciate religion is going to turn that around, I'd like to see it," he said.

The parental-notification bill approved by the House yesterday differs from the Senate version because it would require the doctor performing the abortion to contact at least one of the girl's parents if the minor is from out of state.

To accommodate the Senate, House leaders also added a Senate provision, backed by Democrat Sen. Barbara Boxer of California, clarifying that a father who rapes his underage daughter couldn't sue someone who transports her out of state for an abortion. And if that father transports her, he would be subject to the bill's penalties.

House OKs Bill On Religious Expression (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams
AP, September 26, 2006

House Republicans, carrying out their election-year values agenda, on Tuesday pushed through legislation cutting off financial awards for lawsuits successfully filed against expressions of religion such as Christmas displays on government grounds.

The bill, passed 244-173, denies the awarding of attorney's fees or monetary damages to a party that wins a court case based on the establishment clause in the Constitution that is used to argue a separation of church and state.

There is no companion Senate bill and little chance the Senate would consider it in the waning days of this session, but the House vote was a reminder to the GOP's conservative base that their issues are not being ignored.

"We cannot continue to allow frivolous and, frankly, unwarranted lawsuits to stifle the beliefs and self-determination of our great communities," said Rep. Phil Gingrey, R-Ga.

Democratic opponents saw the bill as a serious infringement of constitutional rights.

"This bill would make it more difficult for ordinary Americans to defend their religious freedom against intrusion by government," said Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Texas. "There's nothing benign about this bill."

"Singling out one class of cases for the denial of attorney's fees when every other one gets them does seem to me an odd way to run a constitution," said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass.

Backers of the legislation cited cases contesting the use of religious symbols, such as crosses in veterans' cemeteries, the display of the Ten Commandments in public buildings or using public land to host the Boy Scouts, who require participants to declare belief in God.

They said local and state governments, unable to match the financial resources of civil liberties groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union and unwilling to pay costly attorney's fees in losing cases, often accede to demands to remove religious symbols.

"This is an issue of allowing the cases to go to court and not to have the threat or intimidation by the ACLU and their minions to hang over all of these heads," said Rep. John Hostettler, R-Ind., sponsor of the bill.

"With this bill we will close a loophole that has allowed liberal groups like the ACLU to prey on taxpayers for far too long," said Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, R-Fla.

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU Washington legislative office, said passage of the bill "would isolate and discourage enforcement of a specific piece of our Bill of Rights." The legislation, she said, "would, in fact, weaken the very freedom they claim to be protecting."

House Passes Measure On Religion Suits (WP)

By Alan Cooperman
The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The House passed a bill yesterday that would bar judges from awarding legal fees to the American Civil Liberties Union and similar groups that sue municipalities for violating the Constitution's ban on government establishment of religion.

Though the bill would prevent plaintiffs from recovering legal costs in any lawsuit based on the Establishment Clause, House Republicans said during a floor debate that it was particularly aimed at organizations that force the removal of Nativity scenes and Ten Commandments monuments from public property.

"Liberal groups . . . scour the country looking to sue cities and states with any kind of religious display, regardless of how popular these displays are," said Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite (R-Fla.). Because judges often require municipalities that lose such lawsuits to reimburse their opponents' legal fees, "citizens' precious monuments are being eroded with their own tax dollars," she added.

The bill, called the Public Expressions of Religion Protection Act, passed 244 to 173 on a mostly party-line vote.

Fredrickson added that it appears unlikely the Senate will pass the bill.

"But we're watching it, because it is designed to do real damage to First Amendment protections," she said. "What the backers of this legislation are leaving out of the discussion is that fees are only awarded when we've been successful in showing that someone's constitutional rights have been violated."

The American Legion, the Southern Baptist Convention and other conservative groups began pushing for the legislation after a Pennsylvania judge awarded $2 million to the ACLU of Pennsylvania and Americans United for Separation of Church and State. The two groups had successfully sued the school board in Dover, Pa., for requiring science teachers to teach "intelligent design" alongside evolution. The award was later reduced to $1 million.

Conservative groups were also irked when a judge awarded $550,000 to three groups -- Americans United, the Southern Poverty Law Center and the ACLU of Alabama -- after they prevailed in a lawsuit against former Alabama chief justice Roy S. Moore's display of the Ten Commandments.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.), said the ACLU and similar groups are "profiteering" as well as seeking "to remove every vestige of our religious heritage from public places."

Texas Case Involving Marital Counseling Is Latest To Test Line Between Church And State (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

HOUSTON, Sept. 26 — Peggy Lee Penley's marriage was going sour when she turned to her pastor. They had been friends for years and had started a Bible church together in Fort Worth. He was more than Ms. Penley's spiritual shepherd, also serving as a licensed professional counselor, and had helped her before.

But Ms. Penley says that after she confided her sexual relationship with another man and her plans for divorce, the pastor, C. L. Westbrook Jr., disclosed her "biblically inappropriate relationship" to church elders. Mr. Westbrook eventually informed the full congregation of the church, CrossLand Community Bible, she says, shaming her publicly and urging members to discipline her by shunning her.

In 2001, Ms. Penley sued her pastor for defamation and negligence, saying he had violated his responsibilities as a professional counselor. Her lawsuit has attracted considerable attention from church groups trying to prevent court intervention in religious matters. The case went before the Texas Supreme Court on Tuesday, and the outcome will once again help define the evolving line between church and state.

While courts have long held that religious practices and discipline are immune from court review under a legal doctrine known as "ecclesiastical abstention," secular misconduct by religious figures is not automatically protected.

Ms. Penley's lawyer, Darrell L. Keith of Dallas, told the court that the issue was simply a matter of professional negligence by a counselor.

"She believed that she was talking to him in a confidential setting as her secular marital counselor, not as her pastor," Mr. Keith said. "And she didn't believe she was at risk."

Mr. Westbrook's lawyer, Kelly J. Shackelford, told the judges that Ms. Penley "obviously knew what she signed on for" and that the court was being asked to enter "the internal processes of the church," where it did not belong.

"Since 1871, the U.S. Supreme Court has said courts can't enter these cases," said Mr. Shackelford, chief counsel for the Liberty Legal Institute in Plano, a conservative group that often represents churches in religious freedom cases. Church discipline and doctrine, he said, are inherently ecclesiastical.

"The very entry of the court into these areas is a violation and causes entanglement," he said.

A lower court had dismissed Ms. Penley's suit, but an appeals court revived it, leaving Mr. Westbrook to appeal to the state's highest civil court to bar the way to a trial.

Ms. Penley, who has married the man she became involved with and now lives on the East Coast, was not in court on Tuesday, and Mr. Keith said she would have no comment.

Mr. Westbrook was present but stayed silent. "He's trying not to say anything and get in the middle of everything," Mr. Shackelford said after the hearing. "The fact that they took this appeal and heard this case means there's a chance that we'll have protection, not only for Pastor Westbrook, but for all churches and all pastors, not to have to go through that kind of thing."

Church groups have leapt into the case, submitting briefs that warn of growing attacks on religious autonomy.

"For a church to be compelled to submit to extensive discovery and an invasive public trial before a jury, that alone can chill religious freedom — even if the church is eventually vindicated by the court," said a brief filed by the National Association of Evangelicals in support of Mr. Westbrook.

According to their briefs, Ms. Penley and Mr. Westbrook say that in 1998, Ms. Penley and her husband at the time, Benny Stone, consulted Mr. Westbrook in his office about their marital troubles. They paid him a fee for his services.

DOJ_NMG_0070087

The following year, Mr. Westbrook and his wife, the Stones and several other couples founded the CrossLand Community Bible Church, with Mr. Westbrook as pastor. Ms. Penley said she and other couples attended group counseling sessions at the pastor's home in 2000. Then, realizing her marriage was over, she says, she "engaged in a sexual relationship" with her current husband, Bobby Penley, while she was in Tennessee.

She says that she told the pastor of the relationship upon her return and said to him that she was planning to divorce her husband, and that Mr. Westbrook recommended a lawyer.

But when the pastor discussed disciplining her, Ms. Penley's brief says, she told him she was leaving the church and wrote a letter of resignation. It was after that, the brief says, that the pastor told the elders and issued a letter to the congregation to "shun and ostracize" her.

Mr. Westbrook says that he learned of her infidelity from others and that his counseling as pastor was not part of her earlier professional visits. He also says she agreed in writing to submit to church discipline, including an injunction from Matthew 18:17: "If he refuses to listen to them, tell it to the church."

In the hearing on Tuesday, the nine justices struggled with the nuances, and there were indications that they found the case difficult.

"If the damages arise from the ecclesiastical act," Justice Harriet O'Neill said, "then really, we're dancing on the head of a pin in terms of trying to parse the secular versus pastoral counseling." A ruling could take a year or more.

Recent legal records are thick with thorny ecclesiastical cases.

In Mississippi, the former wife of the governor sued her Episcopal priest and her church after learning that the priest had taped her admission of adultery for use against her in a custody case by her ex-husband. The case was dismissed. In Royal Oak, Mich., outside Detroit, a man who had left his church sued his pastor for revealing the confidence that he had been with prostitutes. That case was also dismissed.

Courts have had no trouble convicting religious figures of sexual misconduct, since the charges involve clearly secular actions that by their nature fall outside accepted religious practices.

ANTITRUST:

Wright Backers Hopeful (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 27, 2006

There's still time for a deal, North Texas lawmakers say

WASHINGTON – Legislation to lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field could come down to the wire to clear both the House and Senate before a pre-election recess.

FILE 2005/AP Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has objected to language in the Wright bill that could help protect the legislation from a court fight under antitrust law.

Finding a procedural path for the Wright legislation has proven elusive on both sides of the Capitol as congressional leaders try to rush through major legislation before returning home Saturday to campaign for the November elections.

Still, lawmakers from North Texas weren't conceding Tuesday that the issue would have to fall into the lame-duck session.

Getting the bill cleared Friday or early Saturday remained a possibility.

"It's not dead for this week, but it's still in flux," said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth.

The legislation would implement a June compromise to repeal the 1979 Wright amendment.

The bill needs to be enacted by the end of the year, or the agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport will expire.

The House is awaiting action on an original version of the legislation and one amended by the House Judiciary Committee that removes an exemption from antitrust laws.

The exemption was intended to protect the deal in court.

House members from North Texas have been hoping to pass their original Wright bill under suspension of normal rules, a procedure usually used for legislation that's considered uncontroversial.

The bill could conceivably clear without a recorded vote under that path, though objections from any members would force the North Texas lawmakers to corral two-thirds of the chamber to get it passed.

But the Wright bill still hasn't won a place on the House calendar for this week.

"We've got the votes for that version," Ms. Granger said. As for the tight timeline, she said, "it's narrowing, but there's time."

Several paths ahead

DOJ_NMG_0070088

The legislation faces several potential paths, which lawmakers were contemplating as competing priorities limited their options.

"We do not have a date, a time or the exact vehicle yet," said Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Dallas.

"We are going to be here for long days and long nights, and it is my belief that we're going to come up with an answer that doesn't exist at this time."

The Wright legislation would repeal the Wright law in 2014, while immediately allowing flights anywhere in the U.S. as long as they first stop in one of nine states that make up the existing Wright perimeter.

The plan would also demolish 12 of the 32 gates at Love to prevent growth in air traffic, noise and pollution.

Nineteen gates at the Dallas airport are now operational.

Members of Stop-and-Think, a community group from North Texas formed by residents living near Love Field, visited Capitol Hill Tuesday to meet with North Texas lawmakers about the Wright deal.

Founders of the group, which received its initial funding from American Airlines, said they wanted to convey their concerns about neighborhood issues and voice support for the local compromise plan with its gate limitations and other aspects.

The gate reduction drew attention on Capitol Hill this summer from key lawmakers who oversee antitrust laws.

The language

A Senate version of the bill to lift flight restrictions at Love Field continues to be held up by Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the top Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee who has objected to language that could help protect the legislation from a court fight under antitrust law.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, removed an outright antitrust exemption from the bill last week, replacing it with other protective language, to win over the chair of the judiciary committee, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Mr. Leahy told The Dallas Morning News Tuesday that the number of gates at the Dallas airport is "entirely up to them" but said he has concerns about the antitrust implications.

"I just don't want to rewrite on the back of the envelope our antitrust laws," he said.

Mr. Leahy, who has offered his own suggested wording for the bill, said he hasn't seen the changes that Mr. Specter signed off on last week.

A spokesman for Ms. Hutchison said the language has been shared with Mr. Leahy's staff and others on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Consumer groups write

Consumers Union and Consumer Federation of America, two consumer groups opposing the deal, wrote to Mr. Leahy Tuesday thanking him for his stance against what they called an anti-consumer deal that would "divide up the airline market for Dallas at the expense of the flying public."

Even if lawmakers find a way to get their bills to the House and Senate floors this week, they'll need to reconcile the two versions and get a final bill cleared again in both chambers.

Lawmakers were considering whether to pass the original House bill and let the Senate make an amendment substituting Ms. Hutchison's new language.

The House would then have to sign off on the revisions before the bill could be sent to President Bush.

If both chambers independently pass different versions, the bill could be forced into a time-consuming conference committee.

And if the legislation doesn't get through this week, lawmakers would be forced to try again in a lame-duck session.

What Congress can accomplish during that post-election period in November and December remains uncertain, especially given the chance that Democrats could win enough races to retake control of the House.

But lawmakers said they remained hopeful even if they couldn't get the legislation cleared this week.

"I'm still pretty optimistic that there's time," said Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell.

"If we have to go to the lame-duck session with this bill, I don't think it dooms it in the least."

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller said, "I still think we have a good chance whether it's now or in November or December."

Wright Compromise Bill Faces More Opposition (DALLASBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, September 27, 2006

Opposition to the Wright Amendment compromise bill continues to mount locally, as a new study says the bill will cost consumers billions, and two consumer groups have written House Democratic leaders to protest the bill.

The study was conducted by Steven A. Morrison, a member of the Department of Economics at Northeastern University and editor in chief of the Journal of Transport Economics and Policy. The study was solicited by the law firm of Bickel & Brewer, which represents Love Terminal Partners, which has filed a lawsuit over the local agreement that the Wright compromise bill is based on.

In the report, Morrison looked at U.S. Department of Transportation data on airline fares and passenger volume to estimate the effects on consumers of full repeal versus the proposed agreement.

He said by fully repealing the bill consumers would recognize $726 million annually, compared to between $117 million and $383 million annually from through ticketing.

The Wright compromise bill calls for a repeal of the Wright restrictions after eight years. In the meantime, the bill allows for immediate through ticketing. Through-ticketing involves making a layover stop when traveling to long-distance destinations. The compromise bill also calls for the gates at Dallas Love Field Airport to be reduced from 32 gates to 20.

"A conservative estimate is that consumers will be worse off by $2.7 billion over the next eight years because the agreement will keep airfares higher compared with full repeal," Morrison said.

Two consumers groups, the Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America also sent letters Monday to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, urging House Democratic leaders to oppose the plan to circumvent the House Judiciary Committee version of the bill, which removed antitrust immunity for American and Southwest Airlines.

"Erasing the important work of the committee charged with protecting consumers from anticompetitive behavior would constitute a breakdown of rational governance in the House of Representatives," the groups said in the letters.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, the sponsor of the bill, has hotlined the bill, which is a formal way of getting unanimous consent that doesn't require a formal vote to pass the bill.

Hutchison, late last week won over a major detractor of the Wright compromise bill, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., by agreeing to take out wording that exempted the bill from antitrust laws. The wording was replaced with other protective language, Hutchison's reps said at the time.

A spokeswoman for Hutchison said Tuesday that there was a hold on the bill in Senate, signaling that someone had objections to the bill. Hutchison is working through the legislative process and working with staff to work through concerns and the reasons why someone might have a hold on the bill.

If Congress doesn't pass the agreement by Dec. 31 it will be voided.

J&J Sues Boston Sci, Abbott Over Guidant (AP)

By Linda A. Johnson, AP Business Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

J&J Alleges Breach of Guidant Deal, Sues Boston Sci, Abbott Seeking $5.5 Billion

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- Months after Johnson & Johnson lost a bidding war for medical-device maker Guidant, J&J is suing the winner, Boston Scientific, and Abbott Laboratories, alleging the two companies induced Guidant to breach its agreement with J&J.

New Brunswick.-based Johnson & Johnson is seeking $5.5 billion in damages, according to the lawsuit, filed Monday in U.S. District Court in New York. The lawsuit also seeks reimbursement for court costs, attorney fees and interest.

The suit asks the court to rule that Indianapolis-based Guidant Corp. breached the companies' merger agreement and that Boston Scientific Corp. and Abbott Laboratories Inc. intentionally interfered with the deal and induced Guidant to breach it.

Natick, Mass.-based Boston Scientific trumped Johnson & Johnson's final $24.2 billion offer with a $27.2 billion bid to acquire Guidant and its portfolio of stents, defibrillators, pacemakers and other medical devices.

Guidant paid Johnson & Johnson a $705 million breakup fee after it opted to accept Boston Scientific's offer in late January. To eliminate possible antitrust snags, Boston Scientific agreed to sell Guidant's stent and vascular business to Abbott for $4.1 billion and a $900 million loan.

Randy Katz, a merger and acquisitions specialist at law firm Bryan Cave LLP, said J&J won't receive anywhere near the $5.5 billion, and that the case likely will be settled out of court.

"J&J feels that it needs to put a dent in Boston Scientific and Abbott," financially and by distracting management of its two competitors, Katz said.

J&J said it would have no comment beyond the court filing.

The lawsuit alleges Boston Scientific only won the takeover battle because "Guidant leaked confidential information to a third party, Abbott, for the purpose of arranging a prepackaged divestiture of significant Guidant businesses to Abbott."

"Based on these disclosures," the lawsuit states, "Abbott agreed to enter into a divestiture and financing agreement with Boston Scientific, which allowed Boston Scientific to make an offer for Guidant that would not require a lengthy and uncertain antitrust review."

DOJ_NMG_0070090

J&J had offered in December 2004 to pay $25.4 billion for Guidant, whose shareholders approved that deal. J&J reduced its offer to $21.5 billion after a series of recalls and warnings involving thousands of Guidant pacemakers and defibrillators. The two companies amended their merger deal in November 2005. Guidant was barred from soliciting other offers and, if it received an unsolicited bid, from giving confidential information to any third parties.

Paul Donovan, spokesman for Boston Scientific, said his company "complied with all the terms of the J&J/Guidant merger agreement. We believe the suit is meritless."

"We find it curious that J&J has chosen to sue eight months after Boston Scientific entered into a definitive agreement with Guidant, and five months after the transaction closed," Donovan said.

Katz said it likely "took J&J a fair amount of time to put together all the puzzle pieces about what they allege."

Melissa Brotz, a spokeswoman for Abbott Laboratories Inc. of North Chicago, Ill., also said the "lawsuit is without merit." She declined further comment.

Guidant's former chief executive officer, James Cornelius, now is interim CEO at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., which said he was not available for comment.

Also Tuesday, Standard & Poor's Ratings Services changed its outlook for Boston Scientific's credit rating from stable to negative, but affirmed its current ratings. S&P cited numerous factors, including Boston Scientific increasing its debt from $2 billion to $9 billion to acquire Guidant.

S&P also said Boston Scientific had lower-than-expected preliminary third-quarter sales because of continued weak demand for its cardiac devices and an unexpected weakening in sales of drug-coated stents, tiny metal scaffolds that keep heart arteries open after blockages have been cleared.

Boston Scientific leads J&J in the U.S. market for those stents, with about 55 percent of sales to J&J's 45 percent. When J&J proposed buying Guidant, Guidant, Abbott and a third company all were preparing to get their own drug-coated stents on the market. That was one reason J&J wanted Guidant, which also would have given it entry into the lucrative market for implantable pacemakers and defibrillators.

In trading on the New York Stock Exchange, shares of J&J rose 48 cents to close at $64.67, while shares of Boston Scientific fell 15 cents or 1 percent to close at $14.80 and Abbott Labs rose 12 cents to close at $48.07.

UPI, September 27, 2006

New Jersey's Johnson & Johnson is suing Boston Scientific Corp. for $5.5 billion, alleging improprieties in its purchase of Guidant Corp.

Both Boston Scientific and J&J had sought to acquire Guidant, but the Massachusetts firm's $27.5 billion offer won.

Johnson & Johnson alleges in its New York federal lawsuit, which also names Abbott Laboratories, that Boston Scientific prevailed "only because Guidant leaked confidential information to a third party, Abbott, for the purpose of arranging a prepackaged divestiture of significant Guidant businesses to Abbott," Boston Business Journal said.

Once Guidant had done so, Abbott agreed to enter into a divestiture and financing agreement with Boston Scientific, "which allowed Boston Scientific to make an offer for Guidant that would not require a lengthy and uncertain antitrust review," the suit says.

J&J Sues Boston Scientific Over Guidant Acquisition (Update7) (BLOOM)

By David Glovin And Avram Goldstein

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

Sept. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Johnson & Johnson, which lost a battle to buy heart-device maker Guidant Corp., sued winning bidder Boston Scientific Corp. for $5.5 billion, saying the deal was tainted by a leak of confidential information.

Boston Scientific was able to buy Guidant for $27.5 billion because Guidant secretly allowed Abbott Laboratories to review Guidant's finances, according to a complaint filed yesterday in New York federal court. Abbott agreed to buy part of Guidant's business to help Boston Scientific avoid antitrust problems, the suit said. Guidant and Abbott were named defendants.

The lawsuit shows that the fierce rivalry between Natick, Massachusetts-based Boston Scientific, the second largest maker of heart stents, and New Brunswick, New Jersey-based J&J, the world's biggest medical device maker, isn't cooling down.

``I don't think it ever ends," said Jan David Wald, an analyst with A.G. Edwards & Sons in Boston in a telephone interview today. ``I think there is acrimony between the founders of Boston Scientific and the management of J&J. It's so longstanding that it's hard to see it going away."

Since defeating J&J, Boston Scientific has been buffeted by product recalls, falling sales, profit warnings, analyst downgrades and growing legal risks, driving the company's market value down to $21.8 billion from $31.2 billion in less than five months.

``Isn't that amazing?'' said Wald. ``I think the valuation is way too low. There's risk there, and investors are still thinking about it instead of jumping in. Overall I think it is an undervalued company.''

`Meritless'

J&J lost the deal in January, when Abbott made financing agreement that enabled Boston Scientific to snatch Guidant, the lawsuit said. Guidant accepted the bid as superior to J&J's offer, and J&J promptly received a $705 million termination fee from Guidant.

``Throughout this process, we complied with all the terms of the J&J-Guidant merger agreement,'' said Boston Scientific spokesman Paul Donovan in an e-mailed statement today. ``We believe the suit is meritless.''

Boston Scientific found it ``curious'' that the suit was filed five months after the transaction was completed, Donovan said. Melissa Brotz, a spokeswoman for Abbott Park, Illinois- based Abbott, said the lawsuit ``is without merit.''

Shares

J&J shares rose 48 cents to $64.67 in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange as of 4:01 p.m. Boston Scientific shares fell 15 cents to $14.80 hares of Abbott Park, Illinois- based Abbott Labs fell 12 cents to $48.07.

In December 2004, Johnson & Johnson agreed to acquire Guidant for $25.4 billion. In June 2005, Guidant recalled 109,000 implantable electronic heart defibrillators with faulty batteries linked to seven deaths. The $30,000 devices are implanted to automatically restart stopped hearts.

In October 2005, J&J said the recall contributed to a material change in the value of Guidant and it reduced its offer to $21.5 billion. The agreement barred Guidant from soliciting other offers or providing confidential information to another company, the suit said.

In December as the merger awaited regulatory review, Boston Scientific made a $25 billion bid for Guidant that was ``fraught with uncertainty,'' the suit said. Guidant then improperly allowed Abbott to review its finances to see whether Abbott would agree to buy some of its businesses in the event Boston Scientific prevailed, the suit said.

Stents

Abbott's agreement to buy Guidant's heart stent business enabled Boston Scientific, the world's second largest stent maker, to sidestep antitrust hurdles, according to the complaint. Stents are tiny tube-like devices doctors use to keep open arteries cleared of blockage.

``Without a pre-packaged divestiture agreement, Boston Scientific could not have made a proposal that would have been acceptable to Guidant's board,'' the suit claimed.

Since the acquisition was completed in April, Boston Scientific has recalled another 27,600 defibrillators and the worldwide defibrillator market dropped for the first time.

While J&J may be happy it didn't acquire Guidant's electronic heart devices, it is extremely unhappy about losing the stent franchise to Abbott, said Bruce Nudell, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. in New York.

``It's going to be painful for J&J to have Abbott be probably the foremost stent vendor in the world and Boston also have access to an Abbott stent that is potent'' while continuing to sell its own U.S.-market leading stents, he said.

Judge Dismisses Parts Of AMD's Case Against Intel (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal judge dismissed major portions of Advanced Micro Devices Inc.'s high-profile antitrust suit against Intel Corp., accepting Intel's argument that many of AMD's claims are beyond the reach of U.S. law.

AMD, based in Sunnyvale, Calif., accuses Intel of illegally maintaining a monopoly in the market for microprocessor chips that act as the brains in most personal computers. Its suit, filed in June 2005 in federal court in Delaware, questions Intel's business tactics in several countries, including Britain, Germany and Japan.

Intel, of Santa Clara, Calif., asked the judge to dismiss AMD claims that are based on the foreign effect of Intel's alleged tactics. Intel pointed out, among other things, that AMD's chips are manufactured in Germany and assembled into final products in Malaysia, Singapore and China.

Intel argued that AMD is seeking damages for lost sales of those foreign-made microprocessors in foreign markets, and was separately seeking redress in European, Asian and South Korean courts. As a result, Intel contended that the U.S. federal court lacks jurisdiction over AMD's "foreign commerce" claims.

AMD, in response, argued that that the microprocessor market is global, and that it was not making any "foreign commerce" claims.

U.S. District Judge Joseph Farnan sided with Intel. He ruled that AMD "has not demonstrated that the alleged foreign conduct of Intel has direct, substantial and foreseeable effects in the United States which gives rise to its claim."

Chuck Mulloy, an Intel spokesman, said, "We are pleased that Judge Farnan appears to have agreed with our legal analysis and argument." He said the company would refrain from further comment until a hearing with the judge Wednesday.

An AMD spokesman, Michael Silverman, said the company is studying the ruling, but noted that much of the case still remains.

"Notwithstanding the judge's ruling today, Intel cannot escape antitrust scrutiny for its conduct--wherever in the world it occurs," Mr. Silverman said. "As this U.S. litigation is joined by global antitrust investigations, it is clear that Intel cannot escape the consequences of its illegal monopoly abuses."

DeCode Genetics Sues Ex-Workers, Claiming Trade-Secret Violations (WSJ)

By Antonio Regalado

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

In a case that may threaten a major U.S. project to study the DNA of children, an Icelandic gene-hunting company said it was suing five ex-employees for stealing trade secrets and breach of contract.

Four of the five former employees of DeCode Genetics Inc., based in Reykjavik, now work for Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, which in June announced a high-profile plan to collect and study DNA from some 100,000 children.

The hospital, known as CHOP, intends to use the database of DNA profiles to find links between genes and common conditions like obesity. Publicly traded DeCode operates a similar database in Iceland.

In its suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, DeCode asked the court to prevent CHOP or its former employees from using any of its trade secrets.

In a statement, CHOP officials said the "hospital believes that the claims against its researchers are without merit and that they will prevail in the lawsuit." The hospital said it would "vigorously" defend its employees and its own research program.

DeCode alleges in the suit that its former vice president of business development, Hakon Hakonarson, and four other former employees provided CHOP with proprietary information, including business plans and research results. Dr. Hakonarson, who left DeCode in May after more than seven years of employment, now leads a new genomics center at CHOP.

Dr. Hakonarson didn't return a phone message yesterday. In an interview this summer, he said the facility was "going to perform genotyping on the industrial scale within academia."

The conflict arises as scores of research teams compete to use new DNA maps and DNA-reading devices to discover the causes of common diseases. Although the Iceland database has generated a string of high-profile scientific results for DeCode, it remains unprofitable.

Microsoft's Precrimes (WSJ)

By Alberto Mingardi

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

Quarrels between the European Commission and Microsoft seem to be the daily bread in Brussels. In the beginning there was Mario Monti, who as EU antitrust chief in 2004 fined Microsoft a record €497 million for a series of violations, including its "bundling" of Media Player with its Windows operating system. Mr. Monti's successor, Neelie Kroes, didn't trade the iron fist for a velvet glove: Earlier this year she fined the software giant another €280.5 million for not having complied with the Commission's orders. It is worth noting that the latter fine came even though the original case is still under judicial review.

Above and beyond this fumus persecutionis, another dispute that's coming out into the open between Ms. Kroes and Microsoft entails possibly significant consequences for the very essence of competition regulation, which is at risk of becoming antitrust policing.

Since March, the Commission has expressed concerns about Vista, the new version of Windows, ready to be released in a few months but waiting for an informal greenlight from Brussels. Ms. Kroes has said that she expects Microsoft to apply "the general principle" of the Commission's 2004 ruling to future Windows versions.

This claim is based on the assumption that the original ruling can be a source of legal restraint far above its original scope. Leaving aside its merits or shortcomings, the Monti decision on Media Player orders Microsoft only to "refrain from using any technological, commercial, contractual or any other means which would have the equivalent effect of tying [Media Player] to Windows."

Ms. Kroes's objections do not seem to take into account the general trend in information technology to marry previously independent functions. Among others, Google is showing this to be the way forward by integrating plenty of formerly independent functions -- from daily planners to spreadsheets -- into its email service, and by piling up ever more functions into its search engine. Dictating business strategies should not be a regulator's job.

Furthermore, from a mere procedural point of view, the situation today is not comparable to the one that led to Mr. Monti's original ruling. Though first developed in 1998, Microsoft's Media Player was integrated in Windows XP in 2001. This led to complaints by the then major supplier of analogous software, RealNetworks, on both the sides of the Atlantic. RealNetworks won the game in Europe, and Mr. Monti forced Microsoft to release a version of XP without Media Player.

Real's complaints in Europe and the U.S. also led to a business agreement that the two companies signed in October 2005. One of the peace treaty's key points concerns Vista: The new program will redirect users to a Web site to download the Real software needed to play Real media files. The Media Player dispute really seems to be over for the litigants -- if not for the regulator. * * *

The case of Vista is unprecedented in another way as well. The Commission is threatening Microsoft not to violate the "spirit" of an older decision -- i.e., not to bundle too many new features with its new operating system. In a subtle way, this time it is the regulator that is casting the first stone.

As Brussels ponders a revamping of its monopoly policies, there is a demand among experts for the Commission to focus more on consumer welfare per se than on the form that a particular business practice takes (e.g., exclusive deals or bundling). However, forms cannot be bypassed.

Vista is not the same program that the EU has already ruled about -- and this is not merely a matter of "forms." The new operating system's alleged future dominance is merely a prediction, albeit a reasonable one based on the history of previous iterations of Windows. Still, there can be no evidence of the size of Vista's market share until it is released and sold.

What's more, the Commission already has shown little success in predicting the future when it comes to Microsoft. Two years on, it seems clear that Mr. Monti's concerns about Media Player's becoming dominant in its market segment were greatly exaggerated. In spite of its integration within Windows, Media Player had to face aggressive competition, and there is no sign that RealAudio or Apple's iTunes could not grow their market shares because they were not bundled with Windows (iTunes is of course bundled in Apple's Mac OS). In fact, the opposite has proven true: A recent Nielsen/NetRatings survey found that Apple's iTunes Web site and software reach 14% of Internet users world-wide -- up 241% in just one year. What's more, the market demand for the Media Player-less version of Windows XL was so minimal as to be an embarrassment for Mr. Monti, who had cited consumer choices as one reason for ruling against Microsoft in 2004.

Ms. Kroes's apparent desire to apply the old Monti ruling to an as-yet-unreleased Vista raises an obvious question. As far as antitrust cases, the Commission is already prosecutor, judge and jury. Shall its powers expand over the boundaries of time, too? * * *

In "Minority Report," a 1956 Philip K. Dick short story made famous by a Steven Spielberg film a few years ago, murders are prevented before they happen thanks to three mutants who foresee the future. The system initially works, but quickly collapses as a former policeman proved it incompatible with justice and the rule of law.

Neelie Kroes has said it would be desirable for the newer Windows "to avoid the problems we are facing now." In a nutshell, this is the cornerstone of a new approach to competition policy: a doctrine of harm pre-emption, so to speak. Whether such a doctrine is to be applied to cases other than Microsoft's remains to be seen.

But "Minority Report" reminds us of a simple, stubborn fact: You cannot be "guilty" of any crime before you have commited it and been accused, much less proven, of having committed it. This is a basic tenant of legal certainty as we know it. Why should it not continue to apply to competition policy?

FTC Clears Regent Buy Of 5 CBS Stations (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

NEW YORK --Radio broadcasting company Regent Communications Inc. received antitrust approval from the Federal Trade Commission to buy five radio stations serving the Buffalo, N.Y., market from CBS Corp. for $125 million in cash.

The FTC on Monday granted early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law, according to the agency's Web site.

Cincinnati-based Regent announced on Sept. 5 that it planned to operate the Buffalo stations -- WBLK-FM, WBUF-FM, WJYE-FM, WYRK-FM and WECK-AM -- through a local marketing agreement starting in October.

DOJ_NMG_0070094

After the deal closes, Regent will own and operate 19 radio stations in the Upstate New York region including stations in the Buffalo, Albany, Utica/Rome and Watertown markets.

The transaction is being funded through $240 million of senior credit facilities being arranged by Banc of America Securities.

Shares of Regent fell 5 cents to $3.85 on the Nasdaq, while those of New York-based CBS fell 35 cents to $28.30 on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. 'lobbied' The EC Over Microsoft Fine (CNET)

By Richard Thurston, Special to CNET News.com

CNET News, September 27, 2006

European Commissioner Neelie Kroes reveals that U.S. Embassy pressured her over the Microsoft antitrust case.

The U.S. government sought to influence the European Commission over Microsoft's antitrust case, according to Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes.

Kroes said the U.S. Embassy in Brussels, Belgium, had asked her to be "nicer" to Microsoft ahead of her decision to fine the software giant 280 million euros ($357 million) in July.

The commissioner criticized the approach. "This is of course an intervention which is not possible," Kroes told Dutch newspaper Financieele Dagblad this week.

When asked if she was annoyed by the embassy's approach, she said: "In my work, I cannot have a preference. I have, however, a personal opinion, but that is for Saturday night."

Kroes' representative added in an e-mail to CNET News.com's sister site ZDNet UK on Tuesday: "We can confirm that she was lobbied and that she did not appreciate it."

Microsoft declined to comment on Kroes' claims, but an insider insisted that the company had not tried to influence discussions between the U.S. government and the EC.

The U.S. Embassy had not responded to requests for comment at the time of writing.

Microsoft was hit with the fine for failing to comply with the Commission's landmark antitrust ruling of 2004.

The Commission had ordered the software giant to open up its code to help rivals develop server software that is fully compatible with Windows.

Microsoft has previously denied failing to comply with the terms of the antitrust ruling. Two months ago, it submitted a lengthy document which it said proved it had opened up its server interoperability protocols, as demanded by the EC.

Richard Thurston of ZDNet UK reported from London.

By Glenn Roberts Jr.

Inman News, September 27, 2006

Several MLSs reverse policies amid FTC investigations

The New Jersey Multiple Listing Service, a regional MLS in Northern New Jersey that is owned and operated by two local Realtor organizations, has withdrawn a policy that prevented some property listings from reaching Realtor.com and several other home-search Web sites.

While New Jersey MLS officials were reportedly contacted by representatives for the U.S. Federal Trade Commission -- an agency that has been investigating similar policies at more than a dozen other MLSs across the country -- MLS officials stated in a communication to members this month that the decision to rescind the rule was in response to the practices of neighboring MLSs.

National Association of Realtors general counsel Laurie Janik announced earlier this year that 14 separate government investigations had been launched over MLS policies that prevent some property listings information from being publicly displayed on some public Web sites. The Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin MLS changed its restrictions relating to the public display of some property listings in late August after an FTC investigation.

The Northern New England Real Estate Network and Austin Board of Realtors in Texas also lifted similar restrictions, and both of these groups announced agreements with the FTC in response to investigations.

In March 2005, the New Jersey MLS announced in a newsletter that "exclusive agency" property listings would no longer be sent to public home-search Web sites, including NJMLS.com and Realtor.com, as of April 1, 2005.

In exclusive agency listing agreements, home sellers are not obligated to pay their agent if they locate a buyer on their own, and sellers can actively market their own properties. The MLS did not place similar restrictions on the more common

"exclusive right to sell" property-listing agreement, which provides that a seller must pay the agent or broker who listed the property even if the seller personally located the buyer for the property.

Subscribers of the New Jersey MLS reported that they received a notice from the MLS this month stating that the exclusive agency restrictions had been lifted. According to the notice from the New Jersey MLS, "The board of directors determined at their monthly meeting that surrounding MLSs are sending exclusive agency listings to public Web sites. In the spirit of keeping our members competitive and informed, effective immediately all exclusive agency listings will be sent to the following public Web sites: Realtor.com, NJMLS.com, IDX sites."

IDX refers to Internet Data Exchange, a format for sharing online listings among brokers who are members of an MLS.

Tina Griffin, executive director for the New Jersey MLS, did not respond to Inman News' requests for comment. Tom Beritelli, president for the New Jersey MLS board of directors, and board vice president Nelson Chen also refused to comment for the article.

New Jersey MLS, which has about 8,600 members, is owned and operated by the Eastern Bergen County Board of Realtors and the RealSource Association of Realtors. Bob White, association executive for the Eastern Bergen Realtor board, said he had no comment about the MLS board's decision to change the exclusive agency restrictions.

Meanwhile, the New Jersey MLS Web site, NewJerseyMLS.com, still stated (as of Tuesday, Sept. 26) that exclusive agency listings "will not be sent to the public Internet (i.e. njmls.com public Web site, Realtor.com, member Web sites with IDX agreements)."

In 2004, Derek Eisenberg, president of Continental Real Estate Group in Hackensack, N.J., and the creator of a flat-fee real estate network, told Inman News that a similar policy change on exclusive agency listings by the Monmouth-Ocean MLS in New Jersey led him to restructure his operations. That MLS and others have maintained that the policy changes for exclusive agency listings were intended to prevent confusion when an agent and a seller were separately marketing the same property, as prospective buyers may see a property simultaneously advertised as a for-sale-by-owner property and as an agent-represented property.

Eisenberg said that he believes there is another motive for such policies -- to make exclusive agency listings less appealing to sellers. "It's a bad-spirited rule," he said of the New Jersey MLS policy, adding that it may have led some brokers to place exclusive agency property listings in other MLSs to avoid the New Jersey MLS restrictions and get the listings onto the Realtor.com site.

As a result of restrictions on exclusive agency listings, he said he faced increasing liability in some transactions that led to higher insurance costs for those transactions.

Gary Ragusa, owner of Realmart Realty, a flat-fee real estate company in South Amboy, N.J., said that he has been in contact with the FTC about MLS policies, and he believes that the FTC may have influenced the MLS's decision to reverse its policy on exclusive agency listings. "The FTC has been pretty aggressive and has been pursuing (this issue)," he said. Ragusa said the exclusive agency listings policy didn't impact his business, as he works with all of his seller clients through exclusive right to sell agreements.

He said that other MLSs in the area, too, have also changed their policies relating to exclusive agency listings.

The FTC and U.S. Department of Justice, working separately or in cooperation, have also taken action on a range of other industry policies and practices over the past couple of years -- forcing some states to withdraw bans on real estate rebates to consumers, for example, and opposing legislation in a number of states that requires all real estate licensees to perform a specific range of services for their clients, even if their clients do not want or need those services.

Last year, the Justice Department filed an antitrust lawsuit against the U.S. Department of Justice, charging that the trade group's policies for the sharing and display of online property listings information are too restrictive. The Realtor association has held that its policies are legal and provide for the sharing of a huge volume of property listings information. The Justice Department has issued subpoenas to several MLSs related to the lawsuit, the Realtor association has announced.

FTC officials have not disclosed a full list of MLSs that it has targeted in its investigations of exclusive agency listings policies, and the National Association of Realtors has also not revealed the full list of MLSs under investigation.

Steve Cook, a spokesman for the National Association of Realtors, said in a statement, "We don't speak for the boards and MLSs involved in these cases." The association is not providing any legal advice to its local boards and MLSs relating to the FTC investigations, Cook also stated.

U.S. Judge Says Lawsuit Over California Auto Emissions Can Go Forward (FINDLAW/AP)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - SACRAMENTO-Automakers can continue their lawsuit seeking to block strict vehicle emission standards adopted two years ago by California regulators, a federal judge ruled.

U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii sided preliminarily with a coalition of automakers on their three major arguments against the state law, which was passed in 2002 and adopted two years later by the state air board. In a ruling Monday,Ishii threw out two lesser arguments, but ruled the suit should go to trial Jan. 30.

The tailpipe standards adopted by the California Air Resources Board were designed to cut greenhouse gas emissions from cars and light trucks by 25 percent and from sport utility vehicles by 18 percent starting in 2009. Ten other U.S. states have since adopted the California standard.

The automobile industry sued in U.S. District Court in Fresno, California, arguing that the state law amounts to an attempt to set new fuel-economy standards, something it says can be done only by the federal government.

The judge ruled that automakers can continue with their argument that allowing states to set their own emission standards would violate two federal laws that reserve that power to the federal government. Ishii also allowed an argument by the automakers that California's regulations would undermine the federal government's ability to conduct a uniform foreign policy.

The judge prohibited automakers from arguing that the California law would impede interstate commerce or business competition.

"We're disappointed because it's going to cost taxpayers a lot of money to defend California laws. But we're prepared to do that because it's a really important law, worth fighting for," said Teresa Schilling, a spokeswoman for state Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

An attorney representing the lawsuit's main plaintiff, Central Valley Chrysler-Jeep Inc., declined comment, citing the continuing litigation.

The automakers told Ishii during a hearing this month that the higher fuel-economy standards required by the California regulations cannot be reasonably adopted in the United States and would sharply boost vehicle costs.

State lawyers argued that automakers can meet the standards by using new technology or alternate fuels.

Limiting vehicle exhaust is part of California's larger effort to reduce its emissions of gases that contribute to global warming.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has set a goal of cutting the amount of such gases to 1990 levels by 2020. On Wednesday, he is expected to sign a bill forcing factories, power plants and refineries to cut their emissions of greenhouse gases.

White House Said To Bar Hurricane Report (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Bush administration has blocked release of a report that suggests global warming is contributing to the frequency and strength of hurricanes, the journal Nature reported Tuesday.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration disputed the Nature article, saying there was not a report but a two-page fact sheet about the topic. The information was to be included in a press kit to be distributed in May as the annual hurricane season approached but wasn't ready.

"The document wasn't done in time for the rollout," NOAA spokesman Jordan St. John said in responding to the Nature article. "The White House never saw it, so they didn't block it."

The possibility that warming conditions may cause storms to become stronger has generated debate among climate and weather experts, particularly in the wake of the Hurricane Katrina disaster.

In the new case, Nature said weather experts at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration — part of the Commerce Department — in February set up a seven-member panel to prepare a consensus report on the views of agency scientists about global warming and hurricanes.

According to Nature, a draft of the statement said that warming may be having an effect.

In May, when the report was expected to be released, panel chair Ants Leetmaa received an e-mail from a Commerce official saying the report needed to be made less technical and was not to be released, Nature reported.

Leetmaa, head of NOAA's Geophysical Fluid Dynamics Laboratory in New Jersey, did not immediately respond to calls seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0070097

NOAA Administrator Conrad Lautenbacher is currently out of the country, but Nature quoted him as saying the report was merely an internal document and could not be released because the agency could not take an official position on the issue.

However, the journal said in its online report that the study was merely a discussion of the current state of hurricane science and did not contain any policy or position statements.

The report drew a prompt response from Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg, D-N.J., who charged that "the administration has effectively declared war on science and truth to advance its anti-environment agenda ... the Bush administration continues to censor scientists who have documented the current impacts of global warming."

A series of studies over the past year or so have shown an increase in the power of hurricanes in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, a strengthening that many storm experts say is tied to rising sea-surface temperatures.

Just two weeks ago, researchers said that most of the increase in ocean temperature that feeds more intense hurricanes is a result of human-induced global warming, a study one researcher said "closes the loop" between climate change and powerful storms like Katrina.

Not all agree, however, with opponents arguing that many other factors affect storms, which can increase and decrease in cycles.

The possibility of global warming affecting hurricanes is politically sensitive because the administration has resisted proposals to restrict release of gases that can cause warming conditions.

In February, a NASA political appointee who worked in the space agency's public relations department resigned after reportedly trying to restrict access to Jim Hansen, a NASA climate scientist who has been active in global warming research.

How A Tiny Law Firm Made Hay Out Of Tainted Spinach (WSJ)

By Heather Won Tesoriero And Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

Then, as word of the bacteria outbreak began to spread this month, lawyers at the firm posted messages on the firm's E. coli blog, www.ecoliblog.com1. They reached out to reporters and waited for the calls and emails to stream in. Now Marler Clark is representing 76 clients. Bill Marler, a 49-year-old partner in the firm, tracks them with Post-it Notes on a U.S. map hanging in his office.

This latest outbreak of E. coli isn't the biggest food catastrophe in recent years, in terms of the number of cases, but it is significant for its geographic reach. Extending far beyond just one restaurant or company, it has reared its head in 26 states and Canada and prompted a massive recall of fresh spinach. As of last night, it had affected 183 people and resulted in 95 hospitalizations, one death -- and five lawsuits filed by Marler Clark clients.

The Food and Drug Administration has traced the outbreak to spinach grown in three counties in California; it is advising people against eating any fresh spinach grown there, which may have been packaged elsewhere, or any spinach whose origin can't be verified. The agency says frozen and canned spinach can be safely eaten.

A tiny firm with six attorneys, a staff epidemiologist and a nurse, Marler Clark has in the past eight years established itself as the go-to place for victims of food-borne illnesses. The firm's niche practice requires it to connect quickly with new, often widely dispersed clients as an outbreak unfolds, making effective marketing paramount. The firm has pursued an aggressive brand-building campaign, including speaking engagements, media interviews and an extensive Internet presence.

A crucial part of the strategy -- and one that appears to have worked with the spinach outbreak -- is being among the first to the courthouse. People familiar with such cases say filing first is crucial to getting visibility and attracting more clients. The more people a lawyer represents, says Mr. Marler, the more leverage the lawyer has at the negotiating table with the defense.

"Bill is a good guy and a good lawyer. He's done a fantastic job of promoting himself and his firm and has done a good job for his clients," says Fred Pritzker, at rival plaintiff shop Pritzker Ruohonen & Associates, in Minneapolis. "Bill is great at putting press releases out, writing editorials and filing lawsuits early on."

Less-severe E. coli cases, with symptoms such as diarrhea, vomiting and dehydration, are usually worth between $25,000 and $500,000 when they are settled, Mr. Marler says. Those involving hemolytic uremic syndrome, or HUS, a potentially life-threatening disease that affects the kidneys and occurs in about 5% to 15% of E. coli patients, can run from $1 million to his highest HUS settlement of $15.6 million.

Marler Clark typically takes a 25% contingency fee in cases involving children, and 35% in cases involving adults. In cases he gets from other attorneys' referrals, he shares the fee.

DOJ_NMG_0070098

With the spinach outbreak, all five of the firm's suits name as a defendant Natural Selection Foods LLC; four also name Dole Food Co. The vast majority of Marler Clark's clients identified a Dole product, and a couple of clients identified Earthbound Farm, the private label for Natural Selection.

In a Sept. 15 statement, Dole encouraged consumers to dispose of certain packaged fresh spinach products as a precaution; it also said it is working with public-health agencies and expressed sympathies to those affected. Dole declined to comment further.

Natural Selection, a processor and packager of Dole spinach, initiated a recall as a precaution and said it would work with the government. It didn't return a call seeking comment.

Marler Clark's first spinach cases came to it via the Internet. Gwyn Wellborn, a 27-year-old escrow officer, was hospitalized in late August with a potentially life-threatening complication from the E. coli bacteria. Her husband, David Wellborn, went online looking for more information on the condition. Clicking around the Internet, he came across a Marler Clark Web site. "It was a really good Web site," he says. He canceled an appointment he had made with a local lawyer and phoned the firm.

Drew Falkenstein, a firm associate, took the call. Mr. Wellborn mentioned that his wife had eaten Dole spinach. Six days later, Mr. Falkenstein says, a Wisconsin attorney referred a local case involving a family whose two children had E. coli; the mother suspected it was from Dole spinach.

Two mentions of Dole spinach struck Mr. Falkenstein and Patti Waller, the firm's epidemiologist. They walked into Mr. Marler's office, and he immediately suspected an outbreak. On Sept. 13 and 14, the families called the firm with results of DNA tests, which confirmed that their E. coli bacteria were from the same strain. On Sept. 14, just before government officials announced the news of the sullied spinach, Marler Clark had filed its first case on the Wellborns' behalf.

Mr. Marler made his name in food-poisoning litigation in the early 1990s representing hundreds of plaintiffs against the Jack in the Box hamburger chain. His largest settlement was $15.6 million for a nine-year-old girl who developed acute HUS.

The firm has tried exactly one case -- against a school district in eastern Washington state, where 11 children got E. coli from cafeteria food. Marler won a $4.6 million verdict. Marler says that in 13 years, he has settled cases worth more than $250 million.

Mr. Marler says he and his partner, Bruce Clark, age 50, "know more about [food-borne illness cases] than any two lawyers on the planet." He points to a bound document running some 600 pages; it is a case workup laying out the science of the disease, a child's injuries and the estimated damages, which he will soon be sending to a manufacturer and retailer of contaminated products in a recent E. coli case. He also included a DVD of a day in the life of the child, meant to give the potential defense a picture of the injuries.

To those who call him an ambulance chaser, Mr. Marler points to industry reforms he says came about after he locked horns with companies. Jack in the Box Inc. raised its minimum burger-cooking temperatures to 155° from 140°; the company says the change was unrelated to the legal action. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention requires hospitals to report HUS cases. Odwalla, another defendant in a Marler Clark suit, began pasteurizing its juices following a 1996 E. coli outbreak.

Some lawyers question how great Marler Clark's impact has been. "Food safety was a priority long before Marler began bringing lawsuits," says David Ernst, a defense attorney at Bullivant Houser Bailey, in Portland, Ore., who has litigated against Mr. Marler in food-poisoning cases for more than 10 years. "These are not lawyer-driven reforms."

Still, Mr. Ernst and other defense lawyers say they respect Mr. Marler's expertise. Mr. Ernst says Mr. Marler takes a reasonable approach to valuing cases and tries to avoid protracted litigation. They also call him a master marketer.

Oddly enough, the first headline on Mr. Marler's blog two years ago was "E. coli food poisoning cases drop." Now, the firm has 33 blogs and Web sites covering 14 food-borne illnesses. Mr. Marler says his firm's Web sites started out as sources of information for potential clients; now other firms involved in the spinach matter are following his firm's approach, he says. "This might be the first time when other lawyers say, 'We've got to get Marler off the front page of Google.'"

In 1998, the law firm started a nonprofit called OutBreak, which consults directly with companies on ways to keep food safe. While Mr. Marler says the consulting is part of the firm's mission, critics say it is simply a way to win future plaintiffs. "You generate business by raising your profile," says Ted Frank, a tort-reform advocate with the American Enterprise Institute. "If you have a niche in the law, you're going to want to push your expertise out there."

Some marketing still gets done the old-fashioned way. Mr. Marler's wife, Julie, says she was recently approached in a parking lot by a man asking whether her husband was an attorney. How did he guess? Her lime-green Volkswagen Bug bears the license plate ECOLI.

As A Test Lab On Dirty Air, An Ohio Town Has Changed (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

STEUBENVILLE, Ohio, Sept. 23 — For three generations, people here commuted beneath the scraggly bluffs along the Ohio River to jobs where they made the steel from which 20th-century America — the cars, the skyscrapers, the cans — was built.

Then, starting in the 1970's, Steubenville residents began contributing more personal raw material to a different sort of endeavor. They provided details about their lung function and cardiac rhythms, about the manner of their lives and the cause of their deaths, to the science on which 21st-century air pollution policies are built.

Data from Steubenville have played a central role in many decisions by the Environmental Protection Agency on air pollution regulations, including two of the more controversial — one in 2005 setting the first limits on mercury emissions, and another last week to tighten one but not both of the standards for lethal fine soot particles.

Three decades ago, Steubenville's reputation for having the country's foulest air made it a magnet for researchers in the young field of environmental epidemiology.

"Steubenville is a perfect environmental laboratory," said James Slater, a chemistry professor at Franciscan University of Steubenville. Two large steel mills and two plants that turned coal into furnace-ready coke for those plants operated nearby, he said, and the Ohio River Valley is prone to temperature inversions that trap polluted air. "We have it all," Dr. Slater said.

They had it worse, a half-century ago. Much of that pollution, along with a noxious odor that seemed part burnt toast and part burnt metal, has disappeared along with the jobs at the larger steel plant, across the river in Weirton, W.Va. As the pollution receded, mortality rates declined.

This trend factored into seminal studies on the health consequences of air pollution, including an oft-cited 14-year research project on the health impact of soot concentrations in six industrial cities. Douglas Dockery, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health, led the research. Between the first period of the study, from 1974 to 1989, and an eight-year follow-up period, from 1990 to 1998, soot concentrations declined 24 percent and mortality rates dropped 19 percent.

Steubenville "provided the benchmark that we compared everything else to," Dr. Dockery said, and the study was a crucial underpinning of the first federal regulations on soot, which went into effect in 1987.

In Steubenville and the other cities, Dr. Dockery recruited older adults and first graders.

"I loved it when we got pulled out of class," said Dr. Slater's daughter Beth Atkinson, now 38 and a homemaker in Skaneateles, N.Y. She remembered her classmates filing up to the stage of the Steubenville elementary school.

"There were three different machines, three different lines," Ms. Atkinson said. "You had your own tube. They hooked it up to each machine." Then, "when you blew on it, the plastic part would go up."

As the daughter of a chemist, she said she had an idea that the people with stronger lungs could make the plastic rise higher in the tube, and she wondered about the harm caused by the pollution.

"I'd picture some 'Little House on the Prairie' place," with clear air and blue skies, she said. "I'd imagine those children blowing into the machine. I'd wonder how much they could blow. I'd wonder if our lungs would be as good as theirs."

The studies — at least three are under way right now — have been going on so long they have involved two generations. In the late 1990's, Ms. Atkinson's nephew, Wesley Myers, then about 9, lugged a small air-sniffing backpack everywhere he went for two weeks. "Every half-hour I had to write where I was, what I was doing," said Wesley, now a senior at Catholic Central High School in Steubenville. "I did it for the money" — $100 — he said.

Dr. Slater, Wesley's grandfather, is the scientist on the scene for researchers from Harvard and the University of Michigan. He tends a cluster of monitors on the Franciscan campus, harvesting the data.

He takes visiting scientists to the Hunan restaurant in the old downtown, where Alice Wong, the proprietor, remembers the visitors' tastes, if not their names. "The Harvard people, they liked vegetable fried rice," she said.

Other residents, who remember when the air was dirtier and the streets and their bank accounts were fuller, speak of the scientists and their science less fondly, linking them to the town's decline. From 1980 to 2000, census figures show, the Steubenville-Weirton population dropped faster than that of any urban area in the nation.

Franciscan University's executive vice president, Bob Philby, recalled that when the subject of pollution came up among steel mill workers in the 1970's, "They would say: Don't go there. That's pay dirt." Since then, 9 of 10 steel jobs have vanished.

Jim DiGregory, whose family owns a garden center, was born in Steubenville in 1926, nine years after the entertainer Dean Martin. Mr. DiGregory and his wife, Loretta, were part of the original Harvard study.

Decades ago, the air "didn't smell too good," Mr. DiGregory said. "Maybe people died from it. But who knew what they died from then? They'd say, 'He died of old age.' They'd say it if he was 60 years old."

His wife died in 1988 from a rare heart ailment, becoming part of the studies' mortality statistics. He still fills out postcards the researchers send to see if he is still alive. Is the air cleaner? "Yes." Is it worth the trade-offs? "I don't think so."

DOJ_NMG_0070100

The town of 19,000 has half the population it did 60 years ago, and the outlook of many residents has changed. “Certainly 30 years ago, that was a prevailing sense here in the valley that if there’s dirt on the air there’s food on the table,’’ said Adam Scurti, 61, a lawyer. “Now, that would not be tolerated.”

Cali Drug Chiefs Given 30-year Prison Terms (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The surviving leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which federal law enforcement agencies say once supplied up to 80% of the cocaine in the USA, pleaded guilty Tuesday to trafficking charges as the government took steps to seize an estimated $2.1 billion in cartel assets.

As part of the plea agreement, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, brothers Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela were sentenced to 30 years in prison, effectively ending a 20-year period in which they were key players in Colombia's violent drug trade.

While Miguel, 62, and Gilberto, 67, were sentenced in Miami, 28 other family members reached a separate pact with the government to surrender their worldwide assets, which court papers say include luxury homes, boats, investment accounts and businesses obtained with drug money.

Although the assets represent the largest drug-related forfeiture in U.S. history, there are no firm estimates of how much the brothers accumulated during their reign of the cartel. None of the relatives was named in the criminal charges.

“It doesn't get any bigger than today,” said Drug Enforcement Administrator Karen Tandy. She said the guilty pleas represented the “last nail in the coffin of the Cali cartel.”

Tandy said the brothers “defined the word ‘kingpins' ” with their ruthless oversight of a drug empire. Carolina Barco, Colombia's ambassador to the United States, said the cartel wars claimed hundreds of lives — including those of prosecutors, police and judges — in the South American nation.

Barco, reading a statement from Colombia's attorney general, described the cartel's reign as “one of the most painful chapters in our history.”

Since the demise of the Cali group in recent years, there have been signs that the cocaine supply on U.S. streets has declined, said John Walters, director of the White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy. However, he said, smaller groups have taken over many drug-running operations.

Gonzales said the brothers imported more than 200 tons of cocaine into the USA over 20 years. He said the family's assets would go to the countries where they are seized, primarily Colombia.

With Guilty Pleas, Cali Cartel Finished, U.S. Says (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Two brothers who headed Colombia's powerful Cali cocaine cartel pleaded guilty yesterday to drug trafficking charges in Miami and agreed to turn over billions in assets.

As part of a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, Gilberto RodrÃ-guez Orejuela, 67, and Miguel RodrÃ-guez Orejuela, 62, were each sentenced to 30 years in prison and agreed to forfeit $2.1 billion worth of assets linked to the drug trade, officials said. The pair also agreed to plead guilty later to separate money-laundering charges filed against them in New York.

In exchange, half a dozen of the brothers' relatives will not face prosecution. In addition, U.S. officials said, 28 people with ties to the pair will have a chance to be removed from a Treasury Department list that freezes the assets of "specially designated narcotics traffickers" if they relinquish property tainted by drug money, officials said.

Government officials said the agreements bring an end to the Cali cartel, which by the early 1990s had eclipsed its archrival, the MedellÃ-n cartel, as the world's leading cocaine-distribution ring. The family was once estimated to be responsible for up to 80 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States, and it invested its proceeds in scores of legitimate businesses in Colombia and worldwide.

"The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signal the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said at a Washington news conference. "There are always other traffickers and thus continuing challenges for law enforcement, but this is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement."

But drug trafficking experts and U.S. law enforcement officials say the cartel's defeat began at least a decade ago -- after the RodrÃ-guez brothers were imprisoned in Colombia -- and the group has been little more than a shadow of its former self in recent years. The Colombian cocaine trade is now controlled by a more fractured constellation of criminal organizations that work with, and sometimes for, the Mexican cartels that control smuggling operations into the United States, experts say.

"We're moving into a whole new phase of the drug war, because they are decentralizing, smaller and harder to catch than their predecessors," said Ron Chepesiuk, who wrote "Drug Lords: The Rise and Fall of the Cali Cartel."

Gilberto RodrÃ-guez was known as "the Chess Player" for his role in planning the cartel's strategy, while his younger brother was dubbed "the Master" for inventing new ways to hide drugs. Techniques by the Cali cartel included smuggling cocaine in shipments of coffee, frozen vegetables, concrete posts, and ceramic tiles and lumber, among other things, usually using Mexico as a transit point.

Gonzales -- joined in Washington by U.S. law enforcement officials and the Colombian ambassador -- said the RodrÃ-guez brothers "were responsible for the importation of over 200,000 kilograms of cocaine" to the United States from 1990 to 2002, including years when they ran the organization from a Colombian prison.

Miguel RodrÃ-guez's son, William, was sentenced to more than 21 years in prison earlier this year in Miami for his role in helping to run the cartel while his father and uncle were behind bars.

Chepesiuk noted that the assets to be turned over by the RodrÃ-guez brothers amount to a small fraction of the money that was earned by the Cali cartel, which in its heyday was estimated to bring in $5 billion to $7 billion a year. The family's investments included a credit card company, a pharmaceutical firm and a chain of 350 drugstores.

Colombian Drug Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty In Miami (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

Sept. 26 (Bloomberg) -- The former leaders of Colombia's Cali cocaine cartel pleaded guilty to drug charges in Miami and agreed to forfeit $2.1 billion in assets.

Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, who are brothers, were sentenced to 30 years in prison on their guilty pleas to one count each of conspiring to import cocaine into the U.S., the Justice Department said. The men, 62 and 67 years old, also agreed to plead guilty later to a New York charge of conspiring to commit money laundering, the government said.

The two men were responsible for importing more than 200 tons of cocaine into the U.S., Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a news conference in Washington.

``The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signals the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel," Gonzales said.

AP, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON Two Colombians who headed the Cali cartel pleaded guilty Tuesday to drug trafficking and money laundering in a complex deal that U.S. officials said marked the end of the gang that once terrorized Colombia and dominated cocaine smuggling into the United States.

As part of their plea deal — reached after months of negotiations with U.S. agencies — Gilberto Orejuela, 67, and his brother Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 63, agreed to forfeit billions of dollars in assets linked to their drug trade.

Wearing pinstriped business suits and shackled at the ankles, each was sentenced to 30 years in a U.S. prison during the pleading in a Miami courtroom.

"The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signals the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a Washington news conference. "This is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement."

A separate deal described in court will protect six of the brothers' relatives in Colombia from prosecution on obstruction of justice and money laundering charges. That agreement also could permit 28 people with ties to the brothers to keep property and other assets not tainted by drug money.

As described by Gonzales and Adam J. Szubin, director of the Foreign Assets Control office at the Treasury Department, the 28 people will be required to turn over any assets — such as houses, bank accounts, and businesses — acquired with drug trafficking. Once those assets are surrendered, the Arejuela family members could eventually be removed from a U.S. list freezing their assets and blocking them from doing business with U.S. entities.

U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno accepted the guilty pleas and approved the sentencing agreement between prosecutors and defense lawyers.

The brothers agreed to forfeit to the United States $2.1 billion (€1.65 billion) in assets linked to drug trafficking, but the two clearly made many times that amount during the cartel's heyday in the 1990s. Gonzales and the eight other U.S. and Colombian officials at the news conference were unable to estimate how many illegal billions of dollars the cartel made during the more than 20 years the two brothers ran it.

The forfeited assets were detailed in an 11-page list and included properties and businesses around the world. But neither brother is being required to cooperate in any ongoing or future criminal investigations, according to the plea agreement.

White House drug czar John Walters told the news conference that the cartel had operated by terrorizing Colombian society and killing prosecutors, judges and political candidates and was responsible for "the torture and murder of more than 100 people" whose bodies were dumped in a Colombian river to keep others downstream in fear of the gang.

Assistant Homeland Security Secretary Julie L. Myers said the pair would be "the highest-level drug figures to ever occupy a U.S. jail cell." The only other contender for that honor might be Carlos Lehder, who helped found an earlier Colombian drug gang, the Medellin cartel. He was sentenced to 55 years in federal prison in a 1992 plea bargain.

"Are you sure?" Moreno asked Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela when he entered his plea.

"Very sure," he replied.

The Cali cartel became the world's leading cocaine smuggling ring after eclipsing the rival Medellin cartel, which fell apart when several top members were arrested and Medellin top kingpin Pablo Escobar was killed in a 1993 shootout with Colombian police.

The Cali cartel was once responsible for as much as 80 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States. It was known for its ingenious smuggling methods, hiding cocaine in such things as hollowed-out lumber and cylinders of chlorine, even shipments of frozen broccoli and okra.

Miguel became known as "The Master" for his inventiveness in finding new ways to hide drugs, while Gilberto's nickname was "The Chess Player" for his role as the cartel's strategic thinker. Their family invested in dozens of legitimate businesses around the world, including the Colombian discount drug store chain Drogas La Rebaja.

William Rodriguez Abadia, Miguel's son and Gilberto's nephew, agreed to forfeit about $300 million (€236.3 million) in worldwide assets after pleading guilty in March to U.S. charges and agreeing to testify against his father and uncle.

The Rodriguez Orejuela brothers were convicted in Colombia of drug charges in 1995, but were indicted in 2003 in Miami on charges that they continued to run their cocaine empire from behind bars. Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela was extradited in late 2004 and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela in early 2005, the highest-ranking of more than 300 drug traffickers extradited since the U.S. and Colombia signed a new treaty in 1997.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and others have investigated the Cali cartel since 1991, resulting in more than 100 convictions, the seizure of more than 50 tons of cocaine and $15 million in cash.

All told, the Cali cartel is estimated to have smuggled more than 250 tons of cocaine into the United States since the 1970s. A recent DEA analysis said that several Colombian organizations now control that country's cocaine trade, increasingly in concert with Mexican organizations that distribute the drug in the United States.

Two Brothers Who Ran Cartel Plead Guilty (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

MIAMI — In what the government called "the final, fatal blow" to the world's biggest cocaine supplier, two Colombian brothers who helped found the infamous Cali cartel pleaded guilty Tuesday to drug trafficking, agreed to forfeit billions in tainted assets, and received what could amount to a life sentence.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, ages 67 and 63, were each sentenced to 30 years in prison. They were the highest-ranking of more than 300 drug traffickers extradited to this country since the United States and Colombia signed a new treaty in 1997.

The brothers also struck a deal with prosecutors to protect six of their relatives in Colombia from prosecution on obstruction and money laundering charges. Twenty-eight family members will be permitted to keep some assets not tainted by drug money and could be removed from a Treasury Department list that has kept their property and bank accounts frozen since 1995.

"They sacrificed themselves for their family," said David O. Markus, attorney for Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela.

The Cali cartel, once responsible for as much as 80 percent of the cocaine brought into the United States, was known for its ingenious smuggling methods: hiding the drug in such things as hollowed-out lumber, cylinders of chlorine, even shipments of frozen broccoli and okra.

The brothers' pleas "effectively signal the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in Washington. "This is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement."

Miguel was known as "The Master" for his inventiveness in finding ways to hide drugs. Gilberto's nickname was "The Chess Player" for his role as the cartel's strategic thinker. Their family invested in dozens of legitimate businesses around the world, including a Colombian discount drugstore chain with more than 400 stores.

In court, Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela issued an apology "to the people of the United States and to all individuals in authority. I am doing this from the bottom of my heart."

The brothers agreed to forfeit to the United States $2.1 billion in assets linked to drug trafficking, but the two probably made many times that amount during the cartel's heyday in the 1990s. Neither brother is required to cooperate in any current or future criminal investigations, according to the plea agreement.

The Miami attorney for the family members, Marc Seitles, said the deal would allow the relatives to escape the cartel's shadow. "They are going to get the benefit of a new day, of starting a new life," Seitles said.

Colombia's chief prosecutor, Mario Iguaran, praised the agreement in a statement, saying it "concludes one the most painful chapters of our recent history" which resulted in the death of numerous government officials, innocent citizens and the undermining of Colombia's crime-fighting institutions.

The Cali cartel became the world's leading cocaine smuggling ring after eclipsing the rival Medellin cartel, which fell apart when several top members were arrested and its kingpin Pablo Escobar was killed in a 1993 shootout with Colombian police.

The brothers were convicted in Colombia of drug charges in 1995 but were indicted in 2003 in Miami on charges they continued to run their cocaine empire from behind bars. Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela was extradited in 2004 and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela in 2005.

In March, William Rodriguez Abadia, Miguel's son, agreed to forfeit about $300 million in worldwide assets after pleading guilty to U.S. charges and agreeing to testify against his father and uncle.

The Cali cartel is estimated to have smuggled more than 250 tons of cocaine into the United States since the 1970s.

Colombia continues to provide some 80 percent of the world's cocaine. Despite record eradication and extradition numbers, the supply continues to be robust, and the traffickers are said to include right-wing paramilitary chiefs and leftist rebels.

Colombian Drug Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty (NYT)

By Maria Newman

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

Two leaders of the Colombian drug trade were sentenced to 30 years in prison today after they pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to import cocaine into the United States. Federal officials heralded their imprisonment as the end of the notorious Cali drug cartel.

At a hearing in a federal court in Miami, the brothers Miguel and Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela, who prosecutors said directed the Cali drug cartel in Colombia for more than 20 years, also agreed to plead guilty to a charge of conspiracy to commit money laundering by hiding the proceeds of narcotics trafficking.

Federal prosecutors believe these sentences to be so significant that they were announced in Washington by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other top-level federal and state officials.

“These two men were responsible for importing more than 200 tons of cocaine into this country over the course of many years,” Mr. Gonzales said. “While at the height of their power, the intimidation and violence of their cartel held the people of the Colombian countryside hostage to fear.”

Mr. Gonzales said the two brothers also agreed to pay $2.1 billion in forfeiture.

“The brothers’ guilty plea effectively signaled the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel,” Mr. Gonzales said. “There are always other traffickers and thus continuing challenges for law enforcement, but this is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement.”

In a separate deal, prosecutors agreed not to bring obstruction of justice and money laundering charges against six children of the two brothers, in return for they and 22 other members of the Rodríguez Orejuela family agreeing to forfeit all of their assets anywhere in the world “that were obtained directly or indirectly with narcotics proceeds.” They will also give up all assets in the United States, no matter how they were acquired.

“None of the 28 family members are involved with narcotics trafficking,’’ said Alexander Acosta, the United States attorney for the Southern District of Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0070104

At a hearing this morning, the brothers apologized for their actions.

"I am willingly submitting myself to American justice," Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela, 67, said at the hearing, according to The Miami Herald.

"It is an honor to be before this court," said his brother, who, like Gilberto Rodríguez, was dressed in a dark business suit and was shackled at the ankles. "I want to apologize to my family and ask for forgiveness for any suffering I may have caused them."

Mr. Gonzales said the prosecution of the two came about only with the cooperation of the government of President Álvaro Uribe Vélez of Colombia, who agreed to extradite the two. Carolina Barco, Colombia's ambassador to the United States, was at the news conference today.

"Together we have proven that Colombia will not be held hostage by drug lords, and that those who seek to flood the neighborhoods of the United States with the poison of illegal drugs will be held accountable, they will be discovered and they will be brought to justice," Mr. Gonzales said.

John Walters, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, who was also at the news conference, praised President Uribe for his "courage" in helping to bring down the two formidable drug kingpins.

"People in the past talked about the Cali cartel as the peaceful cartel, but their reign of terror and blood, their war with Pablo Escobar in the early 90's, still haunts the collective memory of many in Colombia and many in this country that worked against them," he said. "The Cali cartel was one of the most powerful criminal organizations ever, seeking to buy or kill anybody that got in their way."

Officials said at the news conference that there has been a significant drop in the amount of cocaine produced in the Andes region of South America, including Colombia. But they acknowledged that even with the Cali cartel out of the way, hundreds of other smaller cartels, some of them left-wing groups, have filled the vaccuum.

Julie Myers, an assistant secretary of homeland security, said that the Cali cartel's methods evolved, in the 15 years they were under investigation by American authorities, to avoid detection. In the same way, she said, investigators know that the current drug dealers are finding new ways to smuggle their trade, like hiding illicit drugs "in frozen broccoli, put it in ceramic tiles, operating from jail cells.''

"But law enforcement continued, and that's what we'll do for smaller cartels or for big cartels is, we'll work together as a group to dismantle these,'' she said.

Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, September 27, 2006

The Colombian kingpins who revolutionized the global cocaine trade appeared as mere mortals in Miami federal court on Tuesday in pleading guilty to smuggling-conspiracy charges and apologizing for their life of crime.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodríguez Orejuela stood in dark businesses suits before U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno as he sentenced the Cali cartel founders to 30 years in prison and ordered them to forfeit $2.1 billion in assets from their once-powerful empire.

"I am willingly submitting myself to American justice," Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela, 67, who was shackled at the ankles, told the judge.

Said Miguel Rodríguez Orejuela, 63, who was also cuffed: ``I want to apologize to my family and ask for forgiveness for any suffering I may have caused them. . . . I'm doing this fully convinced it will bring something better."

So significant was the case of the Colombian brothers -- responsible for 80 percent of the cocaine sold in the United States in the 1990s -- that U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and South Florida's U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta took the rare opportunity to hold a news conference in Washington on Tuesday afternoon.

`FATAL BLOW'

'The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signal the final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali Cartel," Gonzales said. ``There are always other traffickers and thus continuing challenges for law enforcement, but this is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement."

Indeed, last March, Gonzales publicized a crackdown on another Colombian narco-network that controls a big chunk of the cocaine trade from South America through Mexico to the United States. He announced the indictment of the entire top leadership and dozens of other commanders of Colombia's FARC guerrillas on charges of running a $25 billion drug operation responsible for 60 percent of the cocaine on U.S. streets.

On Tuesday, the Rodríguez Orejuela brothers pleaded guilty to conspiring to smuggle tons of cocaine into the United States. The brothers also agreed to plead guilty to a separate indictment filed in New York that charged them with conspiring to launder their drug profits.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Matt Axelrod estimated that the figure was "over 200,000 kilograms" -- imported to South Florida and other parts of the country from 1990 to July 2002. The brothers packed the white powder in concrete posts, frozen vegetables, coffee and ceramic tile, among other creative ways.

The brothers faced up to 30 years in prison because they conspired to import more than 150 kilos of cocaine -- even after they were arrested by Colombian authorities in 1995 and were incarcerated in Bogotá until their extraditions to Miami in 2004-05.

The judge, known for his wit, drew laughs from the packed courtroom when he responded to Axelrod's smuggling estimate: ``I think that would probably meet the threshold."

RELATIVES SPARED

Their plea deal came with some benefits: The brothers don't have to worry about the fate of other family members who allegedly were linked to their narcotics enterprise.

As part of their plea deal, 28 family members -- including sons, daughters and cousins -- signed a separate agreement that removes them from a U.S. Treasury Department list that designated them as part of the Cali operation, according to their attorney, Marc Seitles. Of those, six family members won't be prosecuted on drug-related charges of obstruction of justice or money laundering.

The agreement allows the brothers' family members to keep some of their wealth that was untainted by drug profits, such as real estate in Spain. "The best chess players understand that every now and then you must sacrifice some important pieces for the safety and security of the entire board," said Miami lawyer David O. Markus, who represented Gilberto Rodríguez Orejuela, while attorney Roy Kahn represented the brother Miguel.

The brothers' syndicate reached its zenith in the early 1990s, when they allegedly exported more than 4,000 kilos of cocaine per month to the United States. Despite their incarceration, prosecutors said Miguel Rodríguez Orejuela's son, William Rodríguez Abadia, a Colombian-trained lawyer, continued the family narcotics business through 2000. The son, who pleaded guilty in March, agreed to testify against his father and uncle at a trial scheduled for November.

Their prosecution capped an investigation that began almost two decades ago by Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent Ed Kacerosky and assistant U.S. Attorney Ed Ryan. Upwards of 100 Cali cartel members were convicted as part of Operation Cornerstone in the United States and Colombia.

Founders Of Cali Cartel Plead Guilty (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, September 26, 2006

The Colombian brothers believed to have founded the Cali cartel pleaded guilty to drug trafficking Tuesday in Miami and were sentenced to 30 years in prison.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodr?guez Orejuela apologized to their families and to the people of the United States for their activities, the Miami Herald reported.

"It is an honor to be before this court," said Miguel Rodr?guez Orejuela. "I want to apologize to my family and ask for forgiveness for any suffering I may have caused them. ... I'm doing this fully convinced it will bring something better."

Both brothers are in their 60s and the sentences mean they are likely to die in federal prison. Under the plea agreement, the government agreed not to prosecute six other members of their family and allowed them to keep some assets not related to drug trafficking, including real estate in Spain, the Herald said.

In the mid 1990s, the Cali cartel is believed to have smuggled several tons of cocaine a month into the United States.

Cali Cartel Drug Kingpins Plead GuiltyColombian Brothers Get 30 Years, Also Agree To Forfeit $2.1B In Assets (CBS/AP)

CBS News/AP, September 26, 2006

(CBS/AP) Two Colombian brothers pleaded guilty Tuesday to U.S. drug trafficking and money laundering charges stemming from their roles as founders of the Cali cocaine cartel, and agreed to forfeit billions of dollars of assets linked to their drug trade.

The pleas cap a 15-year effort to dismantle the Cali cartel, reports CBS News' Stephanie Lambidakis. It started as a Customs' investigation in 1991 when a drug dog sniffed cocaine at the Miami seaport. The drugs were found in concrete posts.

Gilberto, 67, and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 63, made their pleas in an agreement reached after months of negotiations with several U.S. agencies. The two brothers who once ran the world's top cocaine supplier could now spend the rest of their lives in prison; each received a 30-year sentence.

One person describes Cali as the Wal-Mart of the drug world in terms of sheer volume and dominance of the market, says Lambidakis. It's estimated the Orejuelas controlled 80 percent of the cocaine market in the 1990s largely because of the corporate mentality of the two brothers and the ingenious ways in which they hid drugs, such as in frozen broccoli. The Drug Enforcement Administration believes the successor organizations are fractured and will never have the clout of Cali.

Miguel became known as "The Master" for his inventiveness in finding new ways to hide drugs, while Gilberto's nickname was "The Chess Player" for his role as the cartel's strategic thinker. Their family invested in dozens of legitimate businesses around the world, including the Colombian discount drug store chain Drogas La Rebaja.

A separate deal described in court will protect six of the brothers' relatives in Colombia from prosecution on obstruction of justice and money laundering charges. That agreement also could permit 28 people with ties to the brothers to keep property and other assets not tainted by drug money. The 28 could eventually be removed from a U.S. list freezing their assets and blocking them from doing business with U.S. entities.

U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno accepted the guilty pleas and approved the sentencing agreement between prosecutors and defense lawyers.

The brothers agreed to forfeit to the United States $2.1 billion in assets linked to drug trafficking, but the two probably made many times that amount during the cartel's heyday in the 1990s. The forfeited assets were detailed in an 11-page list of items and included properties and businesses around the world.

But neither brother is being required to cooperate in any ongoing or future criminal investigations, according to the plea agreement.

"Are you sure?" Moreno asked Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela as he entered his plea.

"Very sure," he replied, appearing with his brother wearing pinstriped business suits instead of the usual tan prison garb. They were shackled at the ankles.

The Cali cartel became the world's leading cocaine smuggling ring after eclipsing the rival Medellin cartel, which fell apart when several top members were arrested and Medellin top kingpin Pablo Escobar was killed in a 1993 shootout with Colombian police.

The Cali cartel avoided that violence and tried to look like legitimate business people. It showered their largess in Colombia by building soccer stadiums and did other "good works."

According to Immigrations and Customs Enforcement, while in prison in Colombia, the Orejuelas kept running the enterprise. The extraditions really seemed to help the U.S. government turn the corner on ending the Cali cartel.

William Rodriguez Abadia, Miguel's son and Gilberto's nephew, agreed to forfeit about $300 million in worldwide assets after pleading guilty in March to U.S. charges and agreeing to testify against his father and uncle.

The Rodriguez Orejuela brothers were convicted in Colombia of drug charges in 1995, but were indicted in 2003 in Miami on charges that they continued to run their cocaine empire from behind bars. Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela was extradited in late 2004 and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela in early 2005, the highest-ranking of more than 300 drug traffickers extradited since the U.S. and Colombia signed a new treaty in 1997.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and others have investigated the Cali cartel since 1991, resulting in more than 100 convictions, the seizure of more than 50 tons of cocaine and $15 million in cash.

All told, the Cali cartel is estimated to have smuggled more than 250 tons of cocaine into the United States since the 1970s. A recent DEA analysis said that several Colombian organizations now control that country's cocaine trade, increasingly in concert with Mexican organizations that distribute the drug in the United States.

Colombian Drug Lords Jailed In US (BBC)

BBC News, September 27, 2006

The brothers were once among the world's most powerful criminals Two brothers who led Colombia's infamous Cali drug cartel have each been sentenced to 30 years in US jails.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela pleaded guilty in a federal court in Miami to conspiring to import 200,000kg (441,000lb) of cocaine into the US.

The sentencing came after the pair reached a plea agreement to forfeit $2.1bn (£1.1bn) while charges against some of their relatives were dropped.

The US attorney general said the deal was the cartel's final, fatal blow.

"This is a day of pride for the people of Colombia and for international law enforcement," Alberto Gonzales said.

Empire run from jail

The brothers founded the cartel and were once considered among the world's most powerful criminals.

DOJ_NMG_0070107

The BBC's Jeremy Mc Dermott in Bogota says they were always family-orientated and that, in the end, was the reason for their guilty plea.

They struck a deal with prosecutors to protect six relatives from money-laundering and obstruction charges. Twenty-eight family members will be allowed to hold onto some assets not tainted by drugs.

"The brothers are happy that their families are taken care of," said Roy Kahn, a lawyer for the family.

"And to them, whether it's 30, 20 or 15 years - to them it's going to be a lifetime in jail. But they're willing to do that for their family's future and their family's welfare."

Clever traffickers

The Cali cartel was once responsible for up to 80% of the cocaine smuggled into the US, and was known for its ingenious smuggling methods that hid cocaine in hollowed-out timber, cylinders of chlorine, and even shipments of frozen broccoli and okra.

Miguel, 63, was extradited to the US in March, three months after his brother Gilberto, 67, was flown to Miami. Both initially pleaded not guilty.

The brothers were accused of organising drug-trafficking and money-laundering from the Colombian prison in which they had been held since 1995.

In March, William Rodriguez Abadia, Gilberto's son, was sentenced to more than 20 years in prison by a judge in Miami, after he agreed to co-operate against his father and his uncle.

Abadia, a lawyer, is alleged to have led the cartel after the pair were arrested in 1995.

Judge Sentences Founders Of Cali Cartel To 30 Years (MCT)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-Sentinel

McClatchy Newspapers, September 27, 2006

MIAMI - Wearing business suits and ankle cuffs, the two brothers who once ran the world's largest drug trafficking organization said the words Tuesday U.S. prosecutors had waited more than a decade to hear.

The aging drug kingpins pleaded guilty in Miami federal court to smuggling more than 200 tons of cocaine into the United States. They agreed to turn over companies, bank accounts and other assets connected to the drug trade worth more than $2 billion.

Now, Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela, who turned cocaine running into a sophisticated, multibillion-dollar business as leaders of the notorious Cali Cartel, will spend 30 years in prison.

To reach the plea agreement - which closes the book on the last of Colombia's mega-cocaine trafficking organizations - government lawyers entered an unusual deal to protect 28 family members in Colombia from being permanently labeled as drug traffickers.

In exchange, Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela admitted to smuggling massive amounts of cocaine into U.S. ports throughout the 1990s, including shipments hidden inside concrete posts, frozen vegetables, coffee, ceramic tiles, chlorine gas tanks and crates of pumpkins.

They also agreed to plead guilty to money laundering charges in a criminal case pending in New York.

"I have admitted all the charges, and I will submit myself to American justice," said Gilberto Rodriguez-Orejuela, 67, known as "the Chess Player".

Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela, 63 - known as "El Senor" - apologized to his family, the people of the United States and to U.S. law enforcement.

"I'm doing this fully convinced this is to bring something better," he said.

After the proceeding, federal law enforcement officials declared victory over the Cali organization.

"The brothers' guilty pleas effectively signal the final fatal blow to the powerful Cali Cartel," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in Washington, D.C.

Drug policy experts say any victory for law enforcement is largely symbolic.

The demise of the cartel did little to reduce the flow of cocaine into the United States, said Adam Isacson, head of the Colombia project at the Center of International Policy in Washington, D.C. Instead, it cleared the path for a new generation of mini-cartels, more fragmented and often more dangerous than their predecessors, he said.

"Instead of Al Capone, you've got a bunch of little guys," Isacson said. "They stay local. They keep their heads down. It's much harder to pin down."

The Rodriguez-Orejuela brothers created the Cali Cartel in the 1980s with a third man named Jose Santacruz Londono. After a bloody war with the Medellin Cartel run by Pablo Escobar, the group took control of the cocaine trade in the early 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0070108

The organization ran every step of the drug trafficking business, including production, transportation, distribution and money laundering.

Unlike the flashy Escobar, who was gunned down in 1993, the Cali leaders operated their crime syndicate like businessmen. They cloaked themselves in respectability by funneling millions of dollars in drug proceeds through a worldwide network of legitimate companies, including major retail pharmacy and pharmaceutical laboratory chains in Colombia.

The cartel allegedly bought security with payments to Colombian politicians, including a donation of nearly $6 million to the campaign of former President Ernesto Samper.

Samper turned on the cartel under increasing pressure from the U.S. government. In 1995, Colombian authorities arrested Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela in Cali. Both were serving sentences in a Bogota prison when a 2003 federal grand jury in Miami indicted them.

The U.S. indictment alleged conspiracies to import and distribute cocaine, launder money and obstruct justice through bribes and murder. According to prosecutors, Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela continued to run the family business from prison, turning over day-to-day operations to Miguel's eldest son, William Rodriguez-Abadia.

In March, Rodriguez-Abadia, 40, pleaded guilty and agreed to testify for the government against his father and uncle.

Miami attorneys Roy Kahn and David O. Markus, who represent the brothers, argued that under the terms of their extradition they could not be prosecuted for criminal activity prior to Dec. 17, 1997 - the date the Colombian constitution was amended to permit foreign extraditions.

Tuesday's plea deal ended that debate. U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno made it clear he was imposing 30-year sentences on the men for their illegal activities after 1997.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Axelrod said his office would recommend the men serve their sentences in a Florida medium-security prison.

As part of their contract with the 28 family members, prosecutors agreed not to charge six of the men's grown children in Colombia with obstruction of justice and money laundering for past conduct.

The agreement also permits those family members to retain modest assets. If they refrain from illegal conduct, the U.S. Treasury Department would remove the 28 relatives from a list of suspected drug traffickers subject to economic sanctions. Illegal activity would invalidate the deal.

Marc Seitles, who represented the relatives, praised the deal.

"Their only crime is being sons and daughters of the founders of the Cali Cartel," he said.

The U.S. investigation into Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela began in 1991 with the detection of 12,000 kilograms of cocaine at the Port of Miami. The discovery spawned a massive investigation known as Operation Cornerstone that would lead to the convictions of more than 100 people.

The investigation drove Colombian drug traffickers to change their operations and find new smuggling routes.

Today, cocaine shipments are generally smaller and come into the United States across the southwest border with Mexico, instead of into South Florida ports, said John McKenna, a special agent with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

"When the Cali Cartel was operating you might see shipments of 2,500 kilograms at a time," McKenna said. "You don't see that anymore."

Despite Cali Cartel Plea Deal, Challenges Remain In Colombian Drug War (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, September 26, 2006

Although U.S. and Colombian officials claimed a final victory over the Cali cartel following the guilty plea by its two founding members, significant challenges remain in the drug war and the Colombian government's efforts against the FARC narco-terrorist rebel group.

At a news conference, the Colombian ambassador to the United States, Carolina Barco, said, "For Colombia, the drug problem has been its major challenge, and we have been fighting this since the 1980s, with great conviction and at great cost."

According to the DEA, the FARC rebels (Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia) control large parts of the coca production areas in Colombia and are responsible for supplying more than 50 percent of the world's cocaine and more than 60 percent of the cocaine that enters the United States. They have provided it to many Mexican trafficking organizations and according to some U.S. officials, have recently begun to shift their trafficking networks into Venezuela.

FARC guerrillas use the proceeds to purchase weapons and munitions for their war against the Colombian government. The insurgent group has been active in the country since the 1940s, but fighting intensified in the late 1990s when the FARC gained more territory and had several key victories over the national military.

Barco described the struggle that has gripped the country for years and the consequences of the drug trade, saying, "As a Colombian, I think we all need to continue to speak out to what drug trafficking means to any country, because it is that terrible combination of incredible amounts of money, which breed corruption, and incredible amounts of violence."

'Top Extradition Partner'

Despite increased eradication flights, which U.S. and Colombian officials say are having an effect, coca production in Colombia and other Andean nations remains high. However, cultivation levels have dropped drastically since the mid to late 1990s.

A report by the United Nations Office of Drugs and Crime found that coca production in Colombia increased by 8 percent over last year.

Pakistani Gets 18 Years In Missile Scheme (LAT)

From Times Staff Reports

The Los Angeles Times, September 26, 2006

A Pakistani man was sentenced Monday to an 18-year federal prison term for his role in an international drugs-for-weapons scheme foiled by undercover U.S. agents.

Syed Mustajab Shah, 55, admitted conspiring with two co-defendants to trade 5 tons of hashish and 600 kilograms of heroin for four Stinger antiaircraft missiles, which they intended to sell to the Taliban. He was arrested in Hong Kong in 2002 after a meeting with agents posing as drug dealers.

San Antonio Express-News, September 26, 2006

Mexico City -- To send a chilling message to their underworld rivals, Mexican drug cartels are adopting a method of intimidation made notorious by Middle Eastern terrorist groups.

Already this year, at least 26 people have been decapitated in Mexico, with heads stuck on fences, dumped in trash piles and -- most recently -- tossed onto a nightclub dance floor.

Although beheading goes back centuries as a form of execution, it has become the latest tactical escalation of a turf war that gets nastier all the time, with hit men looking for new ways to instill fear.

"Before, they tortured the hell out of people, but they didn't throw their heads out in public," said James Kuykendall, a retired U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

Why this form of murder and mutilation is being used now is anyone's guess.

Beheadings have had a high international profile in recent years, as the tool of radical Islamist groups that release videos of hostages being executed.

In Mexico, as crime bosses fall and turf shifts, the pattern of killing is changing.

The infamous Gulf and Sinaloa cartels and their smaller offshoots are fighting for control of smuggling routes from the southern border with Guatemala to the northern border with the United States.

"It is clearly a message for the living. What they are trying do with these beheadings is leave an impression on their enemies," said Jorge Chabat, a Mexico City analyst who studies drug trafficking. "This is a sign the war is spreading and it is getting more horrible."

Police, wise guys and lawyers are among the dead, but most of the victims remain unidentified. Some were blindfolded or showed signs of torture.

The boldest strike came this month when five heads were scattered on the dance floor of a bar in the state of Michoacan -- a region west of Mexico City notorious for drug trafficking.

"The family does not kill for pay, does not kill women and does not kill innocents," read a handwritten sign left beside the heads. "The only ones who die deserve to die, and all the people know that this is divine justice."

Saying the attacks were too delicate a topic, Mexican police and federal prosecutors refused to discuss the beheadings in more than the most general terms.

They point to the Zetas -- a group of highly trained Mexican army deserters -- and the Maras -- Central American gangsters known for their brutality and extravagant facial tattoos -- who work for the cartels as hit men.

No arrests for the killings have been announced. Beheadings reportedly have occurred in the states of Guerrero, Michoacan, Baja California and Nuevo Leon.

The crimes are every bit as chilling a calling card as the old "Colombian necktie," used by cartels in that country, which involved slicing a person's throat and pulling the tongue through the wound.

DOJ_NMG_0070110

Mexico's first narco-decapitation came in April in Acapulco. The heads of two police officers were stuck in plastic bags and mounted on a fence that surrounds government offices.

The cartels are saying there is now a higher price to pay than the traditional gangster death for opposing them, said Bruce Bagley, a University of Miami analyst who studies Latin American drug traffickers.

"Filling people full of bullets is old hat -- this has really been an attention-getter and it has clearly scared the hell out of people," he said.

Mexico's Calderon: Key Areas Overwhelmed By Drug Violence (AP)

AP, September 26, 2006

MEXICO CITY (AP)--Mexico's president-elect says murder and mayhem fueled by drug smuggling have overwhelmed the governments of the nation's capital and key states across the country.

Felipe Calderon said the wave of bloodshed knows no politics; it is ravaging state governments controlled by each of Mexico's three major parties. He singled out the capital, the northern states of Sinaloa and Tamaulipas, the southern state of Guerrero and his home state of Michoacan, as being especially hard-hit.

"It seems to me that drug violence has overwhelmed the governments of the PAN, the PRI and the PRD," Calderon said in a radio interview.

The PAN is the ruling National Action Party, while the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, controlled Mexico's presidency from 1929 until losing to President Vicente Fox in 2000. In the July 2 presidential election, Calderon barely beat leftist former Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador of the PRD, or Democratic Revolution Party.

Calderon called for legislative and law-enforcement efforts across party lines "in a very coordinated way."

He said during his daily briefing with reporters at Los Pinos, the Mexican equivalent of the White House. "The fight has not been overwhelmed, but there's still much to do."

Calderon will take office Dec. 1, replacing the term-limited Fox.

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico City has long expressed concern about the growing wave of violence along the northern border, where people are gunned down with automatic weapons almost daily, and dozens of Americans have been kidnapped.

Authorities say more than 1,500 people have died in Mexican drug violence so far this year.

Narcotics investigators on both sides of the border attribute the spike in killings to a territorial war between drug gangs battling for control of lucrative smuggling corridors into the United States.

But U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza recently extended warnings to say Americans should use extreme caution when traveling anywhere in Mexico.

"The bottom line is that we simply cannot allow drug traffickers to place in jeopardy the lives of our citizens and the safety of our communities," Garza said in a statement Sept. 14.

Calderon said drug violence "is generating much more diplomatic pressure" from Washington, adding that upcoming U.S. congressional elections have made Mexico even more of a hot issue than usual.

Violence has sometimes reached spectacular level in Calderon's native state of Michoacan in central Mexico, west of the capital.

On Sept. 6, gunmen with their faces covered burst into a seedy nightclub in the Michoacan city of Uruapan, fired guns in the air and rolled five severed human heads onto the dance floor.

Investigators say Michoacan is a base for powerful cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamine smugglers with ties to some of the country's largest and most-violent drug gangs.

Beheadings also have occurred in Guerrero state, home to the Pacific resort of Acapulco, and in Baja California, where the violent border city of Tijuana is located.

The War On Drugs: Ambushed In Jamund? (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

JAMUNDÍ, COLOMBIA

Arcesio Morales Buitrago is in charge of the keys at Mi Casita. A soft-spoken man diagnosed as schizophrenic, he is the doyen of the patients at the leafy psychiatric home.

On May 22, right after the Monday afternoon bingo game, three cars skidded to a halt on the road that dead ends at Mi Casita. Ten men in blue jeans and police vests and one man in a ski mask piled out.

DOJ_NMG_0070111

"Judicial police! Open up!" they shouted.

Mr. Morales, as the one responsible for the keys, hurried down the path to comply.

As he reached the green iron gate, however, Sergio Berrio, the administrator of the home, leaned out from the balcony above and screeched: "Stay back! Don't open!"

Morales froze. That's when the shooting started: a torrent of bullets and grenades rained down on the police from the nearby forest. "The war came here," Morales recalls incredulously, "...all the way here."

What followed in the next 45 minutes was the calculated massacre of one of Colombia's best counternarcotics police teams - all hand-picked and trained by the US. None survived.

This is a story of those policemen - of the members of Colombia's military that killed them - and of the narcotraffickers that, according to Colombia's attorney general, ordered the hit.

The investigation of the Jamundí massacre to date suggests the reach that Colombia's drug lords maintain today, and has shaken officials in Washington and Bogotá. The US Congress has temporarily frozen funding for Plan Colombia, the $4.7 billion effort to stop the illicit drug trade - and a chorus of disappointed and angry voices in both capitals is demanding an honest evaluation of the US' most expensive foreign aid program outside of the Middle East, six years after it set out to win the war on drugs.

"Three thousand Americans a year die from Colombian drugs," says US Ambassador to Colombia William Wood. "That's like suffering a World Trade Towers attack every year."

Talking about drugs in terms of an attack on the US is not new. President Richard Nixon coined the term "war on drugs" in 1971, and President Ronald Regan popularized it in the 1980s, as crack cocaine was devastating America's inner cities. Then, with the cold war drawing to a close, illicit substances and those who trafficked them became the new international enemy - and the countries that produced them became battlefields. Colombia has emerged as the biggest battlefield of all.

An estimated 5.5 million Americans have used cocaine at least once in the past 12 months, roughly the same number as were doing so in 2002, according to the annual US Department of Health and Human Services survey. More than 2.3 million Americans are "current" users, defined as consuming the drug within the last month - a slightly higher number than the regular users counted in 2002.

Cocaine consumption is rising faster in Europe, but the US still has the highest rate of cocaine use anywhere in the world.

And while Ambassador Wood's 3,000 US deaths related to cocaine use is debated, the source of the narcotic is not. Colombia supplies an estimated 80 percent of cocaine worldwide, and more than 90 percent of the cocaine (and half the heroin) in the US, according to the State Department.

Three years after President Reagan defined drugs as a national security threat, President George H. W. Bush intensified this war. Under the 1989 Andean Initiative, aid to the region was boosted and US training and support for counter narcotics military and police was sanctioned.

Bolivia and Peru, the world's two other major coca-producing nations, received sharply increased assistance too - but the majority of the drug-war funds went to Colombia. In 1989, Colombia got $18 million for military and police assistance. A year later, US funding increased five-fold, making it the Western Hemisphere's No. 1 recipient of US security assistance, a distinction it maintains today.

Plan Colombia, the counternarcotics program conceived by Colombian President Andres Pastrana, modified and launched by President Bill Clinton in 2000, and since embraced by President George W. Bush, carried this commitment to new levels.

In its first 18 months, Plan Colombia spent $1.3 billion in the region, the vast majority - $860 million - in Colombia. Of that aid, some 75 percent - $642 million - went toward security - including the formation of a new counternarcotics brigade within the Colombian army whose job was to ease the way for the massive aerial herbicide spraying of coca crops. Since its launch, Plan Colombia has cost the US $4.7 billion, of which 75-80 percent has gone to the security forces.

The plan has achieved significant results in terms of coca fields eradicated, clandestine drug laboratories burned and tons of drugs seized. Thousands of people involved in the drug trade have been caught, killed, put behind bars, or extradited to the US.

Further, the decades-old drug-fueled conflict between right-wing paramilitaries, leftist guerrillas, and the government has abated perceptibly, say analysts. A halting process of demobilizing the paramilitaries is under way, and the rebel Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) has lost ground to the army. President Alvaro Uribe was re-elected this May in a landslide thanks to his success in improving security in the country.

But the drug trade and the war against it continue to spawn violence, massive displacements of population, and high levels of corruption here, tearing at the social fabric of the country. And Colombia continues to be heavily, some say dangerously, militarized, with its army taking on internal security roles that would be prohibited in the US and many other democracies.

Now the Jamundí ambush is forcing some officials in Colombia (the No. 1 producer of cocaine in the world) and the US (the No. 1 consumer) to reevaluate their approach.

"We have spent $4.7 billion in Colombia ... and we brush under the rug a host of uncomfortable questions - about the military ... degrees of corruption, and overall efficacy of the drug war effort," says Bruce Bagley, an expert on drug trafficking at the University of Miami. "And then, along comes a Jamundí and calls the entire presumption of this war on drugs into question."

When the shooting started near the psychiatric home, Morales dove into a wide gutter along the driveway, covering his ears with his hands and pressing his face as close to the concrete as he could bear. When he finally emerged, he saw more than a dozen Colombian soldiers from the alpine battalion of the Army's 3rd Brigade descending from the hills. On the ground outside the gate were 11 bodies, riddled with bullets.

"They were my most effective, trustworthy, elite group," laments Brig. Gen. Oscar Naranjo, director of the judicial police. Seven of the men in the team were members of the police's top counternarcotics unit: a group of approximately 200 police who have gone through rigorous vetting and training by the US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA).

Those seven killed in Jamundí were part of a 15-person team that had, in the past 18 months, smashed 15 drug rings, captured 205 traffickers, including 23 wanted for extradition to the US, and seized nearly 4.4 tons of cocaine.

That day in May, they had come to the Cauca Valley, 195 miles southwest of the nation's capital, together with an informant and three police specialists, on a tip that 440 poundsof cocaine were stashed in the psychiatric home.

A tragic case of "friendly fire," is how Army commander Gen. Mario Montoya originally described the "shoot out," protesting that the troops had no advance knowledge of an undercover operation and had mistaken the police for kidnappers.

But as the smoke cleared, a different narrative began to take shape.

"This was not a mistake, this was a crime; this was a deliberate decision, a criminal decision," Attorney General Mario Iguarán announced a few days later. The soldiers, he bluntly charged, "...were doing the bidding of a drug trafficker." Eight of the policemen were shot in the head, and two were shot in the back, according to forensic reports. "This is one of the gravest cases in our history," says General Naranjo. "This is active corruption, and my men are dead. This cannot be tolerated."

According to a senior official investigating the case, speaking on condition of anonymity, the police unit that day may have been looking not just for drugs, but for a specific drug trafficker: Diego Montoya Sánchez, a reputed head of the Norte del Valle (North Valley) cartel.

Since the dismantling of the Medellín and Cali cartels in the 1980s and early 1990s, the Norte del Valle Cartel has become Colombia's most powerful drug ring. Officials say that the two factions of the cartel are behind 30 percent of the cocaine sent to the US, and Montoya is on the FBI's 10-most-wanted list, right beside Osama bin Laden, with a bounty of $5 million on his head. According to the investigator, the police unit had been told Montoya was hiding in the psychiatric home, posing as a patient.

The Mi Casita administrators, who lost almost half their private funding after the media reports linked them to Montoya, deny any connection to narcotrafficking. The police investigation has turned up no drugs or evidence that a drug lord had been at the home. The police, says the investigator, may well have been on a wild goose chase set up by the army unit, acting on behalf of Montoya.

Fifteen soldiers, including rising Army star commander Col. Bayron Carvajal, were soon arrested - and the investigation, say officials in the attorney general's office, is likely to reach higher in the military ranks and will possibly include the police or even politicians.

Colonel Carvajal's younger brother, Juan Carlos, maintains the soldiers' innocence, suggesting instead the police might be the corrupt ones in the story. "Uribe needed to blame someone," says Carvajal, arguing that Colombia's president could not afford to have the DEA's top trained police unit implicated in any scandal - especially not in late May, right before the presidential elections. "My brother and the others are political pawns. They are being made to take the fall," he insists.

In fact, Carvajal's allegations are not considered to be too far a stretch - the Norte del Valle group is known for its connections to the police. Former cartel leaders such as Danilo González, Victor Patiño, and Patiño's half-brother Luís Ocampo were all former policemen - as is Wilber Varela, currently Montoya's biggest internal rival.

But, evidence against the soldiers is mounting. The most damning is a series of electronic text messages allegedly sent between Carvajal - who was not at Jamundí at the time - and his lieutenant on the ground immediately before the massacre. "Everything is set for tonight," reads one message leaked by authorities. "Get ready for the group to come with the chicken so you can get it," reads another, referring to the nickname of the civilian informant who was leading the police that day.

And now, one senior official close to the investigation says investigators have heard a tape recording of Carvajal speaking on the phone with narcotraffickers to arrange payment for his defense lawyers.

"Jamundí is the tip of the iceberg," says Professor Bagley, arguing the massacre is indicative of the serious gap between Plan Colombia's promise to train a modern, professional military and the realities of the day. The events of that May afternoon, he says, should serve as a serious wake-up call: "This is a disaster for [President] Uribe and Plan Colombia."

At Mi Casita, more than three months later, many of the patients remain traumatized by the massacre. One woman yells out "Police, police...open up!" at the slightest provocation. Another bites herself whenever she hears loud bangs. And Morales, the only eyewitness to the killings, hears the voices of the policemen crying out for mercy when he tries to sleep at night. "Was it my fault?" Morales asks, wringing his hands. "I talk to my saints and ask them for forgiveness."

Mr. Berrio, the administrator at Mi Casita tries to calm Morales, "We can't escape this war. And we can't win it either," he consoles the flustered man and himself at once. "But you did the best thing you could. You kept your head down. That's all any of us would have done."

· Coming next: Is Plan Colombia working? Why Diego Montoya Sánchez is worth $5 million to the FBI

He likes fast cars (but police seized his personal mini racetrack last year, along with 74 ranches and eight houses). He has a flare for the macabre (his men once ambushed a rival group and then piled the corpses in a pyramid on a road). And, he reportedly likes it when people call him "El Señor de la Guerra," or Mr. War.

Heavyset and gruff, Diego Montoya Sánchez is one of the reputed leaders of Colombia's Norte del Valle cartel. He has a $5 million bounty on his head and is on the FBI's "10 most wanted list" for drug trafficking, conspiracy to import with intent to deliver drugs to the US, money laundering, and racketeering.

In the late 1990s, the Norte del Valle cartel - named for a valley in western Colombia - trafficked about half of the cocaine sold in the US. Today, officials estimate that the cartel holds about 30 percent of the market.

For the past two years, the cartel has been riven by a brutal internal power struggle between Mr. Montoya and his rival Wilber Varela, a.k.a. "Jabon" or Soap. Each faction leader has turned to different sides of Colombia's civil war for support: Varela is reportedly allied with the guerrillas of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC). Montoya reportedly has ties to the right-wing paramilitaries.

House OKs New Gun-show Rules (RTD)

ATF agents' tactics in Richmond area led to bill; Scott vote decried

WASHINGTON -- The House of Representatives yesterday passed a bill to revamp federal enforcement rules for gun dealers, born in part from complaints about agents' tactics at Richmond-area gun shows.

The bipartisan bill would give the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives more tools to punish federally licensed gun dealers who break U.S. firearm-sale rules. It was passed on a vote of 277-131.

Its chief proponents, including Virginia Rep. Robert C. Scott, D-3rd, labeled the bill a balanced approach to provide needed intermediate penalties, including civil penalties or a license suspension, that fall short of revoking a dealer's license.

Warnings and revocation of licenses are the only punishments for dealers under current law.

As many as 98 percent of gun dealers' federal violations now result in nothing more than a letter of reprimand, or a meeting with ATF officials in their offices, Scott said during debate of the bill Monday.

The bill "will result in improved, fair and meaningful enforcement of our gun laws," said Scott, who had teamed with Rep. Howard Coble, R-N.C., to draft the bill and push it to passage.

But foes painted the bill as potentially gutting the ATF's power to go after corrupt gun dealers.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., referred to correspondence from former ATF officials, including two former directors, opposing the bill.

"ATF already faces severe constraints in its ability to crack down on gun dealers who violate the law. [The bill] would further jeopardize ATF's ability to enforce the law against these rogue elements," former ATF officials wrote in a letter dated Friday.

They contended that a legal standard set in the bill for revoking gun dealers' licenses would be virtually impossible to meet.

"This is a misguided piece of legislation that allows a small minority of corrupt gun sellers to continue to sell guns to criminals without penalties," said Rep. Carolyn McCarthy, D-N.Y.

The National Rifle Association supported the bill while the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence fought it.

"Why Congressman Scott is part of this surprises and disappoints us," said Paul Helmke, president of the Brady Campaign.

Scott has compiled a generally liberal record. He is the senior Democrat on the House subcommittee on crime, terrorism and homeland security. Coble heads that panel.

At a subcommittee hearing earlier, complaints were lodged against ATF for questionable law-enforcement practices at gun shows in the Richmond area.

"Neither Mr. Scott nor I is interested in ham-stringing the ATF," Coble said Monday. "But I note for a fact that in some instances the ATF agents became heavy-handed, maybe even unruly, in the Virginia situation; I think this will address that problem."

Andrew Arulanandam, a spokesman for the NRA, recently called Scott's support for the bill "a testament to the legislation that this is, in fact, reform that is needed."

The bill also directs the inspector general for the Justice Department to review the ATF's gun-show enforcement program.

ATF Seeks To Create Gang Field Office In Seattle Area (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) - The local head of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives says he hopes to establish a permanent gang investigation field office here, part of a growing law enforcement response to gang activity statewide.

Kelvin Crenshaw, special agent in charge of the ATF's Seattle office, told The Seattle Times he plans to ask his bosses in Washington, D.C., this fall for permission to establish the gang office, which he said would mean more agents and funding for complex investigations.

The plan is part of a response to what law enforcement officials see as a recent increase in gang activity. In Seattle, a regional hub of such crime, 101 cases were referred to the police department's gang unit between Jan. 1 and Aug. 31 of this year - more than the 94 cases in all of 2005.

The ATF has been compiling a regional database of gang members, and last year formed a violent gang task force with members from the FBI, Seattle Police and the King County sheriff's office. Crenshaw's second-in-command, Doug Dawson, said the database will also help officials determine what cases meet the threshold for federal prosecution, determined in part by firearm use and the amount of drugs involved.

Meanwhile, the state attorney general's office has set out to conduct a statewide "threat assessment" under the belief that Western Washington gangs have been moving into Eastern Washington cities, said Chris Johnson, policy director for Attorney General Rob McKenna.

McKenna could suggest that legislators create sentencing enhancements for crimes committed by known gang members, Johnson said.

According to police and gang experts nationwide, increasing criminal sophistication, demand for drugs, demographics, migration patterns and generational conflicts have all played roles in the violence.

Quantifying any increase in gang-related violence is tough, though, because there isn't a nationally accepted definition of what constitutes a gang. Many law enforcement agencies, including the King County sheriff's office, don't categorize or track the number of crimes committed by suspected gang members.

That's because it's not illegal to be a gang member. Instead, many agencies focus on criminal behavior.

"I don't want to say gangs are running wild in the city, but I don't want to close an eye" to the issue either, Seattle Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske said.

"Gangs aren't just a Seattle problem - there's a lot of concern right now," both locally and nationally about rising levels of gang violence, Kerlikowske said.

Between 30 and 60 street gangs operate in Seattle and its suburbs, police estimate. Gentrification and housing costs have pushed gangs into cities like Kent, Auburn, Federal Way and SeaTac, where a growing number of suburban kids are being lured into the gang lifestyle, said Gabe Morales, a gang consultant from Des Moines who teaches police, corrections officials and local school district officials about gangs and gang-prevention strategies.

Also at play are turf wars involving so-called OGs - original gangsters - who are returning to business after a decade or more in prison and fighting with younger gang members, experts say.

An ongoing war between gang members in Seattle's Central Area and rivals in the Rainier Valley has featured such intergenerational fighting, said Morales and Lt. Eric Sano, who until last week was commander of the SPD's gang unit.

IMMIGRATION:

Supreme Court To Rule On Immigrant Car Theft (LAT)

By David G. Savage

DOJ_NMG_0070115

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to hear a California case to decide whether immigrants convicted of stealing a car must be deported.

A strict federal immigration reform law passed in 1996 says that immigrants, including permanent residents, who commit an "aggravated felony" in the U.S. must be sent home, regardless of how long they have lived here or whether they have a family and a job.

But the Justice Department and some lower courts have disagreed on which crimes, including auto theft, are aggravated felonies.

Next week, the Supreme Court will take up a separate South Dakota case to determine whether immigrants who are convicted of drug possession can be deported as felons. The outcome is expected to affect tens of thousands of immigrants across the country.

This week, the justices met for the first time since late June, and they announced they had agreed to hear nine of about 1,900 pending appeals, including the government's claim that auto thieves and their accomplices are guilty of a deportable crime.

The case before the court involves a California law on auto thefts, but government lawyers said all 50 states have similar measures.

Four years ago, Luis Alexander Duenas-Alvarez, a native of Peru who became a legal U.S. resident, pleaded guilty to stealing a 2002 Honda Accord in Marin County, near San Francisco, and was sentenced to three years in prison. Federal authorities took him into custody for deportation.

The 1996 law has a list of aggravated felonies that lead to deportation, including any theft that carries a prison sentence of more than a year.

Government lawyers contend that any immigrant convicted of auto theft in California should be deported under that law.

But earlier this year, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed. The court ruled that the California law is too broad to fit the definition of theft in the federal law because it includes accomplices to auto theft.

The government counters that all states have laws that allow accomplices to be charged with auto theft.

In their appeal on behalf of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, government lawyers said the 9th Circuit was wrong on two points. First, Duenas-Alvarez stole the car and therefore was a thief. And second, Congress meant to include accomplices to the crime when it wrote the federal law.

The government said at least 8,000 deportation cases in the nine Western states in the 9th Circuit would be affected by the court's ruling. The oral argument in Gonzales vs. Duenas-Alvarez was set for Dec. 5.

The justices also said Tuesday they would reconsider the 9th Circuit Court's decision to reverse the death penalty that was given to an Arizona murderer who refused in 1990 to have mitigating evidence presented.

Once on Death Row, Jeffrey Landrigan, the murderer, appealed his sentence and claimed his lawyer failed to present mitigating evidence on his behalf. In March, the 9th Circuit agreed with his claim in a 9-2 decision.

In June, Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard asked the Supreme Court to take up the case, arguing that federal judges should defer to state courts in most instances. And in this case, the state judges concluded that the defendant, not his lawyer, was responsible for his plight. The high court will hear the case in January.

The justices also said they would consider reviving a Washington state law that shields school teachers from having their dues used for political purposes without their permission.

In the past, the court has said unionized workers can be forced to pay their fair share of the cost of bargaining with managers, but they had a right not to pay for political efforts. In 1992, Washington's voters adopted a measure that requires public employee unions to seek permission before any of a member's dues can be used for politics.

But earlier this year, the Washington Supreme Court said this requirement violated the union's free-speech rights. The state and several teachers appealed.

Although the case of Washington vs. Washington Education Association raises questions about politics and the First Amendment, the ruling is likely to affect only one state's law.

More Than Two Dozen People Detained On Fort Bragg (FAYOBS)

By Justin Willett, Staff writer

Fayetteville (NC) Observer, September 27, 2006

Fort Bragg officials this morning detained 28 people, mostly construction workers, as they tried to enter post with false or fraudulently obtained identification.

The operation — the second this year — was conducted at the All American Freeway access-control point between 6 and 8 a.m.

DOJ_NMG_0070116

In July, 58 people were detained at the Knox Street and Randolph Street entrances to Fort Bragg.

Tom McCollum, a Fort Bragg spokesman, said the 28 were taken to a immigration detention center in Cary.

People caught in the sweep could be charged with presenting a false or fraudulently obtained federal or state identification and criminal trespassing, according to a statement about today's operation.

?C;If it is shown that employers knowingly hired these people, the employer can be cited with aiding and abetting and or conspiracy charges,?D; the statement said.

Fort Bragg's garrison commander can also bar contractors from working on post, McCollum said.

Following the July 18 sweep, all but 10 of the 58 people detained were charged with illegal entry into the United States. Six people received federal jail sentences in August, and the other 42 each pleaded guilty to a single charge related to their illegal status.

McCollum said that since July, Fort Bragg has detained 14 people trying to enter post with false or fraudulently obtained identification.

In the past year, Fort Bragg has detained 224 people, mostly construction workers, trying to enter the post under false pretenses, according to the Fort Bragg statement.

Agencies involved in today's sweep included: Fort Bragg's Directorate of Security and Emergency Services, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, U.S. Marshals, the Defense Criminal Investigation Service, the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Raleigh.

U.S. Judge Orders Deportation Of 3 Egyptian Students Who Disappeared From University Exchange Program (FINDLAW/AP)

By Timberly Ross, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

(AP) - OMAHA, Nebraska-Three Egyptian students who sparked a nationwide search when they failed to show up for a university exchange program last month were ordered deported Monday.

The students - Mohamed Ibrahim El Sayed El Moghazy, 20; Ahmed Refaat Saad El Moghazi El Laket, 19; and Moustafa Wagdy Moustafa El Gafary, 18 - had admitted they violated U.S. immigration laws and asked Judge James Fujimoto to allow them to return home voluntarily.

Fujimoto, who presided over the hearing via teleconference from Chicago, denied the request and ordered the three deported, citing their brief time in the United States, lack of long-term and family ties here and decision to flee immediately upon entering the country.

In the future, the three will need special permission to ever re-enter the U.S., which they would not have needed if they were allowed to leave voluntarily.

"Voluntary departure has been granted in thousands of other cases, and this one is not unique," the students' lawyer, Amy Peck, said after the decision was announced.

Peck has said the three said they feared they would be sent home if anyone in the group did not show up to the exchange program. She said when some students left the group after arriving in New York, her clients decided to go sightseeing in San Francisco. They then took a bus to Des Moines, Iowa, and used fake names, she said.

Peck did not know if they would appeal the decision.

The three were among 17 students from Mansoura University in Egypt invited to a monthlong exchange program at Montana State University. Only six students showed up to the program, prompting U.S. authorities to issue a nationwide search for the remaining 11 students. All were detained, but none were considered a terrorism risk.

Senators Criticize Border Security Measures (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The Republican architects of the Senate immigration bill criticized the border security measures under consideration in Congress as piecemeal and inadequate. Senators John McCain of Arizona, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina said they supported border security, including a measure to add fencing to the border with Mexico. But they said that such measures alone would fail to deal with the illegal residence in this country of about 11 million immigrants as well as labor shortages in particular industries. The senators called for an approach similar to the Senate bill, which would tighten border security, toughen penalties for employers who hire illegal immigrants, put most illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship and create a guest-worker plan to address labor shortages. They acknowledged that passage of such legislation was unlikely before the elections.

Senator Rejects Immigration Addition To Defense Bill (USAT/AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, The Associated Press

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — A senior GOP senator blocked Republican leaders Tuesday in their efforts to add immigration, handgun and Internet gambling measures to a defense bill.

Virginia Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, rejected requests from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and House Speaker Dennis Hastert to add the items to his bill on military pay.

Warner said in a memo to Frist he is “firmly opposed” to including unrelated measures in the defense bill.

Hastert wants to add to the defense bill a measure the House passed last week that would make it easier to deport illegal immigrants who are members of violent criminal street gangs.

“It's my hope the Senate will live up to its word so that we can send this measure to the president for his signature,” Hastert said.

Hastert also wanted to use the defense bill as a way to get a vote in the Senate on a House measure that would allow judges to carry handguns and bolster courthouse security. The proposal came in response to the murder of a Chicago federal judge's husband and mother last year.

Warner balked, saying he wanted to keep the defense bill bipartisan while U.S. troops are at war. Warner said he, along with Democrats and at least two other Republicans, would not sign off on the request.

Senate Democrats, including Minority Whip Dick Durbin, D-Ill., support tightening court security, but the House bill on judges carrying concealed weapons cooled their support.

Hastert said Tuesday that he has offered to drop the provision that would allow judges to carry a concealed weapon.

Frist has been pushing for the Internet gambling crackdown. Among other things, the provision would ban the use of credit cards, checks and other forms of payment to settle online wagers.

Other immigration measures passed by the House this month also have stalled as senators refused to add them to the Homeland Security spending bill. Among them are prison sentences for those who build or finance tunnels across U.S. borders, and a bill proposing a 700-mile fence.

States, Counties Begin To Enforce Immigration Law (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

CHARLOTTE -- Police here operated for years under what amounts to a "don't ask, don't tell" policy toward illegal immigrants.

As elsewhere in the United States, law enforcement officers did not check the immigration status of people they came into contact with, and in the vast majority of cases, a run-in with the law carried little threat of deportation.

But that accommodation for the burgeoning illegal population ended abruptly in April, when the Mecklenburg County sheriff's office began to enforce immigration law, placing more than 100 people a month into deportation proceedings. Some of them had been charged with violent crimes, others with traffic infractions.

The program takes one of the most aggressive stances in the United States toward illegal immigrants, and officials in scores of communities, including Herndon and Loudoun County, have been considering adopting their own version. The House earlier this month was weighing a measure "reaffirming" the authority of local law enforcement agencies to arrest people on suspicion of violating immigration laws.

Some Latino leaders say the program here is contributing to a discriminatory climate in which Hispanic drivers feel as if they are being "hunted" by police. And some law enforcement agencies elsewhere have shied away from enforcing immigration laws, saying that doing so would rupture any trust they have developed in Latino neighborhoods.

But advocates see it as a way to catch illegal immigrants who slip through porous federal enforcement measures and then run afoul of state or local police.

Mecklenburg County Sheriff Jim Pendergraph says there should be little sympathy for illegal immigrants caught by his program: They have already broken the law once by being here illegally, and then been arrested on suspicion of another crime.

"When any of them cross that border without proper documentation, they've violated the law -- however insignificant it may seem to some people," he said. "I've heard sad stories about folks wanting to come up here and have a better life and earn money for their family. I've arrested bank robbers who've had the same excuse."

DOJ_NMG_0070118

While the program has led to the removal of many illegal immigrants charged with felonies, people arrested for lesser charges such as traffic violations are also subject to deportation. That, according to Hispanic leaders, has created a constant worry for people who are in the United States illegally and now fear deportation after a simple traffic stop.

Many illegal immigrants lack valid licenses. As a result, they now risk not only arrest but also deportation whenever they drive.

"It's tense, very tense," said Angeles Ortega-Moore, director of the Latin American Coalition in Charlotte. "It used to be everybody here loved the Latinos. They would say, 'We like you more than the blacks.' Now we're like the Big Bad Wolf."

"The law enforcement community is split on this issue," said Gene Voegtlin, legislative counsel for the International Association of Chiefs of Police. The local agencies against enforcing immigration law "are concerned about the chilling effect it will have on immigrants' cooperation with law enforcement," he said.

In Mecklenburg County, about 1,200 foreign-born people have been arrested since April, on charges ranging from traffic violations and trespassing to sex crimes, and nearly 600 have been found to be here illegally.

Among those snared earlier this month was Guadalupe Lara, an 18-year-old Mexican carpenter.

The fifth of eight children born to farmworkers in Queretaro, he walked across the border when he was 16 to find work. Two years later, he has only a wispy beard and stands 5-foot-3.

He makes $7.50 an hour and lives with four others in a small, sparsely furnished apartment. Though they lack beds, they have a television on which Lara watches his favorite telenovela, "Heridas de Amor." He sends money home monthly and calls home every week.

"It's difficult," he said in Spanish. "When I call they say 'How are you?' I say 'I am fine.' " On Monday night, Lara was pulled over by police after buying a pack of cigarettes. He was not drunk but had an open bottle of beer in the car. He also lacked a license. He was arrested and when asked admitted he had no papers.

Had he been detained elsewhere, his illegal status may not have mattered.

But in Mecklenburg, two sergeants and 10 deputies at the jail are trained to handle immigration infractions, running checks in databases and holding people in custody if necessary.

Some of those arrested face immediate deportation. Some are held on bond pending an immigration hearing. Lara was relatively lucky. Because he had no prior immigration or criminal charges, he was given a notice to appear before an immigration judge in Atlanta and released. He is likely to be ordered deported.

Lara says police now unfairly target Latinos. More than 90 percent of the illegal immigrants discovered in Mecklenburg are from Latin America.

"The police are just looking for problems with Hispanics," Lara said. "They know we don't have driver's licenses -- we can't get them -- and so they pull us over."

Liliana "La Chula" Ramos, a host on local Spanish radio, said: "A lot of people here are very afraid because they think the police will pull them over for anything. It's very difficult for people to get licenses now, and people have to go to work, so they're out there driving."

Philip Turtletaub, a Charlotte immigration lawyer, says he sometimes receives six or seven calls a day from relatives of illegal immigrants caught by the program. He tells them not to waste their money.

"Most people I can't do anything for," he said.

While he ventured no opinion on the program's fairness, he said he thinks it could make life as an illegal immigrant in the region so uncomfortable that fewer illegal immigrants would choose to live there.

"They're putting the pressure on these people. They're scaring them. People say we can't deport 10 million. But you don't have to. If you deport enough of them, others will go back voluntarily because they don't want to live in these conditions."

Besides Mecklenburg, six other state and local law enforcement agencies have started similar programs in recent years. A dozen more are being worked out with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. And in the past three months, hundreds of state and local departments have inquired about similar efforts, said Robert J. Hines, who heads the program for the ICE.

"When you are removing the criminal element from the community, it's hard to point a finger and say it's a bad thing," Hines said.

Loudoun County Sheriff Stephen O. Simpson said his department is considering participating. Early this morning, the Herndon Town Council was to vote on Police Chief Toussaint E. Summers Jr.'s request to apply for such a program.

Officials in Alexandria, Arlington, Fairfax and Prince William said they are not considering the idea, and police officials in suburban Maryland say there is lukewarm interest in deputizing officers to enforce immigration laws.

"In the Montgomery County area, we've taken more the track that we celebrate diversity," said Gaithersburg Police Chief Mary Ann Viverette, who is also the president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police. Immigration is "not an issue we want to enforce."

In federal testimony from August, Pendergraph, the Mecklenburg County sheriff, said "political correctness" is preventing some communities from adopting the program, and that "will eventually be the downfall of this country if someone doesn't wake up."

Like much of the mid-Atlantic region, Charlotte has seen a rapid rise in the number of Latino immigrants over the past 15 years, many of them here illegally. Between 2000 and 2005, the estimated number of illegal immigrants in North Carolina rose 38 percent, from 260,000 to 360,000, according to a Department of Homeland Security report.

The influx, particularly conspicuous in a metropolis clinging to its small-town past, has caused ripples of concern.

"Texas, New York and California might be used to large influxes of illegal immigrants -- but we're not," said Mecklenburg County Commissioner Bill James, who favors stronger enforcement. "James Carville had it right: We're just Mayberry with a major airport."

Local support for broad enforcement coalesced in July 2005 after a truck driven by an illegal immigrant whose blood-alcohol level was nearly triple the legal limit, hit a car, killing a local teacher and leaving the teacher's wife in a vegetative state. The accident resulted in Ramiro Gallegos's fifth impaired-driving charge in five years -- and led to the new enforcement policy.

"No more excuses," U.S. Rep. Sue Myrick (R) said at a news conference at the time, calling for tougher enforcement. "You're drunk. You're driving. You're illegal. You're deported. Period."

Et tu, ACLU?

Things are fractious indeed at the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). More than 30 longtime ACLU heavyweights are calling for the ouster of the organization's leadership, claiming it failed to uphold "principles" it inflicts upon everyone else.

"We come together now, reluctantly but resolutely, not to injure the ACLU, but to restore its integrity and its consistency of principle," the group of former board members, staffers, donors and a lawyer said in a mission statement, according to the New York Times yesterday.

The group is irked that the ACLU checked its staffers against government lists of suspected terrorists during a fundraising drive, used data-mining to profile donors and planned to monitor staff e-mails. Criticism has been focused on Executive Director Anthony Romero and board President Nadine Strossen.

"It's clear that the organization's leadership has let it drift away from its core principles," said David Goldberger, an Ohio State University law professor who once defended the right of Nazis to march through a Jewish suburb of Chicago.

An ACLU spokeswoman says the group still fights "aggressively for the principles of free speech." The disgruntled protesters are certainly exercising theirs: They have set up a Web site -- www.savetheaclu.org -- which went live yesterday.

"It is a home for ACLU loyalists who have been shut out of the organization," said Ira Glasser, ACLU director from 1978 to 2001.

Round two

In the big Wallace vs. Bubba match this weekend, "Fox News Sunday" garnered its best ratings in three years, according to Nielsen, and the two combatants -- host Chris Wallace and former President Bill Clinton -- got a lot of buzz. Both political parties now claim the squabble "energized" their respective bases.

The match even attracted those who make wagers.

BetCRIS Sportsbook has posted the odds on whether Mr. Clinton will duke it out again with Mr. Wallace. The New York-based online betting group reveals that odds are running 4-to-1 that Mr. Clinton will return for another bout in the next 90 days, 3-to-1 in the next 120 days, 2-to-1 within 150 days and 1-to-1 within the next six months.

"Politicians are trained in the art of keeping cool and levelheaded," spokesman Mickey Richardson said. "When the opportunity arises to watch a former president become so easily roused, you can't help but stare. I would like to see him go head-to-head with Chris Wallace again. I just don't think he will."

Moral relativism

The Republican candidate for Arizona governor says the state's new September 11 memorial should be torn down, calling it an insult to America.

"It reminds us of American failings and American mistakes, real and imagined, before and after 9/11. This memorial is a tribute to moral relativism," Len Munsil said yesterday, according the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0070120

The memorial features such quotations as, "You don't win battles of terrorism with more battles" and "Erroneous U.S. air strike kills 46 Afghanistan civilians," among other things.

"Only in the relativistic context of left-wing protesters holding 'Bush is a terrorist' signs do such inscriptions make any sense," said Mr. Munsil, founder of the Center for Arizona Politics.

"It explains why despite the outpouring of public prayer and the bipartisan singing of 'God Bless America' on the steps of the U.S. Capitol, there is not a single mention of God in this memorial," Mr. Munsil said.

"I'm just sorry that they're trying to politicize 9/11. That's just wrong," Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano said.

Adios, Republicans?

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson says neither party will win votes at the ballot box this year on the issue of illegal border crossing.

"You don't get any votes on this either way," Mr. Richardson said during a meeting with the press in Washington yesterday, reports The Washington Times' Eric Pfeiffer. "In the end, voters look at bread-and-butter issues."

Mr. Richardson, a Democrat who is Hispanic and considering a run for the White House in 2008, said that any potential gains for Republicans will be offset by Hispanic voters who feel alienated by the party and an overall "2 percent surge" at the ballot box in the favor of Democrats over issues such as Iraq.

"President Bush did make some inroads with Hispanics in 2004," Mr. Richardson said. "The surge in Hispanics going Republican was because of President Bush, not because of any policies."

Mr. Richardson also said he doesn't expect immigration opponents to reward Republicans this fall, since Congress is not likely to pass an immigration-reform bill before it leaves Washington for the campaign trail. "When you control the White House and Congress, you only have one party to blame," he said.

Taxing situation

Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, said yesterday he wouldn't rule out killing any of President Bush's tax cuts in order to alleviate the dreaded Alternative Minimum Tax and balance the budget, Congress Daily reported.

Mr. Rangel stipulated that "everything has to be on the table" when considering which tax cuts must go, and when asked if he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum, he answered, "No question about it."

His remarks caused an immediate outburst among Republicans, claiming the Democrat had just admitted his party will indeed raise taxes if it comes to power in November.

"This is the first time since Walter Mondale that a national Democrat leader has openly called for across-the-board tax hikes," said Jonathan Collegio of the National Republican Congressional Committee. "In a single breath, Rangel made the notion of a Democrat Congress into a profoundly local pocketbook issue."

A Kinky moment

Former Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura is campaigning for Kinky Friedman, who aspires to be the first independent candidate to win the Texas governorship since Sam Houston 150 years ago.

"Do Texans have the guts to elect this guy?" Mr. Ventura asked a raucous San Antonio crowd yesterday.

"Texans love the Kinkster," Mr. Friedman chimed in, according to the Minneapolis Star-Tribune.

The two swaggering politicos have both received campaigning advice from Dean Barkley and Bill Hillsman, who created ads for Mr. Ventura and the late Paul Wellstone.

"Kinky's a great campaigner. Better than Jesse," Mr. Barkley said.

"Both Kinky and I shoot from the hip," Mr. Ventura countered, brandishing his newly brunette, shoulder-length braids. "But I'm the only former governor in the United States of America who can look like this."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House OKs $70B For Iraq, Afghanistan (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, September 27, 2006

Just days before leaving Washington to campaign, Congress is moving to provide $70 billion more for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan as part of a record $448 billion Pentagon budget.

With Iraq alone costing about $8 billion a month, another infusion of funds will be needed next spring. Opinion polls show the war continues to be unpopular with voters, but even Democratic opponents of the war generally embrace the Pentagon measure, since it provides funding for body armor and other support for U.S. troops overseas.

DOJ_NMG_0070121

The House passed the Pentagon appropriations bill Tuesday night on a 394-22 vote, and the Senate could clear the bill for President Bush as early as Wednesday or Thursday.

The House-Senate compromise bill provides $378 billion for core Pentagon programs, about a 5 percent increase, though not quite as much as Bush requested. The $70 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan is a down payment on war costs the White House has estimated will hit $110 billion for the budget year beginning Oct. 1.

With final passage of the bill, Congress will have approved $507 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and heightened security at overseas military bases since the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The growing price tag of the Iraq conflict is partly driven by the need to repair and replace military equipment destroyed in battle or simply worn out in harsh, dusty conditions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Almost $23 billion was approved for Army, Marine Corps and National Guard equipment such as helicopters, armored Humvees, Bradley Armored Fighting Vehicles, radios and night-vision equipment.

Another $1.9 billion is for new jammers to counter improvised explosive devices in Iraq and Afghanistan and $1 billion is provided for body armor and other personal protective gear.

The measure includes a Democratic-sponsored provision against establishing permanent military bases in Iraq. GOP leaders dropped identical language from an Iraq funding bill this June.

While the measure enjoys sweeping support, the brief debate sparked partisan exchanges over the Iraq war.

"If the president had told us the truth, that Iraq and Saddam Hussein ... presented no real threat to us, that there was no likelihood of weapons of mass destruction, that there was no connection to al-Qaida ... would this Congress have voted for war?" said Rep. Jerrold Nadler, D-N.Y. "I don't think so."

"Is the world better or worse off without (Hussein)?" said Rep. Tom Cole, R-Okla. "I think it's better, and it took American action."

The bill would be the first of 11 spending bills to clear Congress for the new budget year.

So little progress has been made on other bills that the Pentagon measure also carries a stopgap funding bill to keep open, through Nov. 17, agencies whose funding bills won't have passed. Only the homeland security measure is expected to also pass before Congress leaves Washington to campaign.

The core bill contains $86 billion for personnel costs, enough to support 482,000 Army soldiers and 175,000 Marines. That would provide for a 2.2 percent pay increase for the military as Bush requested in his February budget.

Another $120 billion would go to operations and maintenance costs, slightly less than the Pentagon request. And $81 billion is provided to buy new weapons, with another $76 billion dedicated to research and development costs.

That's still not enough for the White House, which requested $4 billion more. But House appropriators diverted that money to ease cuts in domestic programs. Earlier this year, the Senate passed a version shifting $9 billion to domestic programs but backed off in the face of a White House veto threat.

The sprawling measure contains good news for lawmakers from Maine, California and Missouri, among others. The bill includes $2.6 billion for two super-modern Navy DD(X) destroyers. That is significant because it would allow Bath Iron Works in Maine and Northrop Grumman's Ingalls Shipbuilding in Mississippi to build one ship each.

A House-passed defense policy bill had called for only one DD(X) ship, to be built in Mississippi.

The measure also almost triples Bush's request for eight C-17 cargo planes, providing for 22 of the aircraft, which are built in Long Beach, Calif. Several components are manufactured at Boeing's St. Louis-based defense company.

But Lockheed Martin's F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, which is assembled in Fort Worth, Texas, would face cuts. Bush requested five planes, but lawmakers cut that back to two, though funds are provided for advanced purchases of parts for 12 more.

House OKs $70B For Iraq, Afghanistan (WP/AP)

WASHINGTON -- Despite intense partisan divisions over the course of the Iraq war, the House on Tuesday easily approved $70 billion more for military operations there and in Afghanistan. Lawmakers also adopted a record $448 billion budget for the Pentagon.

With Iraq alone costing about $8 billion a month, another infusion of money will be needed next spring.

Democrats Delay GOP Bills In Senate (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Senate Democrats are blocking Republicans from passing several of their top legislative priorities this week, including new border fencing, two of the Bush administration's key counterterrorism programs and a drastic reduction in the estate tax.

"The legislative corner they've painted themselves in is very difficult," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, told reporters yesterday.

Democrats, while accusing Republicans of presiding over a "do-nothing" Congress, are slow-walking legislation but appear unlikely to kill outright any of the security measures as elections approach.

Asked yesterday whether Democrats will take advantage of Senate rules that allow lawmakers to demand 30 hours of debate on each bill, Mr. Reid replied: "Well, unless there's some agreement, we're going to go ahead and do the 30 hours."

Democrats have been far less successful in delaying action in the House, where priority measures either have been passed or are expected to be this week.

DOJ_NMG_0070123

Still, Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, says Republicans have achieved little in this Congress.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, replied by saying, "It may be a do-nothing Congress for Mr. Hoyer and the Democrats because by and large they stand on the sidelines and do nothing."

Last night, the House was able to pass, on a 394-22 vote, the military appropriations bill. The proposal allocates $448 billion: $70 billion for the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq and $378 billion for general defense spending. The Senate is scheduled to pass the bill this week, before it adjourns for the November elections.

Democrats spent much of yesterday discussing the National Intelligence Estimate, which determined that the war in Iraq is fueling terrorism worldwide.

"It's obvious that Republicans are trying to shift the focus away from the administration's failures in Iraq to other issues," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, said at a press conference. "They may not have a plan to complete, successfully, the mission in Iraq, but they do have a plan to win elections here at home."

Mrs. Clinton was asked about the "Fox News Sunday" interview with her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who responded angrily to a question from host Chris Wallace about whether he could have done more to stop Osama bin Laden from launching a terrorist strike on the United States.

"I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks," she said. "All you have to do is read the 9/11 commission [report] to know what he and his administration did to protect Americans and prevent terrorist attacks against our country."

She leveled a pointed attack on the Bush administration for its response to a classified report before the September 11 attacks titled "Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States."

"I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States,' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team," she said.

Reid Sees New Beginning (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

With the clock still running on the 109th Congress, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is looking ahead to the next session, when he expects to have a stronger hand to play and share more in common with his Republican counterpart.

In a wide-ranging interview, Reid said he has high expectations for both the upcoming midterm elections and the 110th Congress itself. He also expressed optimism about working with the man all but certain to be the next Senate Republican leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.).

His outlook is bright enough that Reid, speaking in his Capitol office, said he's planning to talk to McConnell in the coming days about working together to restore a level of comity to the Senate that he believes has been lacking in the reign of Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

"Prior to the Nov. 7 election, I'm going to reach out to Mitch," Reid said. "I think what we should do when we get back here is sit down on a bipartisan basis and see if we can start doing some things like we used to do around here."

Reid's veiled condemnation is a clear indicator of his disdain, not for Frist the man, but rather for the current Majority Leader's style. Frist spent just eight years in the chamber before becoming leader and, unlike many of his predecessors, has shown a penchant for taking risks in passing legislation, often sending controversial measures to the floor without the certainty of having the 60 votes necessary to beat back a filibuster.

"As a person, I like Bill Frist," Reid said. "I think he's in public service for the right reasons. But I felt his lack of an institutional memory, knowledge of the Senate, didn't bode well in my opinion."

While Frist has received mixed marks in his tenure, Reid isn't without his critics, either. As the foremost brake on a Republican-dominated government, he has established a reputation during his two years as Minority Leader for tossing aside bipartisanship as well when it was convenient, preventing bills from coming to the floor and dropping procedural surprises on his colleagues.

Republicans say they are still reeling from Reid's infamous memorandum earlier this year questioning the ethics of 33 GOP Senators. While Reid later apologized, aides and Senators still insist the move went over the line and has not been forgotten.

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said it is easy to blame Frist or McConnell — as the leaders of the majority party — for allowing relations across the aisle to deteriorate. But Thune argued that they have consistently made a good-faith effort to work with Democrats, and Reid holds the power to change things come January.

"It's largely up to him," Thune said. "He's in a position to throw grenades and blow things up or he's in a position to make things work."

DOJ_NMG_0070124

"The issue is not Bill Frist's institutional knowledge or whether or not he could get things done," added a Senate GOP leadership aide. "The issue is that Democrats — since George Bush was elected president and throughout Bill Frist's tenure — never acknowledged Republicans were the governing party."

It remains to be seen if Reid and his fellow Senate Democrats will enjoy a more civil atmosphere with McConnell next session, but at the very least, Reid may find a character connection with the prospective GOP leader.

Both Reid and McConnell are in their fourth term in the Senate, and worked their way up in the chamber as quiet operators known more for their poker faces than their charisma and love of the spotlight. Reid, like McConnell, considers himself a creature of the Senate, and is at times more obsessed with procedure than partisanship.

"I believe he has an institutional understanding — having been here a long time in the Senate," Reid said. "I think that will make my job more meaningful because Sen. Frist did not have an institutional knowledge of the Senate."

By any measure, Reid's first two years as Minority Leader haven't been easy.

"It's a difficult job anytime you have a diverse group like the Democratic Caucus," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), adding that Reid has won his party's respect and admiration across the board.

Minority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.), the chamber's No. 2 Democrat, said Reid, who succeeded then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle (S.D.) after a stunning electoral loss, has certainly brought his own style to the top Democratic post. But Durbin said Reid has proven his worth, deserving credit for stopping Republican efforts to reform Social Security and bar the use of the filibuster on judicial nominations by invoking the so-called nuclear option.

"I'm amazed by how well he brought us together, and how quickly we started working as a unit again," Durbin said.

Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee chairman and one of Reid's closest Senate allies, likened Reid to former President Harry Truman, calling him strong, loyal and direct.

"Nobody can work with the other side of the aisle like Harry Reid," Schumer said. "He knows the rules of the floor, his word is good and he understands you have to be bipartisan to get things done."

Despite his colleagues' confidence, Reid won't grade his own performance to this point, and is even loath to talk about individual successes and failures. But ask the veteran Nevada Democrat about the challenges he's faced, and he doesn't hesitate — even appearing shaken as he discusses what he calls the lowest point in his 20-year Senate career — Frist's threat last year to invoke the nuclear option and force up-or-down votes on judicial nominees. That standoff, Reid said, trumps all other legislative fights he had, on or off the floor.

"That was more than me, more than the Democratic Caucus. I thought that was an attack on our Constitution," Reid said. "I frankly have to tell you that I lost so much respect for my counterparts in the Republican Senate leadership as a result of that. ... I will never, ever forget what they tried to do to our country."

The winner of the nuclear option battle differs depending on whom you ask, but in the end Reid believes the minority came out the victor even though he "gave up some bad judges." In the end, a bipartisan group of moderate Senators dubbed the "Gang of 14" brokered the deal to keep the filibuster option intact while advancing a handful of controversial nominees.

Looking ahead to Nov. 7, Reid predicted that if the election were held today, Democrats would pick up five seats, just shy of the six needed to take control of the chamber. The entire election has turned on the Iraq War, Reid said, and public unrest over the conflict has given voters new reason to look to Democrats, and their agenda, as an alternative.

"I am more optimistic than I was six months ago," Reid said. "I've never said we'd take control of the Senate ... . It's a heavy, heavy lift. We realize that."

But taking a snapshot of today's political landscape, Reid said he believes Senate Democrats have a solid shot to pick up GOP-held seats in Pennsylvania, Missouri, Ohio, Montana and Rhode Island. Three others are potentially in play including Virginia, Tennessee and Arizona, he said.

On the Democratic side, Reid sees few windows for the GOP to knock off incumbents, but he did concede there is at least one vulnerable Democratic Senator this cycle, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.). Menendez, appointed in January to finish out the term of now-Gov. Jon Corzine, is facing an ever-more competitive bid to stave off GOP challenger, state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.

A self-described pessimist, Reid said he refuses to over-hype Democrats chances this November, nor will he entertain the possibility that his party could win the Senate and put him in charge of the chamber. But he does say that if not this cycle, 2008 will be the year of the Senate Democrat.

"We're in really good shape for the next election," Reid said. "We're going to get the majority. It's a question of whether we do it this time or next time."

Next cycle could be Reid's best and worst chapter, given at least six of his Senate Democrats are eyeing a run at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. Keeping his Caucus together will be more of a test in the 110th, but at least for now, Reid says Democrats have rallied as a unit — even with the constant media frenzy surrounding Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

"To this point, to be very honest with you and I say this candidly, I just think it hasn't been a problem," he said.

There has even been talk that Reid has offered up his own job as the Democratic leader to Clinton if she would agree to abandon an anticipated campaign for the White House. Those rumors — perpetuated in some blogs and by some political observers — are "just ridiculous," according to Reid.

"That's one of the most foolish things I've ever heard," Reid said.

Foolish or not, the gossip persists, but Reid insists he will not weigh in on his party's nominating process. Reid says he's talked to each of the would-be presidents about their plans, but none has asked for his endorsement and he isn't going to give it.

"I'm available to whomever wants to talk to me about the Nevada caucuses," Reid said. "But I'm not going to pick sides no matter how I feel personally."

"I don't think it would set well with those people that I don't endorse," Reid added. "I try to be fair to everybody.

Our Pathetic Congress (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

Little has been accomplished, too much will be left hanging and what was done was often done badly.

THE FINAL DAYS of any Congress are never pretty, as lawmakers scramble to finish a string of bills while getting out of town as early as possible to hit the campaign trail. After 37 years in Washington — 18 elections — we are pretty well inured to these shenanigans. But even those of us with strong stomachs are getting indigestion from the farcical end of the 109th Congress, slated for early Saturday.

This Congress hit the ground stumbling and has not lifted itself into an upright position. With few accomplishments and an overloaded agenda, it is set to finish its tenure with the fewest number of days in session in our lifetimes, falling well below 100 days this year.

This new modern record is even more staggering when one realizes that more than 25 of those days had no votes scheduled before 6:30 p.m., making them half- or quarter-days at best. The typical workweek in Congress (when there is a week spent in Washington) starts late Tuesday evening and finishes by noon Thursday. No wonder satirist Mark Russell closes many of his shows by telling his audiences what members of Congress tell their colleagues every Wednesday: "Have a nice weekend."

This part-time Congress has other parallels to the famous "Do-Nothing 80th Congress" that Harry Truman ran against successfully in 1948. The output of the 109th is pathetic measured against its predecessors and considering its priorities, which included a comprehensive immigration bill, tax reform and the research and development tax credit, lobbying and ethics reform, healthcare costs and insurance coverage, trade agreements, procedures for the detention and trial of suspected terrorists, and regulations for the oversight of domestic wiretaps, among many others. With just days to go before Congress adjourns and the fiscal year begins, not a single one of the 11 appropriations bills that make up the range of government programs has been enacted into law.

But the big problem with this Congress is not what it didn't do, it is what it did, and did badly. As of Tuesday, there were three must-pass pieces of legislation pending: defense and homeland security appropriations and the annual Department of Defense authorization. Each year, when the few must-pass bills move forward, there is a major temptation to throw on all kinds of extraneous provisions; when lawmakers can identify a train that is both leaving the station and sure to reach its destination, everyone has baggage they try to toss on board. Each year, responsible party leaders resist most of these measures, to preserve the integrity of the process and to keep shoddy bills with no vetting and no broad support from either being railroaded or inserted surreptitiously.

This year, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) has vowed to protect the defense authorization bill — but House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has other ideas. Hastert says he will kill the bill, doing damage to the Department of Defense and conceivably to troops in the field, unless Warner and his fellow senators cave and tack on an entire federal court security bill and another House anti-immigration bill.

The anti-immigration bill would allow indefinite detention of illegal immigrants protected under political asylum provisions, and it would deny court access to many. Hastert and his fellow House Republicans have refused to say exactly what they will include in the 300-page court security bill, but by most insider accounts, it will include not just commendable, bipartisan provisions to protect judges and law enforcement officials from threats but provisions to federalize the death penalty for murders of law enforcement officials, judicial employees or state and local employees, bypassing the law in states that have no death penalty.

It also reportedly would sharply restrict habeas corpus by, for the first time, singling out a special class of victims (judges and police officers); bypass hearings for juveniles charged with gang-related offenses and automatically have them tried as adults; and allow judges and prosecutors to carry concealed weapons, even where banned by state law.

Most of these measures have had no hearings — or cursory ones — much less debate or votes by the full House or Senate. Many are sharply opposed by states, which complain about the federal government trampling their laws and sovereignty.

IF THIS WERE ONE isolated instance of a Congress pushing through sloppy and ill-considered legislation to score political points before an election, we would wince but move on. But this breach of the normal legislative process is all too typical of today's Congress. Over the last five years, Congress has abandoned the web of rules and norms that have long governed how a bill is considered, how votes take place and how outcomes are decided. The infamous three-hour vote to pass the Medicare prescription drug bill two years ago — a vote supposed to last 15 minutes — stretched from 3 a.m. to 6 a.m. It was held open until the leaders could squeeze out enough votes to make a majority and resulted in several members, including then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, being rebuked by the Ethics Committee. But the truth is, rigging the rules for partisan advantage has become routine.

To be sure, efforts to close off debate and play hardball when votes are tight is not new; Democrats played these games when they were in the majority in the 1980s and early 1990s. But abuses of the regular order that used to be occasional and average — a six on a scale from one to 10 — are now chronic and sometimes hit 11.

The framers wanted Congress to move slowly and deliberately. But today, it is common to spring on the House and Senate a 1,000-page bill that has not been through any vetting process. With little notice and no time for anyone to read the bill, much less absorb or analyze it, with no amendments allowed, the leadership demands a party-line, up-or-down vote. This is a formula for poor oversight and worse law.

This November, will the public demand more from Congress, the first branch of government and the linchpin of American democracy?

Spending Data Going Online With New Law (USAT)

USA Today, September 27, 2006

President Bush signed legislation to create an online database for tracking about $1 trillion in government spending on grants and contracts. The law is intended to prevent wasteful spending by opening the federal budget to greater scrutiny. The law calls for the data to be online by Jan. 1, 2008. Budget information has been available to the public, but the website will make it easier to access. “This legislation will give the American people a new tool to hold their government accountable,” Bush said. Information on earmarks will be “just a few clicks away,” he said. Earmarks are items that lawmakers put into bills to target spending to a company or project in their districts. Citizens Against Government Waste, a taxpayer watchdog group, said such projects in fiscal year 2006 bills cost $29 billion.

Bush demurs on Clinton criticism

President Bush dismissed as “finger-pointing” criticism from former president Bill Clinton that the Bush administration hadn't been vigorous enough in going after al-Qaeda and its leader, Osama bin Laden. “We'll let history judge,” Bush said when asked at a news conference about Clinton's comments. Clinton said on Fox News Sunday that he left the new administration “battle plans” for going into Afghanistan, overthrowing the Taliban and searching for bin Laden. “They did not try” before the 9/11 terrorist attacks, Clinton said. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice disputed his comments, telling the New York Post, “We were not left a comprehensive strategy to fight al-Qaeda.”

Seized-property bill fails in House

The House fell short of the votes needed to pass legislation that would have given people faster access to federal courts when fighting state or local governments that have seized their property. The vote was 234-172 in favor of the bill, but it needed a two-thirds majority under the special rules used to bring the measure to the floor. The vote was largely along party lines: Republicans in favor and Democrats opposed.

New Law To Create Online Budget Database (AP-Y)

President Bush said Tuesday that Americans will now be able to "Google their tax dollars," as he signed a law to create an online database for tracking about $1 trillion in government spending on grants and contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0070127

The law is aimed preventing wasteful spending by opening the federal budget to greater scrutiny. The information is already available, but the Web site would make it easier for those who aren't experts on the process to see how taxpayer dollars are being spent.

"Information on earmarks will no longer be hidden deep in the pages of a federal budget bill, but just a few clicks away," Bush said in a signing ceremony. "This legislation will give the American people a new tool to hold their government accountable for spending decisions. When those decisions are made in broad daylight, they will be wiser and they will be more restrained."

Bush signed the bill in the Old Executive Office Building next to the White House, sitting before lawmakers and Internet bloggers who helped get it through Congress.

Senate leaders had tried to pass the bill in early August but Rep. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., blocked passage by lodging secret "holds" on the bill. The bloggers tracked down those responsible for the delay and the senators let the bill advance under the pressure.

The law calls for the Web site to go online by Jan. 1, 2008. It will list federal grants and contracts greater than $25,000, except for those classified for national security reasons.

"The Web site will allow our citizens to go online, type in the name of any company, association, or state or locality and find out exactly what grants and contracts they've been awarded," Bush said.

"By allowing Americans to Google their tax dollars, this new law will help taxpayers demand greater fiscal discipline," Bush said.

Bush Signs Bill To Create Spending Database (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday signed legislation creating a Web-based searchable database of federal government spending, calling it a first step in making the government more accountable to taxpayers.

The database, championed by bloggers, taxpayer groups and editorial writers nationwide, will allow people to search records for hundreds of billions of dollars worth of federal contracts and grants -- or, as Mr. Bush said, "to Google their tax dollars."

"We spend a lot of time and a lot of effort collecting your money, and we should show the same amount of effort in reporting how we spend it," the president said during a signing ceremony attended by lawmakers, congressional staff, columnists and bloggers.

Written by Sens. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, and Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, the legislation creates a database available to the public through a Web site. It will list every entity receiving federal funds, along with information about the amount and purpose of the spending.

The federal government issues more than $400 billion in grants and $300 billion in contracts each year to businesses, associations and state and local governments.

Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the White House Office of Management and Budget, said the information already exists, but now the administration must collect and compile it into a consistent format.

The law gives the administration until 2008 to have the database in full operation. Mr. Johnson said OMB will consult with key lawmakers and produce a plan for the database at the beginning of next year.

The Bush administration backed the bill during summer negotiations as a tool to improve government transparency and accountability.

A more limited bill sponsored by House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, passed the House in June, but the Coburn-Obama bill was blocked in the Senate by a "secret hold." This Senate tradition allows a single member to obstruct a bill's progress anonymously.

After brief negotiations, the bill passed both chambers of Congress.

Mr. Coburn and Mr. Obama, in a joint statement, gave "all the credit and praise" for the bill's passage to bloggers, editorial writers and citizens. Mr. Johnson said the campaign showed that the public has the power to demand tools for good governance.

"The public have spoken is the lesson here, and when the public speaks, things happen, and when the public wants something to happen, the Congress listens," Mr. Johnson said.

Dow Jones Newswire, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--The Bush Administration wants to "have an impact" on how the next farm bill is written in 2007, U.S. Department of Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said Tuesday.

While acknowledging that Congress will write the next farm bill - a multi-year blueprint for U.S. agriculture policy that includes billions of dollars worth of subsidies - Johanns stressed that it'll be President George W. Bush who either approves or vetoes it.

The USDA will publish its proposal for the next farm bill in January, Johanns told a farm group and reporters over lunch, laying out some of his priorities.

First on his list is the fair distribution of farm subsidies and the reform of "inequities" in the system. Currently, Johanns said, the five crops that get 90% of government subsidies - corn, cotton, wheat, soybeans and rice - only represent 21% of farm cash receipts. Specialty crops, such as fruits and vegetables, are mostly left out.

Government subsidies also must change in order to avoid provoking new complaints by member countries of the World Trade Organization. U.S. farm policy, he said, needs to be "beyond challenge."

Johanns highlighted Brazil's recent successful WTO challenge against U.S. cotton subsidies and stressed the country and others will continue to hammer at U.S. policy.

"We have to be realistic," he said about future challenges.

The Bush administration's positions, though, have placed it at odds with some of the largest farm organizations.

The American Farm Bureau Federation is lobbying Congress to extend the current 2002 farm bill by at least a year instead of overhauling policy in 2007.

The Farm Bureau had been willing to accept changes to the structure of subsidies, but only in return for substantial reductions in foreign tariffs on U.S. agricultural goods. That type of trade had seemed imminent while WTO countries were still negotiating a massive agreement, but those talks broke down and suspended indefinitely in July.

Farm Bureau President Bob Stallman told a gathering of reporters last week: "We're saying we want to extend the major structure and components of this farm bill. For the short term, and until we get a WTO negotiation, for the most part we ought to forgo major changes to our farm policy."

Spellings Back Ideas To Shake Up College (AP)

By Ben Feller, Ap Education Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

Handed a plan to shake up college life in America, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings is endorsing some of its key ideas and promising to get moving on them.

Her overarching theme is to make everything about college — choosing one, affording one, succeeding in one — easier for families. Parents should be able to shop for a college as simply as they shop for a car, she said, with a clear expectation of what they will get.

But higher education in the United States is a diverse field, and finding the will and the money for the agenda may prove difficult.

High on her list is the creation of a massive information system — a way to judge how colleges and universities are doing in helping students succeed. It would require a vast collection of data on students, with a promise that their privacy will be protected.

The Education Department would work with states and colleges to make that happen, Spellings said Monday, commenting for the first time on a national commission's ideas.

The department would then use the data to overhaul its college Web site. The idea is for people to compare one school to another, right down to the typical salaries of graduates.

She also pledged to make applying for financial aid easier and speedier.

"Some of this stuff is so commonsensical, and the urgency is so great," Spellings told The Associated Press. "We need to get going on this."

Spellings outlined her plans ahead of a Tuesday speech at the National Press Club. The Bush administration is getting more aggressive on college issues, a popular area for voters.

Spellings would not commit to one of her advisory panel's most specific ideas: increasing Pell Grants to cover at least 70 percent of in-state tuition costs. Pell Grants, the main form of federal aid for low-income students, now cover less than half the costs.

DOJ_NMG_0070129

The idea would cost billions of dollars, either in new spending or cuts elsewhere.

Spellings said she supports more financial aid for poor families. But she would not get specific, wary of pre-empting President Bush before his next budget plan is released.

Ultimately, Spellings said she embraced recommendations that she can do something about. She said she will work with Congress and states on the others.

One, for example, called for a total restructuring of financial aid. It would mean consolidating dozens of programs that the commission found to be confusing and inefficient.

"I'm for it," Spellings said. "But obviously I understand that Congress needs to weigh in."

Spellings said she also wants to:

_Provide matching federal money to states, colleges and universities that report how well their students are performing. The money will be offered as an incentive for candor.

_Call together groups that accredit universities and try to change the standards upon which schools are judged. The goal would be to put more emphasis on student performance.

_Align high school standards with college work, another commission recommendation. But Spellings wants to do this by extending the No Child Left Behind law into high schools. The Bush administration has been proposing that for two years with little interest from Congress.

Spellings didn't touch other recommendations, based on her prepared comments.

There was no mention of reforming student visa rules for foreign students. Or of leading a national strategy to make learning easier for nontraditional students, especially adults.

The commission, led by investor Charles Miller, called the U.S. higher education system one of the nation's biggest successes. But it also called it complacent and overly expensive, with little accountable for its students and poor access for minority students.

Spellings walked that line, too. She called higher education here the envy of the world, but then said the nation has turned into a leader, not a follower, in education competition.

Miller said he thinks Spellings has responded fairly to his group's recommendations.

"People tend to think you can run over to the Capitol and everyone there gets to decide," Miller said. "We have a national system, but it's not a federal system. She's got the right balance on that. She needs to get help from a lot of others. I think she'll engage them."

Spellings Outlines New Proposals For Higher Education (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Looking to extend its education policies into America's colleges and universities, the Bush administration outlined new proposals Tuesday that some higher-education officials fear will lead to standardized testing at the collegiate level and trample on students' privacy.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said sweeping changes were needed to make higher education more affordable, accountable and understandable to Americans who were shelling out tens of thousands of dollars annually to pursue college degrees.

In a speech at the National Press Club, she laid out a series of proposals developed by her Commission on the Future of U.S. Higher Education, which she appointed a year ago. In concept they'd extend to colleges the principles from President Bush's No Child Left Behind program, which seeks greater accountability from America's elementary schools by requiring them to impose standardized tests and publicize their results.

Even before Spellings spoke, several higher-education officials had blasted the proposals, saying they menace student privacy, potentially offer a one-size-fits-all approach to testing and don't sufficiently address student financial aid.

"It seems to me there is an encroachment here to substitute the judgment on higher-education matters that ought to be made by (college) presidents and faculty rather than legislators and commissions," said David L. Warren, the president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, which represents about 1,000 schools. "There is an ever-increasing reach into the academy."

DOJ_NMG_0070130

Seeking to reassure nervous educators, Spellings said the White House had no interest in federalizing the country's 3,706 public and private two-year and four-year institutions. Instead, Spellings said, she wants a transparent system that makes shopping for colleges and universities as easy as shopping for cars.

"And let me be clear: At the end of it we neither envision, nor want, a national system of higher education," Spellings told the audience, largely educators. "On the contrary, one of the greatest assets of our system is its diversity, something we must protect and preserve."

Many academics question the wisdom and motive for perhaps the most controversial proposal from Spellings' commission: a massive database, even one with requisite privacy measures, to track students as they progress on campus.

The tracking process would be similar to the way students from kindergarten through 12th grade are monitored, Spellings said. Information from the database would help illustrate how colleges and universities are performing.

"Information will not only help with decision-making, it will also hold schools accountable for quality," she said. "As the commission wrote: `Higher education must change from a system primarily based on reputation to one based on performance.' "

Warren and other higher education officials said such a database could intrude on students' privacy.

"They're creating a data system that, if you breach the system, it can track back to the student, that will have everything from the student's life in college, K-through-12 and far beyond," he said.

Spellings also said that America's colleges and universities needed to improve measurements of student performance through testing. The commission's report mentions the Collegiate Learning Assessment, an exam that 134 colleges have used since 2002, and the Measure of Academic Proficiency and Progress as two good gauges of academic progress.

Several colleges and higher education groups say they have no objection to testing if comparisons are made on a peer-school basis. But they fear that the commission is steering toward standardized testing and a uniform comparison of institutions.

Commission member David Ward, the president of the American Council on Education, refused to sign the commission's report, saying it projects a "false sense of crisis" and appears to suggest a "one size fits all approach."

"A drive for such comparisons will inevitably lead to the attempt to adopt a single test," Warren wrote to commission Chairman Charles Miller last month.

Spellings also discussed trying to make college more affordable. But she didn't address the commission's suggestion to increase Pell Grants - the main federal aid for low-income students - to cover at least 70 percent of in-state tuition costs.

Spellings Aims To Impose New Standards On Colleges (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings announced plans to impose tighter standards on colleges and universities, saying the current higher-education system is too unaccountable to students and families who pay the bills.

In a speech addressing recommendations handed over last week by her 19-member Commission on the Future of Higher Education, Ms. Spellings called for making the college process simpler for families, from scrapping the current financial-aid system to creating a database of student information, and making colleges more accountable for the services they provide. That causes some in the higher-education community to bristle. "We're perplexed when she says there's not much information on accountability," says David Warren, president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities. "Our Web sites are overflowing with information."

Ms. Spellings said her department would implement some recommendations on its own and work with Congress on making others reality. But her actions are prompting questions about the scope of a federal department's authority over the decentralized and largely autonomous higher-education system.

"For most families, this is one of the most expensive investments we make," she said. "Yet there is little to no information on why costs are so high and what we're getting in return." She said she wants to create a database of individual student data to allow parents and policy makers to evaluate the performance of institutions. The commission has said that personal information such as names and Social Security numbers would be protected.

The plan has privacy advocates concerned, following revelations several weeks ago that the Education Department shared information on student financial-aid applicants with the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of the government's counterterrorism work.

Ms. Spellings also said she wants to encourage "outcome" testing to understand what students get out of school. She said she wants matching funds provided to colleges, universities and states that collect and publicly report these outcomes, and that the results should be part of the accreditation system of higher education.

Charles Miller, who chaired the advisory commission, has said he envisions an approach that wouldn't be so prescriptive as to require schools to use one particular test. That said, the panel's report points to such examples as the Collegiate Learning

Assessment, used by more than 100 colleges, and the Measure of Academic Proficiency and Progress, which measures college-level reading, math, writing and critical thinking, and which 350 colleges use for their own self-assessment or accreditation. (The CLA is owned by New York nonprofit Council for Aid to Education, and the MAPP test is owned by the nonprofit Educational Testing Service, Princeton, N.J.)

The plan may prompt conflict with Congress, where members suggest it exceeds the Education Department's powers. Recently, the department sought to use a regulatory process to propose some rules arising out of the commission's report. The process, called "negotiated rulemaking," typically comes after legislation is passed, and prompted a letter to Ms. Spellings from leaders of the Senate education panel. "The draft recommendations...are broad and will likely require legislative action before they could be appropriately included in regulations," read the letter.

In her response to the senators, she said she had "no intention" of acting on any proposals that require statutory changes.

Secretary Vows To Improve Results Of Higher Education (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Saying she hoped to jolt American higher education out of a dangerous complacency, Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings vowed Tuesday to help finance state universities that administer standardized tests, establish a national database to track students' progress toward a degree and cut the red tape surrounding federal student aid.

In a speech, Ms. Spellings emphasized those and a few other measures from among dozens of recommendations issued recently by a federal panel, the Commission on the Future of Higher Education.

"This is the beginning of a process of long-overdue reform," Ms. Spellings told a crowd of university presidents, business executives, lobbyists and journalists in a speech that her department billed as one in which she would outline her agenda for change at the nation's colleges and universities.

The commission, convened by Ms. Spellings, completed work in August on a report that warned that American universities, while still the finest in the world, were losing their edge against heightened global competition.

In one of its most highly debated recommendations, the report called on public universities to measure learning with standardized tests, and listed two by name: the Collegiate Learning Assessment and the Measure of Academic Proficiency and Progress. During the panel's deliberations, many educators opposed the testing proposal, calling it misguided for the federal government to require the nation's more than 3,000 colleges, universities and trade schools to test and compare learning outcomes among such disparate students as physics scholars at Caltech and dance majors at Juilliard.

In her speech, Ms. Spellings moved forward with the testing proposal, but cautiously.

"No current ranking system of colleges and universities directly measures the most critical point, student performance and learning," she said. "We absolutely should. And Action 4 under my plan will provide matching funds to colleges and universities and states that collect and publicly report student learning outcomes."

In response to a question after her speech, Ms. Spellings said, "Nobody envisions a one-size-fits-all test of student ability."

David Ward, president of the American Council on Education, the largest association of colleges and universities, expressed approval for Ms. Spellings's proposal to provide federal matching money to institutions that already, voluntarily, are experimenting with standardized testing. Mr. Ward declined last month to sign the panel's report because, among other concerns, he said it could lead to government-imposed testing.

"I thought today's speech was very important for addressing anxieties," he said. "Now I can see she's not going to rush into some simple-minded solutions. I feel much better."

Ms. Spellings established the 19-member panel last year, including current and former administrators and faculty members from large research universities, community colleges, liberal arts colleges and for-profit trade schools as well as executives from Boeing, I.B.M. and other corporations. She asked them to examine the accessibility, affordability and accountability of the nation's colleges and universities.

In its final report, the commission recommended that the entire federal student aid system, which has 17 programs, be scrapped in favor of one that is more user-friendly.

Ms. Spellings said Tuesday that only Congress could carry out such a fundamental overhaul. But she said the department would seek to streamline the process immediately and cut the application time for federal loans and grants in half. She offered few specifics, however.

At the insistence of former Gov. James B. Hunt Jr. of North Carolina, the panel included in its final report a recommendation for bolstering the program of Pell Grants, which are the basic building block of federal aid, by making them cover a larger percentage of public college tuition. One university group estimated recently that that proposal could cost the nation $9 billion to $12 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0070132

Ms. Spellings did not mention that proposal on Tuesday. But Mr. Hunt said she told him and other commission members in a conference call on Tuesday that she was "working with the Office of Management and Budget to see what could be done."

"So I think she's given a strong commitment," Mr. Hunt said.

Ms. Spellings also promised action on Tuesday on another commission recommendation: that the Education Department collect student data from colleges and universities and use it to create a "higher education information system."

Such a federal data system, she said, could provide new consumer-friendly information to parents and students looking for the right college. It could also be used to hold colleges and universities accountable for the number of students that they graduate and other measures of institutional performance, she said.

Ms. Spellings suggested that the higher education establishment would consider her proposals to be bitter medicine.

"After some of what I've said today, commencement speaker invitations may suddenly get lost in the mail," she said.

But the reaction from several university presidents and lobbyists who had previously expressed fears that the commission's work would bring new federal interference in higher education, seemed generally to be one of relief.

Richard Vedder, an Ohio University economist, who also served on the panel and had hoped it would lead to far-reaching measures to control university costs, said on Tuesday that he worried that the panel's year of study and hearings had produced a fog of rhetoric and little else.

"I'm concerned with a certain vagueness to it all at this point," Dr. Vedder said. "There's been a lot of platitudes — 'increase affordability, control costs' — but we've not come up with much that's specific about how to do that."

Spellings Calls For Tracking Of Students' Performance (WP)

By Lois Romano, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

College Accountability Needed, Education Chief Says

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called yesterday for greater fiscal and academic accountability in higher education and endorsed a controversial plan to keep long-term records on students that would track performance from the time they enter the system in grade school to show how their educations progress.

Responding to the final report from her Commission on the Future of Higher Education, Spellings also implored schools to hold costs down for low-income students. She pledged to seek more financial aid for students but largely sidestepped the commission's bold proposal for a substantial increase in need-based Pell Grants.

The commission, which Spellings appointed, in general painted a bleak picture of a prohibitively expensive higher education system that serves the wealthy and whose schools are not held accountable for student performance.

The panel proposed that college students undergo testing to ensure that the schools are meeting their academic promises and goals, the results of which would be part of a public database that would help students and parents assess and choose schools. Spellings made the point that few objective measures for judging the quality of a school are available to parents.

At the commission's recommendation, Spellings is offering financial incentives to schools that voluntarily report student assessments.

"Our universities are known as the best in the world, and a lot of people will tell you things are going just fine," she said in a speech at the National Press Club. "But when 90 percent of the fastest-growing jobs require postsecondary education, and fewer and fewer Americans are getting one, are we satisfied with just fine?"

The commission recommended increasing the value of Pell Grants to cover 70 percent of the average in-state tuition at public colleges; the grants now cover only 48 percent of tuition. Spellings did call for a complete overhaul and streamlining of the unwieldy college aid system and acknowledged that more money is needed, but she stopped short of endorsing increases in Pell Grants.

David L. Warren, president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, said: "I found that quite remarkable, because it was the key recommendation from the commission. Yet she endorsed a unit record database, which would be enormously expensive to implement."

The association and other school groups oppose a data collecting system that would track individual students, because they worry it would infringe on privacy. But Warren acknowledged that some form of data collecting is needed to improve the system.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the senior Democrat on the education committee, criticized Spellings for not embracing the Pell Grant proposal and for not addressing the massive student loan industry, which he called "the most troubling aspect of higher education today."

Some advocacy groups complained that Spellings put too much of the blame for high costs on schools and not enough on government. "State support is the lowest it's been in 25 years, and public colleges are turning to parents to bridge the gap," said Lawrence Gold, director of higher education for the American Federation of Teachers.

Still others expressed concern about Spellings's suggestion to increase use of adjunct professors over tenured teachers to cut costs.

"Although I agree with the secretary that more research is needed on the teaching effectiveness of adjunct professors, I strongly believe that we will not dramatically improve the quality of postsecondary education with a part-time teaching force," Lee S. Shulman, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, wrote in an e-mail.

Educators have also balked at the commission's call for colleges to conduct student assessments and make them public, saying it would be virtually impossible to develop a uniform national academic measure because of the many diverse subject disciplines and concentrations.

But Mark G. Yudof, chancellor of the University of Texas system, argued that there should be "as much disclosure as possible, as much data as possible."

In an interview with Washington Post editors and reporters yesterday, Yudof said school presidents who oppose academic assessments "are wrong."

"I think they're dead wrong to say [higher education is] too ephemeral," he said. "I think this is going to happen with or without" them.

College Overhaul Called 'overdue' (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called Tuesday for greater accountability by colleges and universities, including the creation of a national database to track how well students learn.

She also called for an overhaul of the financial aid process and an increase in need-based aid.

Spellings' plans are in response to recommendations by a 19-member commission she created last year about the future of U.S. higher education. The commission said colleges and universities have slipped into "unwarranted complacency" and that higher education's financing system is "increasingly dysfunctional."

"This is the beginning of a process of long-overdue reform," she said. "Over the years, we've invested tens of billions of dollars in taxpayer money and just hoped for the best. We deserve better."

The development of a database has been among the commission's most controversial proposals, mostly because of concerns about student privacy.

Known as a "unit record" system, it would track the progress of individual — but unidentified — students over time as a way to better assess and compare the educational performance of institutions.

Although President Bush said in a statement that he strongly supports "the thrust of this important report," Spellings will need approval from Congress to implement the database, and she could face an uphill battle. The House passed a bill in March that would prohibit a "unit record" system. Buck McKeon, R-Calif., chairman of the House Education Committee, didn't address the database question in his response Tuesday to Spellings' speech but said, "As she and I have discussed, I expect the department to work cooperatively with Congress."

Proponents of a database that tracks students, including the State Higher Education Executive Officers, say federal data on graduation rates gives an inaccurate picture because it doesn't account for transfers to other schools. And though many schools keep their own records, they don't necessarily make the data public. About 35 states have systems in place, but they operate as "islands unto themselves," Spellings said.

Spellings said her plan would make information available to parents, policymakers and others in an easy-to-understand format. Data could include students' majors, costs after student aid and how quickly they graduate. To protect privacy, the commission recommended that the database use anonymous identification numbers, not Social Security numbers.

Estimates for the federal cost to create the system infrastructure range from $10 million to more than $100 million, says the American Council on Education, an umbrella group for higher education. That doesn't account for costs to states or to institutions.

Leaders of a number of higher-education groups say they support such a database. But "the devil is in the details," said Robert Berdahl, president of the Association of American Universities, which represents large research universities.

Spellings offered few details about the database Tuesday but told commission members Monday that she was open to testing such a database as a pilot project, said David Ward, president of the American Council on Education. Education officials said the department would begin with a voluntary, opt-in system for states and institutions.

Ward was the one commission member who did not sign the report, arguing that the commission was looking for "quick solutions." But because Spellings said she would work with higher-education groups, he said, "my anxieties were actually substantially reduced."

Lee Shulman, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, said in an e-mail that aside from the privacy question, there has been "far too little discussion of whether such a (database) system is worth creating … if the data it records is not worth using. Really poor and misleading data is far more dangerous than no data at all."

Spellings Presses U.S. Colleges To Prove Their Worth (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

Sept. 26 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called on the nation's 3,700 colleges to cut costs while doing a better job of proving how well they teach.

Spellings, responding to the final report of her yearlong Commission on the Future of Higher Education, also promised to ask Congress for more aid for low-income students, without endorsing the panel's specific suggestion of a 50 percent increase.

The Bush administration formed the commission with the hope of making U.S. higher education more affordable and more capable of providing the workers, especially in science fields, seen as necessary to maintaining U.S. economic competitiveness.

``Our universities are known as the best in the world, and a lot of people will tell you things are going just fine," Spellings said in remarks prepared for delivery today in Washington. ``But when 90 percent of the fastest-growing jobs require post-secondary education, and fewer and fewer Americans are getting one, are we satisfied with `just' fine?"

The commission, in one of its most specific and costly recommendations, suggested Congress increase the value of the Pell Grant, the main federal grant for low-income students, to cover 70 percent of the average in-state tuition at public four- year colleges, up from 48 percent in the 2004-05 school year.

It offered that proposal on the condition that college tuition not rise faster than the growth in median family income.

More Aid Urged

Spellings said Congress ``must increase need-based aid," while warning it would make no difference to students ``if states and institutions don't do their part to keep costs in line."

Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, the top-ranking Democrat on the Senate's Education Committee, criticized Spellings for failing to propose a Pell Grant increase and for failing to address problems with the student loan industry, which he called ``the most troubling aspect of higher education today."

``That system squanders billions each year to provide corporate welfare to big lenders, rather than serving the best interests of our students," Kennedy said in a statement.

The commission also urged colleges take new steps to measure student performance and make that information publicly available as a means for prospective students and others to compare schools. In addition, it endorsed administration suggestions for a computerized system of tracking students over their lifetimes, another means of getting better measures of college performance.

Funds for Database

Spellings today proposed providing matching funds to states and institutions ``that collect and publicly report student learning outcomes," without elaborating in her prepared remarks.

The proposal for a computer database to track students has created controversy among universities, with some raising privacy concerns and others arguing they are shortchanged by current estimates of graduation rates.

A group of six associations representing U.S. universities, announcing steps they would take in response to the commission report, promised last week they would find a way to create the database.

``We are collectively holding hands on this issue," said David Warren, president of National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, which represents private schools including all Ivy League colleges and has been a leading opponent of the idea.

Hoping for Accountability

Spellings, in the prepared text of her address today at the National Press Club, said she hopes to bring to colleges the same principles of accountability that the ``No Child Left Behind" law has brought to elementary and secondary schools.

DOJ_NMG_0070135

Colleges, however, have resisted the idea of standardized tests, saying school provides an experience too diverse to be measured by any uniform means. Both the commission and the university associations instead have made general references to the need for colleges to show more ``accountability."

Spellings, whose daughter attends Davidson College in North Carolina, said she wants prospective students and their families to have a far better sense of their options when choosing colleges.

``I, too, experienced the confusion and frustration many parents face with the college selection process," she said. ``I found it almost impossible to get my questions answered, and I'm the Secretary of Education!"

Spellings also endorsed commission suggestions to simplify the process of applying apply for federal financial aid, to improve high school programs that prepare students for college and to improve procedures for accrediting colleges.

Problem Areas Seen

More specific suggestions, such as the proposed Pell Grant increase, may be more difficult to implement, said Becky Timmons, director of government relations at the American Council of Education, which represents about 1,800 U.S. colleges.

The commission's proposed increase to 70 percent of in-state tuition would cost taxpayers almost $9 billion a year, as the maximum Pell Grant rises to $6,150 and the average grant reaches $3,845, up from the current maximum of $4,050 and average of $2,445, Timmons said.

That increased cost would become more than $10 billion a year if colleges realize the 7.5 percent increase in enrollment that the Education Department expects between 2006 and 2011, Timmons said in an analysis prepared by her association.

Congress has failed so far so far this year to act on a $10 billion-a-year plan backed by President George W. Bush, lawmakers from both parties and U.S. corporate leaders aimed at increasing U.S. economic competitiveness through programs such as research- related tax breaks and scholarships for science students.

A coalition of lawmakers will introduce a new version of that plan today, hoping for passage before Congress adjourns, said Jack Finn, spokesman for Senator John Ensign, a Republican of Nevada. ``It's important to get something done this year," Finn said.

Swagel Nominated To Treasury Post (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The White House nominated Phillip Swagel, an economist at the American Enterprise Institute, to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for economic policy.

Mr. Swagel, a former chief of staff at the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, was tapped as part of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's personnel makeover. The former Goldman Sachs chief executive has made a series of hires since taking Treasury's reins July 10, including former Goldman colleague Robert Steel, who could be confirmed by the Senate as early as this week to be Treasury's top financial policy adviser.

Report Criticizes Pentagon's New Travel Booking System (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

After a decade and more than $500 million in costs, the Defense Department's new travel booking system doesn't work, it doesn't save money, and most staff members don't use it, a new study says.

A Government Accountability Office report released yesterday slams the Northrop Grumman-designed Defense Travel System and calls Pentagon estimates of usage and cost savings into serious question. So poor is the Pentagon's analysis of the system's merits, the report says, that defense officials offered a credit card company news release as sole proof for its claim that the system saves millions of dollars each year.

"We requested, but the [Pentagon] could not provide, any analysis of travel data to support the assertion" of savings, the report says. Further, it says, "The department does not have reasonable [data] to measure the extent to which DTS is actually being used."

This is the second GAO report on the travel system, whose delays and cost overruns have made it subject to repeated attempts in Congress to kill it. Launched in 1998, the system was supposed to have been fully operational four years ago, yet as of this year it was difficult to tell who was actually using it, the report says.

Northrop Grumman spokeswoman Janis Lamar said the company has not yet had time to review the report. But she said, "We built a great system, and it's saving money." She said the system has been deployed to all 270 major military installations and is being used today by over 50,000 personnel on a daily basis.

"It's been a pig," said Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs subcommittee on federal financial management, who is trying to kill the travel system contract.

The Defense Department has spent more than $500 million on the program since 1998, an overrun of about $200 million, according to figures compiled by Congress from GAO and Defense Department reports.

"It's one big mistake after another . . . that Congress hasn't paid attention to because of very effective lobbying by the contractor," Coburn said. Los Angeles-based Northrop Grumman has spent $72 million in federal lobbying efforts since 1998, Political Money Line reported, and contributed $6.2 million to federal candidates and parties over the past 10 years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Northrop "ought to give some of our money back," Coburn said. "Even if [the system] rolls out, it's never going to pay for itself. It doesn't even get the best fare."

The system was born of a 1995 Pentagon task force recommendation to replace the department's outmoded, chaotic travel procedures with one standardized system for booking official travel, from airlines to hotels. But technical problems have foiled efforts to coax employees to use it.

The Pentagon estimates that the system will save $54 million a year, mostly by automating work once handled by employees. The report calls that estimate "unrealistic," partly because staff would be reassigned, but mostly, because the Pentagon could provide no backup for its claims.

Asked for proof that its system would save $31 million yearly in personnel costs, the Pentagon provided a copy of an American Express news release that discussed savings achieved through a completely different booking system, in a private company.

In a written response to the report, Undersecretary of Defense David S.C. Chu strongly objected to criticism of the Pentagon's estimates of personnel cost savings. "The Department is facing an enormous challenge and must successfully prosecute today's war while still making investments that safeguard the future," he wrote.

"It's time to close this program down," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), who chairs the Senate's Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee's investigations panel, which held a hearing last year on the bill.

"DOD has spent more than 500 million of American taxpayers' dollars on a travel system that was supposed to save money . . . It's an unconscionable waste."

In the Loop (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

RHIP, Mr. VP

Health and safety rules in Washington have for years warned residents never to get between Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and a camera.

There may now be a new rule: Never get in the way of President Bush heading for his soft down pillow.

Seems Vice President Cheney , in Grand Rapids, Mich., on Monday, landed at Andrews Air Force Base at 8:10 p.m. -- a full two minutes before Air Force One touched down.

But being president means never having to wait your turn. So Bush bounded down the steps, our colleague Peter Baker reports, and onto his chopper before Cheney's entourage even realized what was happening. Marine One quickly powered up, forcing Marine Two to sit on the tarmac until the top bird lifted off.

Marine Two waited barely a minute longer before taking off, producing a rare moment when both presidential and vice presidential helicopters were in the air, flying almost in tandem back into the city.

Cheney may have been disoriented after engaging in an unusual activity -- actually hanging with reporters on his plane during a "surprise" celebration of his 100th fundraiser this election cycle. His staff got a cake marked "100 -- on to victory," and when everyone was in place, summoned the veep from his private cabin to party.

He cut one piece of cake and stayed for a minute or so. A reporter asked which of the 100 was the most memorable. Cheney thought for a moment and said: "Stuff from 30 years ago is easier to remember. The rest is a blur." Then he returned to his cabin.

Unclear if he had any cake, but, if he did, might have slowed him on the tarmac.

Hill Salary Site Proves Too Big A Hit (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0070137

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

A Web site documenting the salaries of the roughly 20,000 Capitol Hill employees went live last week -- and almost as soon came crashing down.

No, it didn't get shut down by a judge's order claiming that private information had been leaked. By law, the salaries of Hill staffers have long been available in thick books in the offices of the House and Senate clerks. The site came down because of the rush of traffic from computers housed in Congress -- and elsewhere.

It was a sign of the intense interest percolating on Capitol Hill and political blogs about the just-launched LegiStorm (http://www.legistorm.com). The site quickly went back online, offering a window for Hill staff and strangers alike into what everyone -- from senior senators' chiefs of staff to the House barber -- earns per year. It's popular trivia that the president earns $400,000 per year and representatives and senators earn about $160,000 per year, but the information on staff salaries hasn't been so publicly available before.

"These kinds of records . . . were the bread and butter of reporting on the Hill for me," said Jock Friedly, a former Capitol Hill reporter who is behind LegiStorm. "I thought it was about time it was put on the Web."

Friedly said information kept in obscure House and Senate offices wasn't helpful to citizens or reporters doing research on Congress from outside Washington. "The goal is simply to make Congress a little more transparent." he said. Friedly, who runs a business selling government documents, said the site has only a few text advertisements so far.

The LegiStorm data show that slightly more than 200 Senate staffers earn $150,000 per year. Close to 300 House staffers make that amount, many of them on the House Appropriations Committee. Most employees seem to make about $50,000 to $60,000 per year. Many paid interns -- which Hill aides often start their careers as -- take home barely $200 per month.

"I've heard some people say they're gong to use this information as leverage," said a House staffer who has worked on the Hill for six years. "There's no uniformity to what people make."

Another House aide said he wished the site was available when he was negotiating his job three years ago. "Negotiating a salary for a new job is never a totally comfortable process, and this information would certainly give you a leg up as a job candidate," the aide said.

Some Hill staffers expressed gripes about LegiStorm. Because salaries are reported in quarterly increments, they might contain a year-end bonus that would overstate the aide's regular income.

Some staff members who work in district offices outside Washington were worried that their neighbors would take a look at their salaries, a piece of information not publicly available for most of the nation's workers, said Rick Shapiro, executive director of the Congressional Management Foundation, which consults with House and Senate offices on effective management strategies.

"I was concerned that having the American public having ready access to what everybody in Congress would make would lead to bashing people when you don't understand what the cost of living in Washington, D.C., is," Shapiro said. "If you're from North Dakota or other areas where the cost of living is much smaller, you might look at salaries and say this is outrageous."

The Threat To Judicial Independence (WSJ)

By Sandra Day O'Connor

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

In November, South Dakotans will vote on a state constitutional amendment being advocated by a national group called "JAIL 4 Judges." If the amendment passes, it would eliminate judicial immunity, and enable a special grand jury to censure judges for their official legal determinations. Although the amendment's supporters claim they seek a "judicial accountability initiative law" (JAIL), they aspire to something far more sinister -- judicial intimidation. Indeed, the national Web site of JAIL 4 Judges boasts with striking candor that the organization "has that intimidation factor flowing through the judicial system."

It is tempting to dismiss this proposed amendment as merely an isolated bout of anti-judge angst. But while the JAIL 4 Judges initiative is unusually venomous, it is far from alone in expressing skepticism of the judiciary. In addition to South Dakota, this election cycle has witnessed efforts in at least three other states that are designed to rein in judges who have supposedly "run amok."

Not to be completely outdone, Congress also has engaged in recent efforts to police the judiciary. Seeking to constrain the legal sources that are available to judges, some members of Congress have advocated measures that would forbid judges from citing foreign law when they are interpreting the Constitution. In addition, bills have been introduced in both houses of Congress supporting the creation of an inspector general to investigate and monitor the federal bench. Finally, the House of Representatives passed legislation over the summer that would prohibit the Supreme Court from considering whether the Pledge of Allegiance's inclusion of the words "under God" violates the First Amendment. * * *

Directing anger toward judges enjoys a long -- if not exactly venerable -- tradition in our nation. President Thomas Jefferson, for instance, was a particularly spirited antagonist of judges appointed by the Federalists. Moreover, President Franklin D. Roosevelt sought to increase the number of Supreme Court justices because the court invalidated several pieces of New Deal legislation. And I can distinctly remember seeing lawns and highways across the country that featured signs demanding the impeachment of Chief Justice Earl Warren.

But while scorn for certain judges is not an altogether new phenomenon, the breadth and intensity of rage currently being leveled at the judiciary may be unmatched in American history. The ubiquitous "activist judges" who "legislate from the bench" have become central villains on today's domestic political landscape. Elected officials routinely score cheap points by railing against the "elitist judges," who are purported to be of touch with ordinary citizens and their values. Several jeremiads are published every year warning of the dangers of judicial supremacy and judicial tyranny. Though these attacks generally emit more heat than light, using judges as punching bags presents a grave threat to the independent judiciary.

Troublingly, attacks on the judiciary are now being launched by judges themselves. Earlier this year, Alabama Supreme Court Justice Tom Parker excoriated his colleagues for faithfully applying the Supreme Court's precedent in Roper v. Simmons, which prohibited imposition of the death penalty for crimes committed by minors. Offering a bold reinterpretation of the Constitution's supremacy clause, Justice Parker advised state judges to avoid following Supreme Court opinions "simply because they are 'precedents.'" Justice Parker supported his criticism of "activist federal judges" by asserting that "the liberals on the U.S. Supreme Court . . . look down on the pro-family policies, Southern heritage, evangelical Christianity, and other blessings of our great state."

It should come as no surprise that the increased scapegoating of the judiciary has coincided with an increase in anger directed toward individual judges. In the last decade, threats and inappropriate communications directed toward the federal bench have more than quadrupled. According to the U.S. Marshals Service, complaints about such behavior were being logged at a record-setting pace this year. And while it is encouraging that Congress recently set aside funds for federal judges to have home security systems installed, it is deeply dispiriting that the demand for the systems among the judges was so high. Judge David B. Sentelle of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit was quite right when he observed, "Judges must be free to make judicial decisions without the fear of physical harm to themselves or to members of their families."

Given the escalating criticism that is leveled at judges, it seems appropriate to bear in mind the reasons that the Framers initially established an independent judicial branch. In Federalist No. 78, Alexander Hamilton explained why, in our constitutional system, "the complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential." Hamilton contended that the judiciary needed to be distinct from the legislative and executive branches because that was the best way to guarantee "a steady, upright, and impartial administration of the laws." Hamilton also believed that judicial independence was necessary in order to safeguard against "injury of the private rights of particular classes of citizens, by unjust and partial laws." It is well worth remembering that, far more often than not in modern times, the judiciary has admirably performed these two vital tasks: checking the other two branches and protecting minority rights.

An independent judiciary does not mean, of course, that it is somehow improper to criticize judicial decisions. To the contrary, it is a healthy sign for democracy that the public is engaged with the workings of the judicial system. Judges can -- and do -- sometimes render erroneous decisions, but that is why appeals are allowed to higher courts. Moreover, judges can be -- and are -- subjected to discipline for legitimate reasons. Members of the judiciary cannot sincerely believe that they should be regarded as above the very laws that they are charged with interpreting. Ours is, after all, a nation of laws, not men -- or even women.

Nonetheless, we must be more vigilant in making sure that criticism does not cross over into intimidation. Judges and lawyers certainly play essential roles in opposing attacks on the judiciary. Indeed, later this week, I -- along with Justice Stephen Breyer -- am co-chairing a conference on judicial independence at Georgetown University Law Center. But the legal community needs help from other sectors of society to ensure that the current mood of cynicism does not end up compromising the rule of law. This includes members of the business community. Adam Smith, writing in "The Wealth of Nations," well understood the importance of an independent judiciary: "[U]pon the impartial administration of justice depends the liberty of every individual, the sense which he has of his own security." Without judicial independence, Smith warned, "it is scarce[ly] possible that justice should not frequently be sacrificed to what is vulgarly called politics."

More broadly, of course, all of society has a keen interest in countering threats to judicial independence. Judges who are afraid -- whether they fear for their jobs or fear for their lives -- cannot adequately fulfill the considerable responsibilities that the position demands. In these challenging and difficult times, we must recommit ourselves to maintaining the independent judiciary that the Framers sought to establish.

Help Youths In Need (WT)

By Karen Burke Morison

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Congress has an opportunity to fix some costly problems that affect the hundreds of federal programs that target disadvantaged youth, by passing the Federal Youth Coordination Act.

These problems were aptly identified by the White House Task Force for Disadvantaged Youth, a group created by President Bush in late 2002. The president directed the group of 12 top federal officials to develop a complete picture of what the federal government was doing for disadvantaged youth and to figure out how it could be done better.

The task force, led by presidential policy advisers Margaret Spellings and John Bridgeland, reported that there were more than 300 such programs scattered throughout 12 agencies. They also found the total spending for these programs was significant ($223.5 billion in fiscal 2003), about one-tenth of the federal budget.

Big government spending often passes for compassion, but for that to be accurate, the programs need to work. But policy-makers seemed content to create these programs and keep them operating. Their effectiveness rarely entered the discussion.

Each department has also allowed "mission creep" to invade, leaving the programs far afield from their original congressional mandates. The task force determined that the program activities were dictated by their enabling statutes only 30 percent of the time. The agencies themselves accounted for the other 70 percent of the spending decisions, thanks to Congress' latest attempt to target the latest urgent problem with a broadly worded mandate, leaving the important details to the bureaucracy. Like a newly licensed driver with gas, a credit card and the car keys, the bureaucracy ran with this discretion, freely experimenting with this approach and that methodology, but rarely stopping to ask whether they were producing any measurable results. And so the number of programs, the amounts spent and the types of services offered grew and spread throughout government.

How this happened is not a mystery. The temptation arises in every administration as bureaucrats strive to show how their programs might be supportive of and relevant to the initiative du jour coming from whomever occupies the White House or secretary's office. This helps them avoid severe reductions, the redirection of their funds elsewhere or receiving the ax. Contrary to conservatives' beliefs that the bureaucracy is unresponsive, the task force found them to be almost overly so.

The reality of this system is a mess. Over time, with this carte-blanche authority, the agencies began offering services in which they had no expertise. For example, the Departments of Defense and Agriculture are operating programs with pregnancy-prevention services. Health and Human Services offers academic services and job-training programs. Housing and Urban Development is running a youth-employment program. Meanwhile, pretty much everyone is funding their own substance-abuse prevention programs. These problems exist in every youth-serving agency.

A considerable bipartisan consensus has developed in support of the final report of the task force, with almost 350 groups from around the country mobilizing to express their support for a "Youth Initiative" to be established within the White House, one of the report's key recommendations. The new office (or coordinating council) would develop and coordinate policy, maximize interagency collaboration to use the significant expertise within specific agencies, coordinate federal research (the results of which are almost never fed back into future programs), and identify and elevate models that work. With this process, ineffective and duplicative programs could be identified and eliminated, and money could be saved.

Coordination should be mandatory with children's programs, because it's about what services an agency offers as well as who receives them. So while HHS is designed to house health and welfare programs, and Education has academic programs, both departments lay claim to serving migrant youth. And foster kids. And kids in the juvenile justice system. And Indian youth. And so on. Yet the agencies almost never talk to each other, nor are they fully aware of what the others are doing. Given this environment, it would be surprising if there were not any duplication, overlap and gaps in communication.

The Federal Youth Coordination Act (H.R. 856/S. 409) was passed by the House in late 2005 with a strong bipartisan majority. But the bill, which recently received the endorsement of the American Bar Association, has been stalled in the Senate. There is no good reason not to pass this bill, which could put some sanity into the process.

Cheaper Oil Lifts US Consumer Confidence (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070140

US consumer confidence recovered from August's nine-month low to post a stronger than expected gain this month as prices at petrol pumps fell sharply.

The consumer confidence index rose to 104.5, up from 100.2 in August. September's data came in above economists' expectations, according to Bloomberg, that this month's figure would stand at 103.

Consumers told researchers that there were more jobs available and that they expected to earn more in the coming months.

"The improvement is not a big surprise when placed in the context of the sharp slippage in gas prices at the pump recently," said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Oil prices reached an all time high in July and continued at a very high level through much of August. But on Tuesday futures in Brent crude hit their lowest level in six months.

"If there is any disappointing signal, it is tucked away in the plans to buy within 6 months section, where plans to buy homes new or lived in look very soft," Mr Ruskin said.

The slowdown in the housing market is continuing; on Monday data showed that prices of homes already built fell for the first time in 11 years.

The Federal Reserve has said that it decided to stop raising interest rates partly because it thought a correction in housing markets would help slow growth and bring down inflation.

But analysts said that, as yet, falling demand for new and lived-in housing and some evidence of price falls have failed to seriously effect the US economy.

"Though today's reported confidence bounce was hardly a surprise, it adds to the evidence that housing sector weakness is at least thus far still contained to this narrow sector," said Mike Englund of Action Economics. "If the drop in real estate market prospects is to have a psychological impact on consumer spending, then presumably it should similarly impact confidence."

The authors of the survey said that indications of a more buoyant mood among consumers would nevertheless have relatively little impact.

"Even though consumers' concerns have eased, there is little to suggest a significant change in economic activity as we enter the final quarter of 2006," said Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board Consumer Research Center.

Consumer Confidence Rebounds Amid Declines In Gasoline Prices (WSJ)

By John McAuley

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- U.S. consumer confidence rebounded solidly in September although it failed to regain all of the ground lost in August, as consumers responded favorably to the decline in gasoline prices, a report released Tuesday indicated.

The Conference Board, a private research group, said its index of consumer confidence for September rose to 104.5 compared with the upward-revised 100.2 seen in August. The August number stood at 99.6 before the revision. The current month's reading was just above economists' expectations for a reading of 104.0, according to a survey of 23 economists conducted by Dow Jones Newswires.

"A more favorable assessment of current conditions coupled with a less pessimistic short-term outlook boosted consumer confidence this month," said Lynn Franco, who directed the survey. "However, even though consumers' concerns have eased, there is little to suggest a significant change in economic activity as we enter the final quarter of 2006."

The present situation index, a gauge of consumers' assessment of current economic conditions, rose to 127.7 from 123.9 the prior month. Consumer expectations for the state of economic activity over the next six months increased to 89.0 from 84.4 in August.

The Conference Board noted in the report that respondents who assess economic conditions as "good" increased to 27.4% in September from 26.2%, while those who termed current conditions as "bad" slipped to 15.4% from the 16.6% who held that view in August.

In a welcome development, consumers' outlook for the economy's performance over the next six months also edged higher in September. Those expecting economic conditions to worsen slipped to 10.6% from 12.9% in August, while those expecting improved business conditions increased to 16.3% from 16.2%.

The report noted that the outlook for labor market conditions was also a bit more favorable. Consumers expecting fewer jobs to become available in coming months decreased to 17.1% in September from 18.1% in the prior month, while those expecting more jobs edged up to 14.4% from 14.2%.

Assessment of current labor market conditions also improved. The share of respondents saying that jobs are "plentiful" increased to 25.9% from 24.5%, but those saying that jobs are "hard to get" also edged up to 21.3% from 21.1%.

The conference Board report is based on a survey of 5,000 households, conducted by mail. The deadline for responses was Sept. 19.

Consumers' Outlook On The Economy Slightly More Upbeat (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Consumer confidence rebounded from a nine-month low in September, though still hovering near one of the lowest levels of the year, according to Tuesday reports indicating moderate economic growth.

The New York-based Conference Board's consumer confidence index rose to 104.5 in September from 100.2 in August. The index had tumbled in late summer as gas prices rose.

The index, based on a monthly telephone survey of 5,000 households, showed consumers more upbeat about both current conditions and the outlook for six months from now. But survey officials said the improvement didn't spell an economic surge.

"Even though consumers' concerns have eased, there is little to suggest a significant change in economic activity as we enter the final quarter of 2006," said Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board Consumer Research Center.

The Federal Reserve has said it expects the economy to downshift through the end of the year and into 2007. What's unknown is the extent of the softening and whether it will work to gradually reduce inflation, as the Fed predicts.

The share of consumers calling conditions "good" rose to 27.4% from 26.2%. Those assessing conditions as "bad" slipped to 15.4% from 16.6%.

But the number of consumers expecting to buy a house in the next six months slipped from 3.8% to 2.8%, the lowest in nine months. And the share expecting to buy major appliances or autos fell.

In some good news for the Fed, the report shows consumers expect lower inflation in the future than they did in August.

Steven Wood, chief economist of Insight Economics, says that while the numbers are an improvement, the longer-term trend indicates consumers are "much more optimistic about the present but still quite worried about the future."

Consumer spending accounts for about two-thirds of the economy.

Also Tuesday, the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond said manufacturing activity in its area rose in September from the previous month, with strong new orders and shipments. At the same time, material costs were up and expected to keep increasing.

Last week, the Philadelphia Fed reported a slowdown in business activity in its region.

Economic Forum Warns U.S. Of Budget Deficit's Ill Effects (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

The U.S.'s huge budget deficit threatens to make the country's economy less competitive, according to a study by the World Economic Forum, an institute in Switzerland.

The institute's annual study of global competitiveness says the U.S. economy is the sixth most-competitive in the world, slipping from first place in last year's ranking, a result of mediocre scores for its public finances.

Switzerland ranks No. 1 in this year's survey, thanks to what the forum sees as a combination of efficient public administration and flexible markets. Three Nordic countries -- Finland, Sweden and Denmark -- come next, followed by Singapore and the U.S. (See the full rankings1 and more from the report2.)

COUNTRY RANKINGS 2006-2007

1. Switzerland
2. Finland
3. Sweden
4. Denmark
5. Singapore
6. U.S.
7. Japan
8. Germany
9. Netherlands

Source: Global Competitiveness Report, World Economic Forum

The competitiveness study ranks countries according to a range of criteria -- including macroeconomic policies, market regulations, technological development, education systems and public institutions -- that the forum believes influence an economy's level of productivity, and thereby its ability to sustain economic growth over many years. The ranking combines economic indicators with the findings from a survey of business executives.

"The U.S. remains a very competitive economy," said Augusto Lopez-Claros, the forum's chief economist. "It leads in innovation and patent registrations, has some of the best universities in the world, and it has extremely high levels of collaboration between universities and industry," he said. "However, how you manage your public finances is very important."

Serial budget deficits in the U.S. have led to rising public debt, which means an increasing portion of government spending goes toward debt service. That means less money is available for spending on infrastructure, schools or other investments that could boost productivity. Heavy government borrowing, which means competing for money in financial markets with the private sector, also tends to drive up businesses' borrowing costs.

Middling scores were awarded to the fast-growing emerging economies of the world considered to be changing the economic balance of power: India ranks 43rd out of 125 countries in the survey, China ranks 54th, Russia 62nd and Brazil 66th.

Russia and China, despite good scores for macroeconomic management, are marked down for a lack of transparency and even-handedness in their public institutions, including their bureaucracy and judiciary, and for protections for property rights. Brazil is making progress on improving its public finances, but at too slow a pace, according to Mr. Lopez-Claros. Of the four countries, only India improved its ranking in the survey this year.

Although many economists and investors believe economic output in these four countries will overtake that of most of the world's established economic powers by midcentury, the World Economic Forum is unfashionably downbeat, warning that the emerging economies' growth could hit barriers unless they develop more-efficient public institutions.

"There is maybe a bit of hype about these countries," Mr. Lopez-Claros said.

No Longer No. 1, And No Wonder (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

On the surface, two studies out this week seem to raise warning flags about the competitiveness of the U.S. economy.

One, the annual ranking from the World Economic Forum -- the elite business organization that runs the annual winter schmooze-fest in Davos, Switzerland -- finds that the United States has fallen from No. 1, a position it shared with Finland for most of a decade, to an unsettling sixth place.

And the National Association of Manufacturers, along with the Manufacturers Alliance, is scheduled to release an update of an earlier study today showing that the burdens of regulation, taxation, litigation and health care are even greater than they were in 2002, when the "cost gap" between U.S. companies and those of our largest trading partners was 22.4 percent.

The predictable response from the business community will be to use these studies to warn of impending economic ruin unless the government adopts the Republican agenda of less regulation, lower taxes, tort reform, and relieving companies of health-care and pension costs.

Don't be fooled. These reports speak to the embarrassing failure of a decade of Republican rule in improving U.S. competitiveness. Business taxes, as a percentage of anything you want to measure, are at their lowest level in decades. The Bush White House has subjected new regulations to rigorous cost-benefit analysis. Several reforms make it less attractive for shareholders, workers and consumers to file frivolous lawsuits, but not necessarily for businesses. And in case you hadn't noticed, businesses have already made tremendous strides in shifting health-care and pension costs to workers.

In fact, an alternative reading of the new reports suggests that the business community needs to do some serious thinking about competitiveness and economic policy.

Let's take the legal system, a negative in both reports. It ought to be obvious to anyone who has followed the asbestos debacle or the medical malpractice issue that litigation has become an inefficient way to police the behavior of companies, executives and service professionals. But the only realistic alternative is regulation by government, which the business community opposes. You can't have it both ways.

You can't, for example, just tell smokers they have no recourse against tobacco companies that market products they know to be deadly if you don't have a Food and Drug Administration with power to regulate unsafe tobacco products. You can't tell shareholders they have no right to sue management if you oppose regulations that might give shareholders a voice in who runs the company. You can't tell workers not to sue employers for unsafe workplaces while you're busy neutering the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

This isn't an economic argument so much as a political one. A totalitarian state such as China may be able to duck these kinds of trade-offs, and there is no doubt Chinese exporters are more competitive as a result. But that is not realistic for an advanced democracy whose citizens prefer to use some wealth, or forgo some economic efficiency, in exchange for safer products and workplaces and more responsive corporate governance.

Or consider the manufacturers' legitimate complaint that they are at a disadvantage because of health-care and pension costs that, in other countries, are borne largely by government. Having raised the issue, however, it is hypocritical for the business lobby to oppose any tax increase that might be used to socialize these costs. Their phony solution -- that average Americans should essentially fund their own pensions and health care, with no increase in wages -- is so unfair and unreliable that Americans have roundly rejected it.

Indeed, a reasonable inference from the World Economic Forum rankings is that the best way to compete is to adopt the Nordic model of high taxes, a generous social safety net and lightly regulated labor markets. Scandinavian government spending accounts for more than half the economy, as opposed to a third in the United States. But the reason the Nordic countries score higher in the WEF study is that their governments run surpluses instead of deficits, cave in to special interests less often, operate efficiently and spend their money wisely.

In contrast to the WEF study, the manufacturers' analysis is pretty lame. Comparing the regulatory and tax regimes of an advanced industrial country with those of developing Asian countries is specious. I assure you that no NAM member would have his children breathe Beijing's foul air for long. I also find it hard to believe that manufacturing executives pine for the tax and regulatory regimes of Europe or even Japan. The study's comparison of wholesale energy costs conveniently ignores the large fuel taxes imposed by European governments. And no doubt you'll be shocked to learn that the higher costs of U.S. executive compensation were left out of the analysis.

The business community's fantasy is that the United States would soar to the top of the rankings if only we had Ireland's tax regime, China's environmental controls, Singapore's legal system and Chile's social-safety net. Each policy is part of a complex social and economic model that includes features that Americans, and American business, would find unacceptable. These are package deals, not individual offerings at a dim sum lunch.

This is a crucial moment for the business lobby. Its close allies in the Republican Party may soon lose their exclusive grip on Washington's policy levers. Business leaders can stick with a reflexive anti-government, anti-tax, anti-regulation agenda that has hit a brick wall lately. Or they can move toward the bipartisan center, where they might actually strike a deal or two that could make their companies, and the country, more competitive.

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

Continuing a steady march higher that has stunned some Wall Street pundits, the Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to its second-highest finish, within 54 points of the record that dates from more than six years ago.

The immediate spur was a pair of U.S. economic reports that hinted at a desired "Goldilocks" economy -- not too hot and not too cold. The Dow industrials responded with a gain of 93.58 points, or 0.8%, to 11669.39. That surpassed the six-year high hit this past May and was the best close since the Dow industrials finished at their record 11722.98 on Jan. 14, 2000.

Investors seem to have overcome dueling fears that the economy would prove too hot -- forcing the Federal Reserve to continue raising interest rates and stifle growth -- or too cold, leading to disappointing corporate profits. Instead, recent inflation figures have come in slightly below expectations and recent data on consumer spending have been stronger than expected.

Yesterday, the Conference Board released its September survey of consumer sentiment, which was more robust than expected. The report reinforced recent hopes that falling gasoline prices will help keep consumer spending afloat despite the slumping housing market. Later in the day, the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond said economic activity in the Southeast has been improving. In addition, oil futures resumed their recent declines, falling 44 cents to $61.01 a barrel.

Investors looked past some signs of trouble, notably in the housing business. Home builder Lennar reported a 39% quarterly profit drop and cut its forecast for the new quarter, saying the worst probably isn't over. Home-improvement concern Lowe's said profits this year would be at the low end of expectations. Reflecting the market optimism, both stocks rose despite the news, as investors bet that falling mortgage rates and falling oil prices would give demand a lift.

A number of stock analysts have been surprised by the market's steady gains, which began in mid-July as investors rightly anticipated that the Fed was about to pause in its campaign of interest-rate increases. Skeptical analysts lately have been warning clients that, with the Dow industrials already up 8.9% for 2006, and with most of those gains logged in the past two months, stocks could be poised for a pullback.

With three trading days left in the quarter, the Dow industrials are up 2.5% for September and up 4.7% for the quarter. That means September is likely to be one of the year's strongest months, even though, on average, it historically has been the weakest month.

"People fear the train has left the station and they are running to jump on," said Alfred Kugel, chief investment strategist at Chicago investment-management group Atlantic Trust/Stein Roe. Two months ago, many investors feared that the economy was overheating, that inflation could force the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates higher, and that tensions with Iran could keep oil prices oppressively high, he said. Today, the economy has moderated, the Fed appears to be done raising rates, and oil prices are falling. People are buying stocks "because of the bad things that didn't happen," Mr. Kugel said, and that has created a "stealth rally" since mid-July.

The day's upbeat economic numbers stifled the recent bond rally, at least temporarily, since it was fears of economic weakness that had driven people to buy bonds. Bond prices fell and yields rose. But the yield of the 10-year Treasury note, at 4.589%, remained near the seven-month low hit on Monday. Bond yields influence other market interest rates, and their decline has been good news for businesses and consumers alike, making borrowing cheaper in many markets including parts of the mortgage market.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished at a 5½-year high of 1336.34, up 0.8%, or 9.97 points. It is up 7.1% this year and 5.2% so far this quarter. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.55%, or 12.27 points, to 2261.34, up 2.5% this year. It is up 4.1% for the quarter, having recovered some of its lost ground from the first half of the year. The S&P 500 and the Nasdaq composite both fell more heavily than the Dow during the bear market, however, and neither is near a record.

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 2,137 stocks rose and 1,188 fell. Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.29%, or 0.62 point, to 217.22.

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 11/32, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.589%. The 30-year bond was down 14/32 to yield 4.718%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 117.15 yen, up from 116.50, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2690 from $1.2759.

Clinton TV Interview Energizes GOP, Dems (AP-Y)

By Marc Humbert

AP, September 26, 2006

Former President Clinton's angry response to questions about Osama bin Laden has partisans of every persuasion certain it will energize voters in the elections and affect a possible presidential bid by his wife.

Conservatives immediately labeled the interview a prime example of the soap opera that would run daily should another Democrat — say, for example, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton — win the White House.

Not so, countered Democrats. They argued the former president's feisty dressing-down of Fox News' Chris Wallace is just the wake-up call the party's liberal base needed six weeks before the election, a pointed criticism of the Bush administration's bungled search for bin Laden.

Either way, don't expect the furor to subside any time soon.

"We should replay that interview as often as possible," chortled Republican strategist Nelson Warfield on Tuesday.

"In this election there's been a lot of worry among Republicans about whether our base is motivated and is going to turn out to vote," Warfield said. "Nothing motivates the Republican base more than some puffy pontification from Bill Clinton. When he has a little fit on TV, it reminds us of the future that awaits if the Democrats should ever win another national election."

In the exchange with Wallace, the former president contended that, unlike him, the newly installed Bush administration ignored bin Laden until the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

"They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try, they did not try," Clinton said in the interview broadcast Sunday. Clinton also attacked Wallace for a "conservative hit job" by asking about his administration's failure to get bin Laden.

In the wake of the interview, the Clinton camp denied he had lost his cool.

"That wasn't a question, it was an accusation," said Clinton spokesman Jay Carson. "He knew exactly what he was doing and we knew exactly what we were going to do if he did that, as we suspected he would. But it's not what we wanted."

DOJ_NMG_0070145

President Bush did not respond directly to Clinton's charges at a news conference Tuesday, saying, "I've watched all this, you know, fingerpointing and, you know, namings of names and all that stuff. Our objective is to secure the country."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice challenged Clinton's claim that he did more than many of his conservative critics to pursue bin Laden and accused the former president of leaving no comprehensive plan to fight al-Qaida.

Sen. Clinton, often mentioned as the leading Democrat for a 2008 run, said her husband's fire will help Democrats as they try to take control of the House in November.

"I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks," the New York senator, who polls show is headed for easy re-election, said Tuesday.

The former president largely is seen as an asset to his wife if she seeks the Democratic nomination, a potential drawback in a general election in which the name Clinton elicits strong feelings on both sides.

Still immensely popular with the party's base, he is a key draw at fundraisers and a masterful political strategist. In fact, the heated exchange represented something of a departure for an ex-president who, in recent months, has been largely content to boost his wife's stature.

"I do believe that if elected she would be magnificent" as president, he told the New Yorker magazine just before she crushed anti-Iraq war activist Jonathan Tasini in a September primary.

There is a lack of agreement on whether the former president really did know what he was up to by taking on Wallace with such vehemence.

Conservative columnist John Podhoretz, writing in Tuesday's New York Post, called it "the Bubba blowup" and "a full-bore tantrum on the small screen."

But fellow conservative William Kristol, writing Monday for The Weekly Standard, suggested Clinton might have been laying out a battle plan for Democrats to fight Republican charges that they are "unreliable in the war on terror."

And, as Kristol noted, "Hillary Clinton has been having problems with the left wing of the Democratic Party. With this interview, Bill Clinton has the entire left wing of the Democratic Party rallying to him."

Still others say Clinton's outburst could cut both ways.

"I think he knew what he was doing. And, I think he lost his temper," said Democratic strategist Hank Sheinkopf, who worked on Clinton's successful 1996 re-election effort.

Sheinkopf called Clinton's performance "a two-edged sword" for Democrats, reminding voters of charges that the party is soft on terrorism but also demonstrating that the last Democratic president wasn't against using force.

"Clinton had no option but to defend the Democrats and defend his performance," Sheinkopf said.

If nothing else, the interview served to again put the other Clinton back in the spotlight at a time when much of the attention has shifted to his wife.

No big deal, said Sheinkopf.

"We're two years away from 2008," the Democrat said.

Warfield disagreed.

"It's part of this huge collection of baggage she hauls with her into a national campaign," the GOP strategist said. "Do voters really want to go back into four years of the national soap opera that is the Clintons in the White House?"

Sen. Clinton Hits Back At Rice Over 9/11 (AP-Y)

AP, September 26, 2006

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton hit back at Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday as the political fighting escalated over which president — Bill Clinton or George W. Bush — missed more opportunities to prevent the Sept. 11 attacks.

Clinton, D-N.Y., took aim at President Bush and Rice over their roles in 2001 before the attacks, part of the growing argument touched off after Bill Clinton gave a combative interview on "Fox News Sunday" in which he defended his efforts to kill Osama bin Laden.

"I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks," Hillary Clinton said. "I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined To Attack Inside the United States' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team."

The senator was referring to a classified brief given to Bush in August 2001, one that Democrats say showed the Bush administration did not do enough to combat the growing threat from al-Qaida.

When the brief was delivered, Rice was Bush's national security adviser, and Clinton's response was clearly designed to implicate her in the same criticisms that have been made of Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0070146

Clinton's response came a day after Rice denied Bill Clinton's claim in the television interview that the Bush administration had not aggressively pursued al-Qaida before the attacks of 2001.

"What we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years," Rice said during a meeting with editors and reporters at the New York Post. "The notion somehow for eight months the Bush administration sat there and didn't do that is just flatly false, and I think the 9/11 commission understood that."

"We were not left a comprehensive strategy to fight al-Qaida," she told the newspaper, which is owned by News Corp., the company that owns Fox News Channel.

The former president became furious during the television interview when asked why he did not do more to fight al-Qaida.

"That's the difference in me and some, including all of the right-wingers who are attacking me now," Clinton said in the interview. "They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try. They did not try."

The interview has been the focus of much attention, earning the show its best ratings in nearly three years.

Rice questioned the value of the dialogue.

"I think this is not a very fruitful discussion," she said. "We've been through it. The 9/11 commission has turned over every rock, and we know exactly what they said."

Clinton Defends Husband's Tack, Adding That All Democrats Should Take A Hint (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — The war of words between the Bush administration and the Clintons intensified on Tuesday as Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton suggested that her husband would have reacted differently as president if he had heard the same warnings about Osama bin Laden's plans that President Bush had access to before 9/11.

In unusually blunt terms, Senator Clinton questioned the current administration's response to an intelligence briefing President Bush received about a month before the 9/11 attacks. It mentioned that Al Qaeda was intent on striking the United States using hijacked planes.

"I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States,' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team," she said during an appearance on Capitol Hill.

The comments by Senator Clinton ratcheted up an already bitter exchange of charges between the Bush and Clinton camps over how the two administrations responded to the threat posed by Al Qaeda before the attacks, which occurred nearly eight months into the Bush presidency.

In her remarks, Senator Clinton also suggested that Bill Clinton's animated defense of his own national security record as president, delivered only a few days earlier, provided a powerful example for Democrats, whom Republicans have sought to portray in recent national elections as too weak to lead the country in such perilous times.

"I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks," she said.

The skirmishing began on Sunday, when Mr. Clinton, in a combative interview on "Fox News Sunday," vigorously defended his handling of the threat posed by Mr. bin Laden, then suggested that the Bush administration had failed to grasp the threat in the months leading to 9/11.

Then, on Monday, in a meeting with editors and reporters of The New York Post, Mr. Bush's secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, struck back. She accused Mr. Clinton of making "flatly false" claims about the Bush administration's efforts to stop Mr. bin Laden and disputing Mr. Clinton's assertion that he had "left a comprehensive antiterror strategy" for Mr. Bush and his advisers as they prepared to take office in 2001.

The battle between the Clintons and the Bush administration comes against the backdrop of the Congressional elections, with some Republican leaders arguing that their party's tough antiterror policies have helped protect the nation against further attacks.

In his television appearance, a visibly angry Mr. Clinton said that the Bush administration demoted his terrorism czar, Richard A. Clarke, who had argued for aggressive action against Al Qaeda and Mr. bin Laden before 9/11.

Mr. Clinton also accused his interviewer, Chris Wallace of Fox News, of orchestrating "a conservative hit job" on him by raising questions about his antiterrorism efforts.

"I want to know how many people in the Bush administration you asked, 'Why didn't you do anything about the Cole?' " Mr. Clinton said, referring to the bombing in October 2000 of the United States destroyer Cole in Yemen. Mr. bin Laden and Al Qaeda have been linked to that attack.

DOJ_NMG_0070147

President Bush refused to respond directly to Mr. Clinton's criticism on Tuesday, saying instead: "I've watched all this finger-pointing and naming of names and all that stuff. I don't have enough time to finger-point. I've got to do my job, which comes home every day in the Oval Office, and that is to protect the American people from further attack."

The Republican National Committee mocked Senator Clinton's defense of her husband's administration. "For Mrs. Clinton to insinuate that the same administration that repeatedly missed opportunities to stop bin Laden would be better equipped to protect America is absurd," said Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the committee.

But Philippe Reines, a spokesman for Senator Clinton, noted that the 9/11 Commission Report found that after President Clinton received intelligence warnings in 1998, he immediately mobilized his National Security Council, the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. while also increasing security and putting airports and airlines on high alert. By contrast, he said, the commission found no indication of any further discussion before Sept. 11 among President Bush and his top advisers of the possibility of a threat of an attack by Al Qaeda in the United States, even after Mr. Bush received an August 2001 briefing that Mr. bin Laden intended to attack inside the United States.

"President Clinton saw the warnings and took action,'' Mr. Reines said. "President Bush saw the warnings and took no action.''

For Senator Clinton, who is considered a possible contender for the presidency in 2008, her comments on Tuesday were unusually personal in tone. But Howard Wolfson, one of her chief advisers, made it clear that Senator Clinton would be taking an increasingly aggressive posture to thwart any Republican attempts to cast Democrats as timid on national defense this election season.

"She is not going to allow her party, her husband or herself to get Swift-boated," he said, referring to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, a group that attacked the Vietnam War record of Senator John Kerry when he was the Democrats' presidential nominee in 2004. "Democrats have to stand up and go toe to toe with Republicans on national security."

Senator Clinton made her comments at a news conference on the Hill, where Democrats argued that President Bush's handling of the war in Iraq and its aftermath had actually made America more vulnerable to terrorist attacks.

"Their policies are failing, our military is breaking and the American people are demanding a change," she said. "The administration has lost focus on winning the war on Iraq, and all Washington Republicans can focus on is winning elections here at home."

Bush And Clinton Teams Debate Pre-9/11 Efforts (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The election-year debate over terrorism has triggered a full-blown spat between the camps of President Bush and former president Bill Clinton as the two sides trade barbs over who was more responsible for failing to disrupt al-Qaeda before it could attack the United States on Sept. 11, 2001.

Bush complained yesterday that Clinton was engaging in "finger-pointing" by attacking the current administration's actions before the hijackings. "I don't have enough time to finger-point," Bush said. But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice did, calling Clinton's version of events "flatly false." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) returned fire on his behalf, asserting that he would have paid more attention to intelligence warnings in the weeks before the attacks than Bush did.

The unusual crossfire over the past few days effectively broke a tacit peace between the 42nd and 43rd presidents that has reigned for most of the past two years. Ever since Bush tapped Bill Clinton to work with his father, George H.W. Bush, on relief efforts after the Asian tsunamis of December 2004, the two have grown closer. Clinton and the older Bush teamed up again on Hurricane Katrina relief, and the president talked about growing to like his predecessor.

But with the hotly contested midterm elections just weeks away, Bush has tried to focus the nation's attention on the threat of terrorism, and Clinton has become more irritated at what he sees as attacks on his performance. The recent ABC miniseries "Path to 9/11" especially irked the former president because of what he saw as a skewed portrayal blaming him for not doing more to get Osama bin Laden.

Clinton, when asked about the matter on "Fox News Sunday," erupted in an angry, red-faced, finger-jabbing performance that has electrified the left and outraged the right. Clinton said that though he failed, at least he tried to kill bin Laden while Bush did not. "They had eight months to try," Clinton said. "They did not try. I tried."

Rice bristled at that in an interview in yesterday's New York Post. "The notion somehow for eight months the Bush administration sat there and didn't do that is just flatly false, and I think the 9/11 commission understood that," she said. "What we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years."

Hillary Clinton pointed to the intelligence memo presented to Bush in August 2001. "I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States,' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team," she said.

And Jay Carson, a spokesman for Bill Clinton, rejected Rice's contention: "Every single fact that President Clinton stated in his interview is backed up by the historical record -- including the 9/11 commission report. Everything President Clinton said was flatly correct."

Some of Clinton's statements on Fox have drawn scrutiny. He said that after the bombing of the USS Cole in 2000, "I had battle plans drawn to go into Afghanistan, overthrow the Taliban and launch a full-scale attack search for bin Laden. But we needed basing rights in Uzbekistan." The Sept. 11 commission, though, found no plans for an invasion of Afghanistan or for an operation to topple the Taliban, just more limited options such as plans for attacks with cruise missiles or Special Forces. And nothing in the panel's report indicated that a lack of basing rights in Uzbekistan prevented a military response.

Clinton also asserted that the Bush administration "didn't have a single meeting about bin Laden for the nine months after I left office." In fact, the Bush team held several meetings on terrorism through the interagency group known as the deputies committee and one on Sept. 4, 2001, through the principals committee composed of Cabinet officers. What Clinton may have been referring to was counterterrorism chief Richard A. Clarke's frustration that the principals disregarded his urgent calls to meet sooner because of a months-long policy review.

Rice came under fire for her assertion that "we were not left a comprehensive strategy to fight al-Qaeda" by Clinton's team. In fact, Clarke sent Rice an al-Qaeda memo on Jan. 25, 2001, along with a strategy to "roll back" the terrorist network, but the Bush team decided to conduct the policy review.

Another Clinton Seduction (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

At least Jerry Falwell didn't say Hillary smelled of sulfur.

But he did say that if she runs for president, she will bedevil evangelicals and fire them up to vote Republican with a dark force exceeding even Lucifer.

I suppose, since Senator Clinton's shrill right-wing critics usually portray her as a witch, being promoted to devil can count as a feminist triumph. And she's in good bipartisan company with the president, who was also cast as the devil by a world-class nutbar.

Hillary is morphing from workhorse back to show horse, paving the way for her historic presidential race with a series of big policy speeches. And she is taking on the other dynasty more energetically.

"I'm certain that if my husband and his security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States,' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team," she crisply told reporters on Capitol Hill yesterday.

Forty years after feminism brashly burst forth, female leaders are still struggling to figure out how to blend sexuality and strength in a way that will not backfire. Consider Hewlett-Packard, the progressive Silicon Valley company. Carly Fiorina was fired as chairman and chief executive after a stereotypically alpha male reign, while Patricia Dunn lost her job as chairman after she used what some critics called a stereotypical "Mean Girls" subterfuge to spy on male board members rather than confronting them directly over leaks.

Hillary is also trying different methods, searching for the key that would allow her to break into the ultimate mahogany-paneled men's club at 1600 Penn. She will try to get back to the West Wing based not on what she has done in the Senate, but on how she has done it.

She has been like a silent-film star, lacking a voice in this chilling time when the Bush administration has Photoshopped the Constitution, portrayed critics as traitors, and spurred terrorism with a misconceived and mismanaged war in Iraq.

Explaining why she had not taken any unpopular stances and championed no big ideas, Hillary answered Joshua Green more like diva than devil in the upcoming cover story for The Atlantic Monthly: "Everything I do carries political risk because nobody gets the scrutiny that I get. It's not like I have any margin for error whatsoever."

She has transformed her method from bulldozing alpha in the White House — high-handed, unilateral and insensitive on health care — to coalition-building gamma in Congress. Now the woman who hated being called first lady charms with the most handkerchief-dropping feminine wiles and stratagems, from fetching coffee for senior male Senate colleagues to stepping to the background so that preening male peacocks can hog the live shot.

As one of her male aides bragged to Mr. Green, it's so effective because the men who tried to impeach her husband don't expect the former first lady of the United States "to ask if you want two lumps of sugar."

"Fetching coffee, I think, is too much," said Michael Morris of the Columbia Business School. "But any good politician is a good flirt. Bill Clinton seduced every woman and every man he met."

One Hillary aide recently crowed to me about the surprising number of her male colleagues who have crushes on her. And the Rev. Falwell may have missed her bonding with conservative lawmakers at Hill prayer breakfasts. As Mr. Green writes, Hillary and Sam Brownback worked together on legislation after the Kansas conservative gave testimony at a prayer breakfast that he realized it was a sin to have trashed her.

It may not be turning the other cheek for Hillary, so much as triangulating the other cheek. "The Warrior," as her staff calls her, has not forgotten what she learned from her consort. The Clintons once polled on where to go on vacation when they were in the White House (Dick Morris advised that a camping trip would play well with swing voters), and now Mr. Green reports that the Clintons moved to Chappaqua at least partly in response to polling data.

He also writes that in 2003, the pollster Mark Penn created a 007-secret team to determine whether Hillary could break her pledge to serve a full Senate term and still have enough political clout to wage a presidential run — an assertion that Mr. Penn neither confirmed nor denied.

It may not smell of sulfur, but it smacks of truth.

What President Clinton Didn't Do . . . (WSJ)

By Richard Miniter

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

Bill Clinton's outburst on Fox News was something of a public service, launching a debate about the antiterror policies of his administration. This is important because every George W. Bush policy that arouses the ire of Democrats -- the Patriot Act, extraordinary rendition, detention without trial, pre-emptive war -- is a departure from his predecessor. Where policies overlap -- air attacks on infrastructure, secret presidential orders to kill terrorists, intelligence sharing with allies, freezing bank accounts, using police to arrest terror suspects -- there is little friction. The question, then, is whether America should return to Mr. Clinton's policies or soldier on with Mr. Bush's.

It is vital that this debate be honest, but so far this has not been the case. Both Mr. Clinton's outrage at Chris Wallace's questioning and the ABC docudrama "The Path to 9/11" are attempts to polarize the nation's memory. While this divisiveness may be good for Mr. Clinton's reputation, it is ultimately unhealthy for the country. What we need, instead, is a cold-eyed look at what works against terrorists and what does not. The policies of the Clinton and Bush administrations ought to be put to the same iron test.

With that in mind, let us examine Mr. Clinton's war on terror. Some 38 days after he was sworn in, al Qaeda attacked the World Trade Center. He did not visit the twin towers that year, even though four days after the attack he was just across the Hudson River in New Jersey, talking about job training. He made no attempt to rally the public against terrorism. His only public speech on the bombing was a few paragraphs inserted into a radio address mostly devoted an economic stimulus package. Those stray paragraphs were limited to reassuring the public and thanking the rescuers, the kinds of things governors say after hurricanes. He did not even vow to bring the bombers to justice. Instead, he turned the first terrorist attack on American soil over to the FBI.

In his Fox interview, Mr. Clinton said "no one knew that al Qaeda existed" in October 1993, during the tragic events in Somalia. But his national security adviser, Tony Lake, told me that he first learned of bin Laden "sometime in 1993," when he was thought of as a terror financier. U.S. Army Capt. James Francis Yacone, a black hawk squadron commander in Somalia, later testified that radio intercepts of enemy mortar crews firing at Americans were in Arabic, not Somali, suggesting the work of bin Laden's agents (who spoke Arabic), not warlord Farah Aideed's men (who did not). CIA and DIA reports also placed al Qaeda operatives in Somalia at the time.

By the end of Mr. Clinton's first year, al Qaeda had apparently attacked twice. The attacks would continue for every one of the Clinton years.

· In 1994, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed (who would later plan the 9/11 attacks) launched "Operation Bojinka" to down 11 U.S. planes simultaneously over the Pacific. A sharp-eyed Filipina police officer foiled the plot. The sole American response: increased law-enforcement cooperation with the Philippines.

· In 1995, al Qaeda detonated a 220-pound car bomb outside the Office of Program Manager in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, killing five Americans and wounding 60 more. The FBI was sent in.

· In 1996, al Qaeda bombed the barracks of American pilots patrolling the "no-fly zones" over Iraq, killing 19. Again, the FBI responded.

DOJ_NMG_0070150

· In 1997, al Qaeda consolidated its position in Afghanistan and bin Laden repeatedly declared war on the U.S. In February, bin Laden told an Arab TV network: "If someone can kill an American soldier, it is better than wasting time on other matters." No response from the Clinton administration.

· In 1998, al Qaeda simultaneously bombed U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, killing 224, including 12 U.S. diplomats. Mr. Clinton ordered cruise-missile strikes on Afghanistan and Sudan in response. Here Mr. Clinton's critics are wrong: The president was right to retaliate when America was attacked, irrespective of the Monica Lewinsky case.

Still, "Operation Infinite Reach" was weakened by Clintonian compromise. The State Department feared that Pakistan might spot the American missiles in its air space and misinterpret it as an Indian attack. So Mr. Clinton told Gen. Joe Ralston, vice chairman of Joint Chiefs of Staff, to notify Pakistan's army minutes before the Tomahawks passed over Pakistan. Given Pakistan's links to jihadis at the time, it is not surprising that bin Laden was tipped off, fleeing some 45 minutes before the missiles arrived.

· In 1999, the Clinton administration disrupted al Qaeda's Millennium plots, a series of bombings stretching from Amman to Los Angeles. This shining success was mostly the work of Richard Clarke, a NSC senior director who forced agencies to work together. But the Millennium approach was shortlived. Over Mr. Clarke's objections, policy reverted to the status quo.

· In January 2000, al Qaeda tried and failed to attack the U.S.S. The Sullivans off Yemen. (Their boat sank before they could reach their target.) But in October 2000, an al Qaeda bomb ripped a hole in the hull of the U.S.S. Cole, killing 17 sailors and wounding another 39.

When Mr. Clarke presented a plan to launch a massive cruise missile strike on al Qaeda and Taliban facilities in Afghanistan, the Clinton cabinet voted against it. After the meeting, a State Department counterterrorism official, Michael Sheehan, sought out Mr. Clarke. Both told me that they were stunned. Mr. Sheehan asked Mr. Clarke: "What's it going to take to get them to hit al Qaeda in Afghanistan? Does al Qaeda have to attack the Pentagon?"

There is much more to Mr. Clinton's record -- how Predator drones, which spotted bin Laden three times in 1999 and 2000, were grounded by bureaucratic infighting; how a petty dispute with an Arizona senator stopped the CIA from hiring more Arabic translators. While it is easy to look back in hindsight and blame Bill Clinton, the full scale and nature of the terrorist threat was not widely appreciated until 9/11. Still: Bill Clinton did not fully grasp that he was at war. Nor did he intuit that war requires overcoming bureaucratic objections and a democracy's natural reluctance to use force. That is a hard lesson. But it is better to learn it from studying the Clinton years than reliving them.

New Campaign Ads Have A Theme: Don't Be Nice (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Republicans and Democrats began showing at least 30 new campaign advertisements in contested House and Senate districts across the country on Tuesday. Of those, three were positive.

For Republicans, it was the leading edge of a wave of negative advertisements against Democratic candidates, the product of more than a year of research into the personal and professional backgrounds of Democratic challengers.

"What do we really know about Angie Paccione?" an announcer asks about a Democratic challenger in Colorado. "Angie Paccione had 10 legal claims against her for bad debts and campaign violations. A court even ordered her wages garnished."

For Democrats, it was part of a barrage intended to tie Republican incumbents to an unpopular Congress, criticize their voting records, portray them as captives to special interests and highlight embarrassing moments from their business histories.

In Tennessee, Democrats attacked Bob Corker, a Republican candidate for Senate, saying his construction company had hired illegal immigrants "while he looked the other way."

The result of the dueling accusations has been what both sides described on Tuesday as the most toxic midterm campaign environment in memory. It is a jarring blend of shadowy images, breathless announcers, jagged music and a dizzying array of statistics, counterstatistics and vote citations — all intended to present the members of Congress and their challengers in the worst possible light. Democratic and Republican strategists said they expected over 90 percent of the advertisements to be broadcast by Nov. 7 to be negative.

At the national level, the two parties are battling over issues like national security and the war in Iraq. But Congressional races play out on local airwaves, and the flood of commercials amounts to a parallel campaign, one that is often about the characters of individual challengers and obscure votes cast by incumbents. Frequently lost in the back-and-forth are the protests of candidates who say the negative advertisements are full of deliberate distortions and exaggerations.

While Democrats have largely concentrated their efforts on the political records of Republicans, the Republicans have zeroed in more on candidates' personal backgrounds.

Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said his investigators had been looking into prospective Democratic challengers since the summer of 2005.

"These candidates have been out there doing other things — they have never seen anything like this before," Mr. Reynolds said of the Democratic challengers.

"We haven't even begun to unload this freight train," Mr. Reynolds said.

Democrats are learning just how deeply the Republicans have been digging. John Yarmuth, a Kentucky Democrat who is running for a House seat, has spent much of the past few days trying to explain editorials unearthed by Republican researchers and spotlighted in new advertisements. Mr. Yarmuth wrote the editorials for his student newspapers, and in them he advocated the legalization of marijuana, among other things.

Across the airwaves, Democratic challengers are being attacked for having defaulted on student loans, declaring bankruptcy, skipping out on tax bills, and being a lobbyist, a trial lawyer or, even worse, a liberal.

Steve Kagan, a doctor and Democrat running for Congress in Wisconsin, is being attacked for having sued patients who did not pay their bills. "Why not just tell the truth, Dr. Millionaire?" said an advertisement shown Tuesday.

Heath Shuler, the former Washington Redskins quarterback running for Congress as a Democrat in North Carolina, is being attacked in advertisements for owning a business that was late in paying $69,000 in back taxes.

Democrats are equally aggressive in their advertisements, going after Republicans on votes, ties to campaign contributors and, in the case of challengers, their own personal foibles. In one Democratic advertisement, the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff is shown in shadows wearing a hat as an announcer notes that he made contributions to Representative J. D. Hayworth, Republican of Arizona.

Democrats are even attacking Republicans on what should be their signature issue, taxes, most recently in an upstate New York race between State Senator Raymond A. Meier, a Republican, and Michael A. Arcuri, a Democrat, to fill an open Republican seat. "Raymond Meier raised taxes in Oneida County," the announcer says. "Meier raised taxes in Albany. What do you think he'll do" in Washington?

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that relatively inexperienced candidates might be vulnerable, but that Republicans had even worse problems this year, with a record of votes that he said had provided a steady stream of damaging information for Democratic campaigns.

"Let me tell you: candidates with lesser name identification are vulnerable to being defined," Mr. Emanuel said. "But candidates who are associated with an institution are also vulnerable. There are two sides to this sword."

While some public officials have criticized negative advertisements as destructive and blamed them for discouraging voter turnout, other analysts say they have come, if only by default, to play an important role. At a time of diminishing local news coverage of House and Senate races, they are one of the few ways in which voters learn about the candidates and their positions.

"Negative ads are more likely to talk about policy than positive ads," said Joel Rivlin, deputy director of the Wisconsin Advertising Project, which monitors political advertising. "How else do you find out about the flaws of a candidate besides a negative ad?"

Incumbent Republicans and, to a lesser extent, Democrats are being attacked on their voting records and positions taken on issues large and small.

With dollar figures scrolling across the screen, Democrats belittled Republicans for taking money from oil companies, suggesting that was a reason for high gasoline prices. "Drake voted for billions in tax breaks for the oil and gas industry," said a Democratic advertisement aimed at Representative Thelma Drake, Republican of Virginia. "She gets her way, big oil and gas get theirs."

In a blizzard of conflicting advertisements, Republicans and Democrats in all regions of the country are accusing one another of supporting amnesty for illegal immigrants or providing government benefits to them.

Bruce Braley, a Democratic candidate for a House seat in Iowa, attacked his opponent, Mike Whalen, on Social Security. "He actually backed George Bush's half-baked plan to privatize Social Security," an advertisement said. Mr. Whalen accused Mr. Braley, in his own advertisement, of wanting to pull out of Iraq and thus "risk the safety of our troops to advance his extreme liberal agenda."

Mr. Emanuel said he had warned his candidates about this part of the campaign, though he made a practice of waiting until after they had signed on to run. "I tell them: 'I'm glad you're running. Now get ready. This is a tough business. This is the hellfire you are going to go through,' " he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070152

Mr. Reynolds has long believed that it would be this kind of information about Democratic challengers and not voter opinion on, say, President Bush or the war in Iraq that would determine whether Republicans held Congress this year. By way of example, he pointed to the case of Mr. Shuler.

"When he was a quarterback, it didn't matter that he wasn't paying $69,000 in taxes," Mr. Reynolds said. "When you run for Congress, it matters."

Mr. Reynolds burst out laughing when asked why he was not using more positive advertisements. "If they moved things to the extent that negative ads move things, there would be more of them," he said.

Why Some Republicans Want To Lose (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As the White House and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill work to retain control of Congress in November's elections, a small but vocal band of conservative iconoclasts say they would prefer to see their own party lose.

The array of former members of Congress and officials from Republican administrations dating to the 1970s are using opinion articles, speeches and interviews to make the surprising -- and, to many of their friends and colleagues, near-heretical -- argument that it would be better for the country if their party lost. Some say they plan to vote Democratic for the first time in their lives. The Republican rebels say the modern Republican Party has so abandoned its conservative beliefs that it deserves to be defeated by the Democrats.

Three factors are driving the conservative backlash against the Republican-led Congress. Fiscal hawks are furious about the growth of the federal government. Conservative lawyers such as Bruce Fein, who worked in the Nixon Justice Department and Reagan Federal Communications Commission, are upset that Congress allowed President Bush to claim expansive powers to eavesdrop on American citizens and detain suspected militants without trial. Others say the war in Iraq is a costly diversion from the war on terror.

Other Republicans couch their desire for Republican losses in political terms, arguing that Democratic control of Congress for at least two years would increase the chances of Republicans retaining the presidency in 2008, by giving Republican candidates high-profile Democratic targets.

"Every Republican I know thinks Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid are the best things they have going for them," wrote Bruce Bartlett, a Treasury Department official during the presidency of Mr. Bush's father, referring to the top-ranking Democrats in the House and Senate. "Giving these inept leaders higher profiles would be a gift to conservatives everywhere," he added in an essay, part of a series by conservatives published recently in Washington Monthly magazine, under the heading: "Time for us to go."

"Republicans need a wake-up call," Joe Scarborough, a former Republican congressman who now hosts an MSNBC talk show, says in an interview. "We ran in 1994 against runaway spending, exploding deficits and corruption. But with Republicans in charge of both sides of Pennsylvania Avenue, what do we have? The same runaway spending, record deficits and culture of corruption." He uses his show as a forum for those views and has published two essays on the theme.

Most Republicans, of course, don't think it is time for the party to go anywhere and are irked at those who suggest otherwise. Mr. Scarborough says that after his essay was published in Washington Monthly, his invitation to serve as master of ceremonies at a congressional fund-raiser with President Bush was revoked under White House pressure. A White House spokeswoman says the administration decided "that there were better options for an emcee" at the event.

Even many conservative critics of the current Congress say they plan to hold their noses and work to retain Republican majorities in the House and the Senate, arguing that Democrats can't be trusted to keep the country safe from terrorism or to sustain economic growth.

And White House officials wouldn't welcome the stream of subpoenas and investigations that could come from Democratic-controlled congressional committees.

The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-policy advocacy group, says it will give $20 million this election cycle to Republicans who share its antitax beliefs, regardless of the candidates' chances of winning a general election. The group backed conservative challenger Steve Laffey's unsuccessful primary campaign against moderate Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, despite the Republican establishment's belief that Mr. Laffey was unelectable.

Pat Toomey, president of the Club for Growth, says the group would be happy to see Republican moderates lose -- Club for Growth declines to support Mr. Chafee in what is expected to be a tight race against his Democratic challenger -- but stops short of campaigning against Mr. Chafee and other Republicans in the general election,

"Being Republican has to stand for more than having an 'R' after your name, and if that puts some seats in jeopardy, so be it," Mr. Toomey says. "But accept losing the Republican majority altogether? I just can't quite go there yet."

Mr. Scarborough, for his part, says he can "build a strong intellectual argument" for voting Democratic but can't bring himself to actually do so.

For the moment, Democrats appear less fractured than their rivals across the aisle. Many Democrats are so eager for an electoral victory that they are pragmatically backing candidates they once might have shunned.

Some Republicans, by contrast, having tasted congressional power for 12 years now -- and control of the House, the Senate and the White House for nearly six -- are ready to try being the opposition. Mr. Fein, the former Reagan and Nixon appointee, describes himself as a lifelong conservative who has voted for Republican candidates all his life and is disgusted by Democratic support for affirmative action -- which he sees as institutionalized racism -- and economic populism.

But he says that congressional Republicans have forfeited their right to control both chambers by failing to confront Mr. Bush over his expression of executive power, his interpretation of due process and habeas corpus, and his willingness to ignore legislation that he sees as an infringement of his war-fighting powers.

"A Democratic Congress will obviously not be promoting a conservative agenda, but at least they'll have the incentive, which is critical right now, to exercise oversight and restraint on the president," he says. "And that's much, much more than you can say for the Republicans who currently run Congress."

Mr. Fein recently bought a home in Florida and says he is scrambling to register to vote there in November, when he plans to do something he has never done before: cast a ballot for a Democrat. He says Democratic candidate Christine Jennings, who is running to fill the House seat vacated by Republican Senate candidate Katherine Harris, is "just the type of moderate I like."

Marriage Gap Could Sway Elections (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, September 27, 2006

The wedding band could be crucial in this fall's congressional elections, according to a USA TODAY analysis of 2005 Census data.

House districts held by Republicans are full of married people. Democratic districts are stacked with people who have never married. This “marriage gap” could play a role in the Nov. 7 congressional elections. Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to take control of the House of Representatives.

Twenty-seven of the 38 Republican-held districts with seats considered vulnerable by independent political analysts have fewer married people than found in the average GOP district. The USA TODAY analysis also shows that:

·Republicans control 49 of the 50 districts with the highest rates of married people.

·Democrats represent all 50 districts that have the highest rates of adults who have never married.

The political tug-of-war is between people who are married and those who have never been.

The “never married” group covers a variety of groups who form the Democratic base: young people, those who marry late in life, single parents, gays, and heterosexuals who live together.

The marriage divide drew attention in the 2004 presidential race. President Bush beat John Kerry by 15 percentage points among married people and lost by 18 percentage points among unmarried people, according to an exit poll conducted by national news media organizations.

Most serious Democratic challenges this fall are in Republican-controlled House districts that have lower marriage rates.

For example, the two seats most likely to switch from Republican to Democratic are Arizona's 8th District and Colorado's 7th District, according to the non-partisan National Journal. The districts — in which Republican incumbents are not seeking re-election — rank 251st and 307th respectively in marriage rates among the 435 districts.

Of the five Republicans who have the lowest rates of married people in their districts, four are in tough battles with Democrats. On the other side, Rep. Melissa Bean, D-Ill., whose district has a high marriage rate, faces a strong GOP challenge.

Rep. John Linder, R-Ga., whose district has the highest marriage rate (66.1%), says the gap exists because “people get more conservative when they settle down.” Democratic pollster Mark Mellman says the gap is magnified because a greater percentage of married people vote than unmarried people.

‘Fertility Gap' Helps Explain Political Divide (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, September 27, 2006

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, a Catholic mother of five from San Francisco, has fewer children in her district than any other member of Congress: 87,727.

Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, a Mormon father of eight, represents the most children: 278,398.

DOJ_NMG_0070154

These two extremes reflect a stark demographic divide between the congressional districts controlled by the major political parties.

Republican House members overwhelmingly come from districts that have high percentages of married people and lots of children, according to a USA TODAY analysis of 2005 Census Bureau data released last month.

GOP Congress members represent 39.2 million children younger than 18, about 7 million more than Democrats. Republicans average 7,000 more children per district.

Many Democrats represent areas that have many single people and relatively few children. Democratic districts that have large numbers of children tend to be predominantly Hispanic or, to a lesser extent, African-American.

This "fertility gap" is crucial to understanding the differences between liberals and conservatives, says Arthur Brooks, a professor of public administration at Syracuse University. These childbearing patterns shape divisions over issues such as welfare, education and child tax credits, he says.

"Both sides are very pro-kids. They just express it in different ways," Brooks says. "Republicans are congenial to traditional families, which is clearly the best way for kids to grow up. But there are some kids who don't have that advantage, and Democrats are very concerned with helping those kids."

Children in Democratic districts are far more likely to live in poverty and with single parents than kids in GOP districts.

Rep. José Serrano, D-N.Y., has 227,246 children in his Bronx district, the 10th most in the House. Only 29% of those children live with married parents.

By contrast, 84% of children in Cannon's central Utah district live with married parents.

Cannon used to have a locker next to Serrano at the congressional gym and considers him a friend. "The needs of kids in his district are just not the same as the needs of children in my district," Cannon says.

Marriage and parenthood define what's different about Democratic and Republican districts even more clearly than race, income, education or geography, USA TODAY's analysis of Census data found.

For example, Republicans represent seven of the 50 districts that have the highest concentrations of blacks. Both parties are well represented among affluent and well-educated districts.

Democrats control only one of the 50 districts with the highest marriage rates.

Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., who represents the most-married Democratic district (32nd overall), discounts the importance of the marriage rates. "It's a statistic without meaning," he says. "If you look at numbers from enough different angles, you can see almost anything."

Pelosi says in speeches that her most important concern is "the children, the children, the children," says her spokesman, Drew Hammill. That's why she wants to raise the minimum wage to help low-income parents, he says.

The stay-at-home mom is uncommon in all congressional districts. Mothers work at the same rate — about 71% — in Republican and Democratic districts.

Nevertheless, a big difference in family life is clear:

·Democrats represent 59 districts in which less than half of adults are married. Republicans represent only two.

·Democrats represent 30 districts in which less than half of children live with married parents. Republicans represent none.

"The biggest gaps in American politics are religion, race and marital status," says Democratic pollster Anna Greenberg.

Dems Seek K St. Cash (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 27, 2006

House Democrats are making an intense final push to raise inside-the-Beltway money before Congress adjourns, collecting most of it from the lobbying industry they have distanced themselves from this election cycle.

Democrats realize that lobbyists representing corporate clients are an important source of political contributions — funding that is vital to their chances of capturing the chamber. At the same time, Democrats have spent a lot of time and effort asserting that Republican rule has created a "Culture of Corruption" because of close ties between the GOP and certain special interests. The dynamic has created awkwardness for some Democrats.

Democratic leaders asked their entire caucus to come into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) headquarters yesterday and tomorrow to make fundraising calls. And last night, the DCCC held a fundraiser at Bistro Bis, a high-end restaurant a short walk from the Capitol, featuring lawmakers poised to take over as the chairmen of House committees.

Apart from the event held by the party fundraising committee, the Democratic ranking members of committees and subcommittees have been raised money aggressively. Several senior Democrats have held multiple fundraisers since Labor

Day, collecting money for their party and Democratic candidates but also giving lobbyists and representatives of the business community opportunities to renew old acquaintances or forge new ones.

Lobbyists are key players on the Washington fundraising scene because they advise clients where to send their political contributions. That is especially true of lobbyists representing corporate clients because corporations are usually less politically savvy and experienced than labor unions or single-issue advocacy groups, such as environmental groups.

"Is there more interest in showing up at a Democratic fundraiser than three months ago? Absolutely," said Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.), who would become chairman of the oversight and investigations subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee. "I've found it easier to do the fundraising than it was three or four months ago."

Democratic staff and allied lobbyists report that there has been heavy interest in attending Democratic fundraisers this month.

For example, a fundraising luncheon that Rep. John Dingell (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the Energy and Commerce Committee, held for the DCCC yesterday was originally geared toward representatives of the energy industry. But organizers later made the decision to open it up to all interest sectors and it was well attended, drawing about 35 participants, most of them lobbyists.

One Democratic lobbyist representing energy sector clients said that in recent weeks he has received calls from many of them looking to give money for Democratic candidates.

"It's been surprising," said the lobbyist. "In years past it's been really difficult to write checks to any Democrat."

Tomorrow, Democrats will wrap up the cram-packed week with a large fundraiser hosted by House Democratic chiefs of staff at the Columbus Club at Union Station. The title of the event, "Countdown to the Majority," reminds many of the lobbyists who will attend that the aides hosting the party could be pulling the strings of power if Democrats win control of the House this fall.

The invitation lists nearly 30 chiefs of staff who will be present at the event, including Elizabeth Sears Smith, chief of staff in the personal office of Rep. Rahm Emaneul (D-Ill.), who chairs the DCCC.

A Democratic lobbyist planning to attend the event, however, explained that the event is not a secret. The lobbyist explained the low-dollar event, which only costs $250 per person, would enable lobbyists who are friendly with Democrats on the Hill but not able to write $1,000 personal checks to participate. Most fundraising events hosted by lawmakers charge more than many of the intended participants can give, he said.

But the lobbyist also acknowledged that the event would strengthen relationships between Democratic aides and the K-Street community.

Democrats may be shy about discussing the mingling between lobbyists and veteran aides in preparation of a possible Democratic takeover of the House because strengthening relationships with the lobbying community does not fit smoothly with their political message for much of this year.

"The Republicans have turned Congress into an auction house, for sale to the highest bidder," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), when Democrats unveiled their Honest Leadership and Open Government initiative at the beginning of the year. "You have to pay to play. That's just not right."

"When a prescription drug bill puts pharmaceutical companies first, senior citizens pay the price for their prescription drugs," she said. "When an energy bill gives tax breaks to oil companies already making historic and obscene profits, Americans pay the price at the pump and with record bills for their home heating oil."

Republicans have attempted to exploit the Democrats' strong rhetoric on lobbyists by warning that Democratic control of the House would be bad for the business community. Republican-allied lobbyists have perpetuated that argument among their business clients.

But Democrats have fought back, in large part by holding meetings between veteran lawmakers and staff and representatives of the business community.

Several ranking Democrats have held multiple fundraisers in D.C. since Labor Day, even though they are not facing tough elections this fall. Rep. John Conyers (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee, held two fundraisers last week. Dingell has held about a half dozen since the end of August, both for his own campaign and the DCCC.

Rep. Jim Oberstar (D-Minn.) has also held several fundraisers this month, but his campaign spokesman said he could not find out how many.

And last week, Democratic leadership aides and senior committees aides held a meeting with business community lobbyists to put their fears at ease.

A lobbyist who attended said that Republicans have been spreading word that a Democratic majority would be "awful on taxes and new regulations."

DOJ_NMG_0070156

He said the purpose of the meeting was to "disabuse [the business community] of that notion," and to show that Democrats would in fact be friendly.

GOP Opponent Asks DOJ For Murtha Probe (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

A Republican challenger to Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) has asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Murtha traded appropriations earmarks for hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from the clients of lobbying firms with close ties to the veteran lawmaker, including one where his brother works.

On Tuesday, Washington County Commissioner Diana Irey, Murtha's GOP opponent, delivered a letter to Mary Beth Buchanan, the U.S. attorney for the Western District of Pennsylvania, requesting that Justice begin a probe of Murtha immediately.

"This is a troubling development — an elected official should never undertake any activity that calls into question his motives," Irey said in a statement. "Nor should he undertake any activity that raises the possibility that he is trading his office for campaign cash."

"This is coming from a very desperate political candidate who is hanging on by her fingernails to try to stay in this race," said Ed Mitchell, Murtha's spokesman.

The allegations about Murtha's relationship with the PMA Group and KSA Consulting — a lobbying firm that employs Murtha's brother, Kit Murtha, as well as a former aide — were first reported by the Los Angeles Times in June 2005.

Since then, some House Republicans have called publicly for an ethics probe of Murtha, although no GOP lawmakers have stepped forward to officially file a complaint against him. Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington recently included Murtha on a list of the most corrupt Members of Congress.

Taxpayers for Common Sense, another government watchdog group, analyzed the 2006 Defense spending bill and found at least 60 earmarks for PMA clients worth more than $95 million. Murtha is the ranking member of the House Appropriations subcommittee on Defense.

"Over the last six years, officials and clients of the PMA Group have contributed roughly $800,000 to Congressman Murtha's campaign fund," Irey said. "In return, they have received at least $95 million in federal contracts, loans, and grants. That's a better than 100-to-1 return on investment."

Mitchell said it was not surprising that defense companies, which make up the bulk of PMA's clients, would give to Murtha due to his position on the Defense subcommittee and his reputation as a strong supporter of national security, despite his more recent turn against the Iraq War.

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), a Murtha ally, became the subject of a federal investigation after a conservative organization wrote the Justice Department seeking a probe of his personal financial holdings. Mollohan was later forced to step down as ranking member of the House ethics committee, but he has kept his seat on the powerful Appropriations Committee.

New Report That Senator Uttered Slurs (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Another acquaintance of Senator George Allen said Tuesday that she heard him use a racial slur in 1976, contradicting a statement he made Monday in an effort to tamp down similar accusations.

Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, called the account by the woman, Ellen G. Hawkins, "another false accusation."

Mr. Allen, a Virginia Republican whose re-election campaign has been knocked off balance by the accusations, said Monday that he did not remember ever using the term and that "it is absolutely false that that was ever part of my vocabulary."

Mrs. Hawkins, who described herself as a rural Virginia housewife and an active Democrat, said in an interview Tuesday that she heard Mr. Allen use the slur repeatedly at a party on election night in 1976. She said Mr. Allen used the term while deprecating the intelligence of the black players on the Washington Redskins football team, which Mr. Allen's father coached. Recalling remarks about its star running back, Larry Brown, Mrs. Hawkins said that Mr. Allen "started in effect bad-mouthing him, saying what a shiftless you-know-what" he was.

She said she remembered the conversation because she was a big fan of the team and was shocked. She said Mr. Allen's statement on Monday was "just plain a lie."

She described her recollections in an e-mail message forwarded to The New York Times. Her former husband, who she said was at the party, did not return a call for comment.

Mr. Wadhams said the encounter “did not happen.” He said that Mr. Allen remained “very good friends” with Mr. Brown and that as governor of Virginia, Mr. Allen had appointed Mr. Brown to the board of visitors at George Mason University.

Mrs. Hawkins is the third acquaintance in two days to recount hearing Mr. Allen use racist slurs. The accusations are the latest twist in events set off when Mr. Allen called a young Democratic campaign operative of Indian descent “macaca.” Critics said the term was a racial pejorative derived from the name of a monkey species. Mr. Allen apologized for any offense and said he had just made up the word.

A college football teammate, Dr. Ken Shelton, has said Mr. Allen used racial slurs and engaged in a racist prank in college in the early 70’s.

An anthropology professor, Christopher Taylor, said that as a graduate student at the University of Virginia he heard Mr. Allen use the epithet.

Mr. Allen’s campaign issued former teammates’ statements saying they did not remember his using the term. The campaign also issued a statement from his former wife, Anne Waddell, who confirmed meeting Mr. Taylor but disputed his recollection. She said Mr. Allen “would never utter such a word.”

Webb Dodges Question On Racial Epithet (AP)

By David Espo

AP, September 26, 2006

Democratic Senate challenger Jim Webb declined to say definitively Tuesday whether he had ever used a common derogatory term to describe blacks, stepping carefully after watching his campaign rival confront charges of racism.

"I don't think that there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips at one time or another in their life," Webb told reporters.

Webb referred to his novel, "Fields of Fire," which aides said includes occurrences of the n-word as part of character dialogue. But he added: "I have never issued a racial or ethnic slur."

Asked for clarification of his original answer, spokeswoman Jessica Smith quoted Webb as saying, "I have never used that word in my general vocabulary or in any derogatory way."

She declined to say whether he had ever used the word apart from when he wrote his book.

Webb fielded questions on the issue after two days of racially charged controversy surrounding Sen. George Allen, a first-term Republican seeking re-election in what has become an unexpectedly close race.

A college teammate of the senator stirred controversy this week when he said that a generation ago, Allen frequently used the n-word when referring to blacks.

Ken Shelton, a receiver on University of Virginia teams quarterbacked by Allen in the early 1970s, also said his teammate once stuffed a severed deer head into a mailbox belonging to a family he knew was black.

"The story and his comments and assertions in there are completely false," Allen responded in an interview with The Associated Press on Tuesday.

"I don't remember ever using that word, and it is absolutely false that that was ever part of my vocabulary."

Last month, Allen's use of the word "macaca" in referring to a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent caused an outcry. The word is considered an ethnic slur in some cultures, but Allen said he did not know that and had simply made up the word.

Webb has generally avoided commenting on the controversy surrounding Allen, telling reporters it was irrelevant to his attempt to illustrate differences in leadership styles.

Webb is the son of a military family, and he moved frequently during his childhood. Smith said he spent considerable time in the South during childhood summers because his father's family owned land in Virginia.

Edwards said the allegations lodged against Allen were "very troubling." He noted that the senator has denied them and said voters will have to decide for themselves where the truth lies.

On Tuesday, political analyst Larry J. Sabato said he didn't personally hear Allen use the epithet when they were classmates at Virginia. In a television interview a day earlier he had said he knew Allen had used the word.

Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics, wrote in an e-mail to The Associated Press: "I didn't personally hear GFA (Allen's initials) say the n-word. My conclusion is based on the very credible testimony I have heard for weeks, mainly from people I personally know and knew in the '70s."

Allen Urged To Focus On Successful Record (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Virginia Republicans say the floundering campaign of U.S. Sen. George Allen should concentrate more on his accomplishments than on attacking his opponent or responding to charges of ethnic insensitivity.

"I have to believe that some of [Democratic nominee James H. Webb Jr.'s] folks are stirring things up behind the scenes, but I think the majority of the blame falls with the Allen camp," said House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith, Salem Republican.

"I think you have to look at some of this stuff and wonder why they don't have him ready to talk about his positive achievements. That's all he has to talk about -- the things George Allen has done," Mr. Griffith said. "He really rewrote Virginia history with welfare reform, education reform, the abolition of parole -- those are three big items."

The Allen campaign yesterday was defending the senator against accusations by a former college football teammate that Mr. Allen regularly used "the N word" to refer to blacks and once crammed a severed deer head into a black family's mailbox after a hunting trip.

Ken Shelton, a radiologist who was a receiver for the University of Virginia in the 1970s when Mr. Allen was quarterback, made the accusations in an article on Salon.com.

In addition, political scientist Larry Sabato said Monday on MSNBC's "Hardball" with Chris Matthews that he thinks that Mr. Allen has used the slur.

Mr. Allen and his campaign staff have denied the accusations.

"The story and [Dr. Shelton's] comments and assertions in there are completely false," Mr. Allen told the Associated Press. "I don't remember ever using that word, and it is absolutely false that that was ever part of my vocabulary."

Allen strategist Christopher J. LaCivita said the senator and Mr. Sabato were not friends and did not associate with each other at the University of Virginia.

"Larry is obviously relying on words he heard from someone else," Mr. LaCivita said. "We believe it's completely inaccurate."

Testimonials from other teammates "contradicting the media's latest salvo" were posted yesterday on the Allen campaign Web site (www.georgeallen.com), which does not highlight the senator's record.

The Allen campaign had been in damage-control mode since the senator's frequent apologies for calling a Democratic staffer "macaca" and Mr. Allen's reaction to a reporter's question about his Jewish heritage.

"Nobody is getting information about issues they might care about," said state Sen. Kenneth Cuccinelli II, Fairfax Republican, adding that the media have driven stories questioning Mr. Allen's character.

"A strong feeling among many experienced campaigners is that you fight the fight where it arises," Mr. Cuccinelli said. "It isn't so much that there is a desire to carry on the campaign this way. This is how it has devolved. ... In my view, the way you deal with the negative, you project positiveness and success."

"From the other side's perspective, the beauty of this is they don't have to talk about issues -- they don't have anything to talk about," he says.

Mr. Cuccinelli said it is interesting that accusations of racial insensitivity are being made now.

"It's not like George Allen just popped up on the scene," he said.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams, who guided John Thune to a 2004 win against U.S. Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle in South Dakota, said the press has given Mr. Webb a "free pass."

Early on, Mr. Allen's positive TV messages shaped his campaign, and he enjoyed a double-digit lead in the polls. He had been one of the Republican Party's most likely presidential candidates in 2008.

Then, at a campaign rally in Southwest Virginia on Aug. 11, he singled out a dark-skinned staffer for Mr. Webb, called him a macaca and told him, "Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia."

Macaca is a racial slur in some European cultures.

Democrats Snarl At Steele In TV Ad, But He Bites Back (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

National Democrats yesterday ran their first TV ad against Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's U.S. Senate bid, prompting an immediate response ad from Mr. Steele.

The ad by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) says Mr. Steele "likes puppies, but he loves President Bush," showing a picture of Mr. Steele and Mr. Bush in a heart-shaped frame.

DOJ_NMG_0070159

Mr. Steele, a Republican, responded by releasing an ad that criticizes his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, for taking money from drug companies and voting against the importation of prescription drugs from Canada.

The DSCC's mention of puppies refers to an ad Mr. Steele released earlier this month warning of negative campaign ads from "the Washington crowd."

Saying that he will be accused of "hating puppies," Mr. Steele says, "For the record, I love puppies," in the ad.

The Steele campaign's strategy has been to pre-empt Democratic attacks, which he says were telegraphed in an internal memo released this spring that advised Democrats to turn Mr. Steele "into a typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African-American candidate."

Mr. Steele is the first black to win statewide office in Maryland.

The DSCC ads had been scheduled to begin airing a month from now and run up to the Nov. 7 general election.

But last week, the DSCC moved up its $1 million ad purchase by one month and presumably will run ads against Mr. Steele for six weeks instead of two weeks.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer has declined to comment about his group's "strategic decisions."

The DSCC ad features playful music to criticize Mr. Steele for supporting the war in Iraq, backing the president's veto of embryonic stem-cell research and opposing abortion.

In his response ad, Mr. Steele says, "You knew they were coming, nasty ads from the Washington crowd." He says that one of the "real differences" between himself and Mr. Cardin is that he supports "cheaper medicine from Canada."

"Congressman Cardin took money from drug companies and voted against cheaper medicine," Mr. Steele says.

Mr. Cardin's spokesman responded last night that "Michael Steele has taken more special-interest money in nine years than Ben Cardin has taken in 22 years.

"If Steele is against gifts from lobbyists, then why does he accept them?" said Oren Shur. "He says he wants to be a different kind of senator? This sounds like the same old Washington hypocrisy to me."

Democrats Dismiss Steele's Puppy Commercial (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The Boston terrier that has figured so prominently in Republican Michael S. Steele's television ad campaign reappeared yesterday in dueling commercials for Maryland's high-profile U.S. Senate contest.

Democrats began airing an ad that called such puppy talk a diversion from Steele's relationship with President Bush and his position on issues such as abortion and stem cell research. Steele, and the growling puppy, were on the air hours later, decrying the Democratic spot as the work of Washington insiders, particularly his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D).

The ad, released by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, is a direct jab at Steele's much-talked-about spot that cast the lieutenant governor as a different kind of politician. In that ad, Steele, looking more like a talk show host than a politician, warns viewers of forthcoming negative ads:

"Grainy pictures and spooky music saying, 'Steele hates puppies' -- and worse. For the record, I love puppies," Steele says, puppy in hand. "And I think you deserve better -- some real ideas for change."

The Democratic response pokes fun at that approach. "It's nice that Steele likes puppies, but he's running for the United States Senate, and it's important to know where he stands on the issues."

The screen repeatedly flashes a photo of Steele and Bush shoulder to shoulder as the announcer tells viewers that Steele supports the Iraq war, opposes abortion and backed the president's decision to veto a bill that would have increased federal funding for embryonic stem cell research.

"Michael Steele: He likes puppies, but he loves George Bush," the announcer concludes as the photo of Steele and Bush is framed in a heart.

The effort to link the Republican candidate to the unpopular president is echoed in contests across the country and in Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley's challenge to Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R).

In a state in which Democrats outnumber Republicans in voter registration by nearly 2 to 1, Steele has consistently played down his party affiliation and support from the White House. He held a rally for Democratic supporters last week in Baltimore and unveiled signs with the logo "Steele Democrat."

Steele's quick retort yesterday labels the Democratic spots as "nasty ads from the Washington crowd." He brings back the puppy, which growls in agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0070160

Steele says he wants to legalize the importation of cheaper prescription drugs from Canada, while Cardin voted against such a measure in Congress. He points out that Cardin has raised campaign cash from special interests, including pharmaceutical companies. Steele goes on to say that he would ban lawmakers from accepting gifts from lobbyists -- although he doesn't address campaign contributions.

"Want more of the same? I'm not your candidate," Steele says. "But if you're ready for change, then I'm your man."

Oren Shur, a spokesman for Cardin, called the assertions in the ad "blatantly hypocritical," noting that the Ehrlich administration did nothing to support Democratic efforts to import Canadian drugs and that Steele has taken gifts from lobbyists.

Both Cardin and Steele have raised campaign money from drug companies and collected hundreds of thousands of dollars from political action committees. Steele's fundraising efforts have also been helped by "Team Steele," a group of lobbyists assigned to bundle PAC contributions.

The 'Moderate Republican' Scam (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Republican of Rhode Island, is seeking reelection in his heavily Democratic state by insisting he's not really a Republican, or at least not part of the gang responsible for the decade's debacles. He didn't even vote for George W. Bush in 2004, he protests. He cast his vote for George H.W. Bush -- a kinder, gentler, more prudent, less strident Republican.

Big deal.

It matters not a damn whom Lincoln Chafee chose to support for president. His vote was one of roughly 435,000 cast in Rhode Island in the 2004 presidential election, and roughly 122 million cast nationwide. The election in which his vote did matter was that for majority leader of the Senate. There, he was one of just 100 electors, in a Senate nearly evenly divided. After this November's elections, control of the Senate may well hang by a single vote.

And if Chafee truly wished to alter the course of his party and his country in the spirit of his vote for Poppy Bush, he would, if reelected, cast his vote for majority leader when the new Senate convenes for Bob Dole or Howard Baker -- former Republican leaders who showed a decent respect for reality and an interest in doing the nation's business.

Rather than support an administration lapdog such as Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, the Republican whip, whom his party will probably put forth to run the Senate next January, Chafee would vote for some old-school GOP pol. Rather than just announce he's against the war and appalled by torture, he'd vote to put the Senate in the hands of someone with enough gumption and wisdom to stand up to a president who's hellbent on a war that's lost its purpose and who believes America should torture its prisoners either because it makes a nifty wedge issue to use against the Democrats or because he actually believes torture is an acceptable U.S. policy. (Or, to give the president the benefit of the doubt, both.)

Chafee and Maine's Olympia Snowe and such deathbed converts to moderation as Ohio's Mike DeWine are seeking reelection to the Senate by claiming that they represent a Republicanism less rabid than the Bush-Rove strain. They point to individual votes in which they broke with the president and flouted the party line. But those votes have been negated a hundred times over by their votes to make Bill Frist the majority leader, just as they would be negated when the new Senate takes office in 2007 if the moderates backed any Republican unwilling to make a fundamental break with Bush and Bushism.

The issue isn't the individual voting records of Frist and McConnell, which are indistinguishable from each other and define the mainstream of today's gorge-the-rich, drown-the-poor, stay-the-course Republicanism. The issue is that under the control of the Republicans, both the Senate and the House have abandoned their constitutionally mandated obligation to oversee executive branch endeavors, most especially endeavors gone as awry as the war in Iraq. The issue is that under Republican control, both houses have abandoned any effort to address America's real problems.

The House and Senate vote to ban flag-burning and gay marriage but never quite find the time to slow the rising costs of health care or raise the minimum wage or mandate fuel efficiency standards lest the polar ice cap melt. Chafee, Snowe and DeWine readily admit that a melted polar ice cap would be troublesome; they will fight it tooth and nail. But come time to vote for majority leader, they always vote for a leader of a party in thrall to big oil.

Problem is, Chafee and his moderate band are an ever weaker force in a party whose very essence is extreme, whose electoral strategy is solely to mobilize its base, whose legislative strategy is never to seek votes across party lines. And unless these moderates boldly go where they have not gone before and cast their vote for majority leader (and I don't mean in caucus, I mean on the Senate floor) for someone other than the nominee of their party caucus, they are not moderates at all. They are loyal and indispensable foot soldiers in the Republicans' continuing campaign to drag the nation rightward and backward.

And guess what. The moderates will vote for the extremist. "Moderate," after all, is only an adjective; "Republican" is a noun. Chafee, Snowe, the whole lot of them, are moderate enablers of an extremist party. That leaves those voters in Rhode Island, Maine, Ohio and other states where these self-proclaimed Republican moderates are running only one choice if they seek a Congress to check and balance the president, if they want a more moderate nation: Vote for the Democrat.

RNC Takes Lead In Key Senate Tilts (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

The Republican National Committee already has devoted close to a third of its advertising budget this fall to just three critical Senate races, with all indications that the committee hopes to build a firewall around those states to ensure the chamber's GOP majority.

In the division of financial labor among the three national GOP committees, the RNC is focusing its nearly $30 million advertising war chest on the battleground Senate races in Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee, according to Federal Election Commission records and interviews with a handful of top Republican operatives.

While aides warned that the state of play could change in the final six weeks of the campaign, several GOP strategists said that the current plan was for the RNC to continue focusing its television campaign on those three states.

FEC records bear out that plan so far, with the RNC showering more than $3.8 million in independent expenditures in those states in recent weeks — $2.8 million of that aimed at Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), who is trying to unseat Sen. Mike DeWine (R).

According to Democratic sources involved in media purchases, the RNC also has reserved another $4.7 million worth of ads in Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee, devoting more than $8.5 million worth of independent expenditures reserved for just those states so far.

Aides at the RNC declined to confirm or deny the spending figures for the independent expenditure program, citing laws that mandate it be run as a separate entity by separate workers, but noted that the committee plans an aggressive financial push in Congressional races.

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman publicly has declared that he will spend at least $60 million on Congressional midterms this fall, with the money about evenly split between financing get-out-the-vote efforts for all federal races and for the television air wars. But Mehlman and his aides have declined to spell out where their resources — which are vastly larger than the Democratic National Committee's — would be spent.

"We're going to be spending north of $60 million on politics this fall. We'll be using our financial advantage to help make sure that we maintain our majorities in the House and the Senate," said Brian Jones, an RNC spokesman.

However, other strategists said this week that the RNC would be spending its entire independent expenditure allocation on Senate races.

The RNC will be helping out House Republican candidates through the more than $30 million it is spending on the GOTV effort, known as the 72-hour program, and the committee also is helping House candidates by giving many campaigns $77,000 in coordinated expenditures that national committees are allowed to contribute.

The National Republican Congressional Committee has its own IE unit, which will be the sole vehicle for ads emanating from Washington, D.C., for House races, according to several sources.

"It's equal financial help for both [the NRSC and NRCC]. It's just easier for the RNC to help for an IE unit for Senate races," one GOP strategist explained, noting that several dozen House races remain highly competitive in the home stretch of the campaign.

Some aides explained the decision of RNC officials to focus its ad budget on the Senate races in Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee as both practical and politically expedient given the importance of keeping the chamber's majority.

Independent analysts, as well as party operatives when speaking privately, rate Sens. Rick Santorum (Pa.), Conrad Burns (Mont.) and Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) as the most endangered Republican incumbents. However, even if all three of those GOP Senators were to lose, Democrats would still have only 48 seats.

In addition to winning those three GOP seats, Democrats must hold all of their seats — including the suddenly endangered seat in New Jersey — and also claim Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee to reach 51. GOP strategists realize that winning two of the three seats guarantees their majority — a big part of the reason the RNC is taking a major role in support of DeWine, Sen. Jim Talent (Mo.) and Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, the GOP nominee in Tennessee.

With the RNC leveraging up to $30 million on TV in Senate races, that would more than negate the financial edge that the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has enjoyed over the National Republican Senatorial Committee. At the end of July, the DSCC had a more than $15 million cash-on-hand advantage over the NRSC, and, with a spending spree beginning in August, held an $11 million advantage at the end of last month.

The RNC's independent expenditures are being marshalled by Terry Nelson, who served as the political director for Bush-Cheney '04, while the NRSC's program is being run by Curt Anderson.

The NRSC's IE program is going to be spread across many states, with a focus on states such as Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Montana, as well as other competitive races, such as New Jersey and Maryland, where the GOP believes it has pickup chances. "We're going to put more into more states overall," one Senate Republican strategist said.

The future IE allocations for both the RNC and NRSC could shift because of the political chess match that Republicans are engaging in with Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the DSCC chairman.

The DSCC announced a new round of ads Tuesday in Tennessee, Rhode Island and Maryland. To date, Schumer has not sent any of his committee's IE money into Virginia, where Sen. George Allen (R) has suffered a series of self-inflicted mistakes that have allowed his opponent, Jim Webb (D), to make it a very close race. While Virginia previously had been considered safe ground for Allen by both parties, Democrats may want to put money into the Old Dominion, which might prompt a counter-action by one of the GOP committees.

However, Republicans anxiously are eyeing New Jersey, the most expensive race in the nation this year, where Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) has found himself trailing in the polls to state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R). GOP operatives are waiting to see if the DSCC has to shift dollars away from a GOP-held seat to defend Menendez.

The RNC-NRSC effort was most successful so far in Rhode Island, where Chafee beat back a primary challenge from Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey (R).

While the RNC ran the GOTV effort, the NRSC spent more than $500,000 in the campaign's waning days from its IE budget on TV ads, ad production and polling in support of Chafee, according to a database of IE expenses compiled from FEC reports by PoliticalMoneyLine.

In addition, the NRSC spent almost $60,000 on direct mail against Laffey, who national Republicans dubbed too conservative to have a chance at winning in liberal-leaning Rhode Island.

Whether the IE finances are coming from the RNC or the NRSC, each state with a critical Senate race has the same team of media consultants, pollsters and direct-mail firms working in it. In Tennessee, for example, where Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) is squaring off against Corker, the media consultant for IE spending is Scott Howell, while the Tarrance Group is handling polling.

In some instances, the RNC and NRSC will spend in the same state, as is the case in Missouri, where the NRSC just launched a more than $1 million campaign largely focused on attacking Democratic nominee Claire McCaskill.

Also, at the end of August, the NRSC dropped more than $600,000 worth of attack ads in Ohio against Brown.

In total, the two GOP committees have spent at least $3.3 million against Brown, with millions more in reserve.

Bachmann: NRCC Overdrive (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

Republicans believe Minnesota's 6th Congressional district is solid GOP turf, but given the unfavorable political climate they have endured this cycle, they are not taking it for granted.

The National Republican Congressional Committee paid more than $310,000 to begin running ads Monday in the suburban and exurban Twin Cities district to bash Democratic nominee Patty Wetterling.

Wetterling, who gained national prominence as a child safety advocate after her son was kidnapped in 1989, lost to Rep. Mark Kennedy (R) 54 percent to 46 percent in 2004.

Despite the drubbing Kennedy gave Wetterling and Republicans' public confidence in their nominee to replace him, state Sen. Michele Bachmann, the NRCC has spent almost $500,000 on ads and direct-mail pieces hammering Wetterling since mid-August.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has yet to run independent ads or drop mail pieces in the district.

"Outside groups have been pouring money into this race on behalf of Patty Wetterling," Jonathan Collegio, a NRCC spokesman, explained. "This is an important race for the NRCC, and in the end we want to be decisive with our win."

Tom Horner, a veteran GOP operative in Minnesota who is not working on any campaigns, said the NRCC is just being smart.

"I don't think any race for an open seat in Minnesota is a slam dunk for Republicans in 2006," Horner said. "I think Minnesota still is a state closely divided.

"With that kind of an electorate in this kind of an environment where there is at least the potential for a Republican backlash ... no Republican can take anything for granted," said Horner, who is now a partner with the Minnesota-based public affairs firm Himle Horner.

Horner said 6th district voters definitely lean Republican and, more importantly, tend to be socially conservative.

DOJ_NMG_0070163

"I do think though that right now Michele Bachmann is the leader and remains the favorite," he said. "Issues like abortion and same-sex marriage are more important in the 6th," which plays to Bachmann's strengths, he said.

Bachmann is an ardent social conservative and championed amending the state constitution to bar same-sex marriage or civil unions during her tenure in the statehouse.

Democrats contend that Wetterling's record of advocacy for families and children trumps Bachmann's voting record in the Legislature.

"National Republicans are desperately attacking Patty Wetterling because they know that the choice in this race between Michele Bachmann, who has a record of broken promises on raising taxes, and Patty Wetterling, who is committed to real tax relief for middle-class families, is an easy one for Minnesota voters," said Kate Bedingfield, a DCCC spokeswoman.

Since July, the NRCC has spent almost $27,000 on polling in the district, including about $10,500 on Sept. 13, according to independent expenditure reports filed with the Federal Election Commission. But the committee has declined to release any results.

EMILY's List, a pro-abortion rights political action committee backing Wetterling, is releasing a survey it commissioned on the race today, presumably finding Wetterling hot on Bachmann's heels if not leading.

Collegio said the NRCC's heavy spending in the district is just a counter measure.

"EMILY's List has directed enormous amounts of money to Wetterling's campaign and our expenditures are there to even the playing field," Collegio said.

But when it comes to PAC largesse, Bachmann actually has benefited more than Wetterling.

According to an analysis by PoliticalMoneyLine, about $348,000 of the more than $1.1 million Bachmann raised for the race through Aug. 23 came from PACs. In contrast, about $138,000 of the $1.3 million Wetterling raised came from PACs.

Horner said another factor in the NRCC's desire to bolster Bachmann could be Kennedy's Senate campaign.

Currently he trails Hennepin County Attorney Amy Klobuchar (D) by a substantial margin in the Gopher State's open-seat Senate contest.

"The conventional wisdom going in would have been Michele Bachmann would benefit from Mark Kennedy's service in Congress in that district but as his race is at least perceived to be struggling ... then you start to worry, does it have the opposite effect?" Horner said.

GOP Scandals Dog Ohio Candidate (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

GRANVILLE, Ohio, Sept. 26 -- Joy Padgett, the GOP's new congressional candidate in Ohio, has been in a jam when it comes to finding a big-name Republican who could come to town and bring more than trouble.

Gov. Bob Taft? He was convicted of illegally accepting gifts. GOP gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell? He is getting trounced in the polls. Bob Ney, the current congressman? He admitted taking bribes and then checked himself in for alcohol rehabilitation.

This helps explains Padgett's excitement Tuesday as her lunchtime guest of honor took to the podium outside the historic Granville Inn. It was first lady Laura Bush. The president's approval ratings may be in the drain, but the first lady still regularly scores in the high sixties. She was in town to raise money for Padgett, and to offer the candidate at least a one-day respite from the troubles that her radioactive party affiliation is causing in Ohio's 18th District.

"Joy, who as I just told you was a schoolteacher for 20 years, owns custom-made brass knuckles," the first lady tells an overflow crowd of people who contributed between $100 and $1,000 to Padgett to attend the event. "When Joy says she's a tough campaigner and that she will fight for the people of Ohio, she really means it."

Padgett could use the endorsement. Earlier this month, she won the GOP primary to replace Ney on the November ballot in a district that, under normal circumstances, Republicans win comfortably. But Zack Space, the Democratic candidate, sometimes seems like the least of her problems.

"I am not going to downplay it: Voters are skeptical of everything" in the current political climate, Padgett said in an interview.

Democrats are pressing the scandal issue relentlessly, and it appears to be working with some voters. Vicki Sugar, a Granville resident who attended the Bush fundraiser, said: "This is the first time I have ever felt like I wanted to back out. Does it really matter if I vote Democrat and Republican?"

DOJ_NMG_0070164

In a year when Republicans are battling low poll numbers nationally, there are few places where the GOP brand is more scuffed than in Ohio, where, since President Bush's election-night triumph here two years ago, national and local scandals have polluted the political atmosphere for GOP candidates.

A poll released this week by the Columbus Dispatch indicated Democrats could sweep races for U.S. Senate as well as Ohio governor, auditor, treasurer and secretary of state. This would be a remarkable turnaround after 16 years in which Republicans have enjoyed uninterrupted control of the governorship and dominated most statewide races.

In House races, Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking Republican leader, is facing the toughest race of her career and Padgett, battling in a district President Bush carried with 57 percent of the vote in 2004, is regarded as far from a lock to succeed Ney.

Nationally, it is the Iraq war, excessive spending and other issues that analysts generally regard as the root of the GOP's problems. In the Ohio River Valley, however, troubles can also be attributed to missteps and scandals at the state level. In Indiana, Gov. Mitchell E. Daniels Jr. infuriated voters by privatizing a toll road -- turning the work over to foreign companies -- and trying to adjust the time zone. In Kentucky, Gov. Ernie Fletcher has been dogged by a hiring scandal. They are two of the least popular governors in the country -- and they do nothing but harm GOP candidates in their sates.

Padgett, a 59-year-old state lawmaker from Coshocton, is trying to force the debate away from her party's problems toward policy issues such as immigration that she hopes will offer more favorable terrain. "I am a first-generation -- legal -- American," she said. She supports House legislation to tighten border security and says illegal immigrants should be forced to leave. "They have to come back legally," she said.

Padgett, who has represented 14 of the district's 16 counties, is counting on voters to overlook her self-described "casual" and "not social" relationship with the prison-bound Ney.

"Democrats want to make a lot out of it because they need an issue," she said. "He might be a factor if people chose for him to be."

This is the kind of district Republicans usually dominate in state politics. The Ohio 18th, a mix of small-town farms and mines, stretches from Appalachia to the Columbus suburbs. Margaret Jensen, from nearby Newark, said the GOP troubles are "unfortunate." But she quickly added: "We are die-hard Republicans. We'll never go over to the other side, no matter what."

Space, a 45-year-old lawyer, said the Ohio Republican party and the Iraq war have softened many "nevers" into "maybes." His strategy is to link the GOP hopeful with the GOP congressman so that voters will see "Padgett" on the ballot and think "Ney."

The Democratic candidate said that while he has been trying for months to focus voters' attention on the ethical transgressions committed by Ney, it was not until the lawmaker's recent agreement to plead guilty that it hit home. "The reaction among constituents is that he lied to them," said Space. "It constitutes a betrayal."

Space said voters now are beginning to understand that Ney's actions are not simply the result of one bad seed but rather are indicative of the stranglehold special interests have on the Republican majority. "It is a manifestation of something more malicious," the candidate said.

And, though Padgett rarely mentions Ney by name, Space is convinced that her ties to the legislator will complicate her campaign. Space said that Ney "anointed" Padgett as his replacement. She has said that is not true -- but she has to deny it over and over, underscoring the predicament of Republicans in a year when bad breaks outnumber good by a wide margin.

Campaign 2006: The Battle For Ohio, Round Two (TIME)

By Perry Bacon, Jr

Time, September 27, 2006

Just as in 2004, this year's election might come down to what happens in Ohio. But two years later, that's about the only thing that remains the same. A corruption scandal that implicated Republican Governor Bob Taft has sunk his approval ratings to 19%, making him the second-lowest-ranked governor in the country, according to Survey USA. Another corruption scandal forced G.O.P. Congressman Bob Ney to plead guilty to charges of accepting free gifts and meals from lobbyist Jack Abramoff. He's not seeking reelection, putting his House seat in danger for Republicans. And that's not all the problems for the G.O.P. in Ohio. "You've got a national anti-Republican, anti-incumbent sentiment that wasn't there two years ago," says Peter Brown, who surveys Ohio races for the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute. Voters aren't happy about the economy, Iraq or President Bush here either. Even Neil Clark, a veteran G.O.P. lobbyist and former top Republican state senate official, says "The state is poised to have a very bad day for Republicans."

Democratic chances of winning key races here are so high that top officials are trying to guard against activists getting complacent. "There is a danger that we may be too overly confident that there is going to be change," said Susan Gwinn, chairman of the Athens County Democratic Party in southeastern Ohio. "That's my biggest concern. I think, frankly, tighter numbers for us at the top of the ticket would probably be more mobilizing. I've heard people who say, 'I am not going to give any more money to that person, because he is so far ahead." And Democrats remain worried that the G.O.P. will outperform them at getting voters to the polls, much as the Republican turnout operation helped defy the oddsmakers in 2004. Both Democrats and Republicans say a ballot initiative to allow slot machine casino gambling in the state may help to turn out conservatives who would oppose it, although liberals may show up to support a proposed minimum wage increase also on the ballot.

These Ohio races are critical. Democrats need 15 seats to win back the House, and three of their best chances are in Ohio. In the Senate, where they need six seats, this is a place where they could win one. And both parties want the governor on their side come 2008, when the Presidential election could again be decided here. Not surprisingly, each party is active in the state, and outside groups are heavily involved as well. Both the liberal MoveOn.org and the conservative Chamber of Commerce have been running ads in the key races, and party operatives will be on the ground in the next few weeks. Here's a closer look at some of the key Ohio races:

SENATE

Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) v. Senator Mike DeWine (R): This race will say a lot about how both parties will perform at the polls in 2006, and perhaps 2008 as well. That's because there's nothing particularly compelling about the personal stories of either one of these candidates; they're both career politicians — DeWine served in the state senate, the U.S. House and was lieutenant governor, while Brown was a longtime state representative and the Ohio secretary of state. So it's a straight-ahead battle between two candidates who are emphasizing the same themes their parties are offering nationwide. DeWine and the national Republicans are running ads attacking Brown for his opposition to the Patriot Act, the Bush tax cuts and some measures the G.O.P. has pushed to stop illegal immigration, such as the immigration bill the House passed last year that didn't have a guest worker program. Brown is attacking DeWine for supporting trade agreements like NAFTA that he says have cost jobs in Ohio, backing President Bush on the war and not doing enough to hold down the cost of prescription drugs. Brown has long been a critic of these trade deals, which more moderate Democrats such as President Clinton have in the past supported, and if his populist rhetoric works, expect to see other candidates adopt such anti-trade rhetoric in the Midwest in 2008 to appeal to voters worried about the continuing decline of manufacturing jobs. DeWine has a history of winning close races, and for all the attention focused on it as a swing state, Ohio has long had two Republican senators and a Republican governor. But nearly all the polls over the last two months have shown Brown ahead.

HOUSE

Rep. Deborah Pryce (R) vs. Mary Joe Kilroy (D)

If Kilroy, a Franklin County Commissioner, wins this race, it would be the biggest individual victory for the House Democrats on election night, because Pryce, as the chairman of the House Republicans, is the No. 4 member of the leadership team. The Democrats see this district in Central Ohio as an opportunity to make a huge splash, as MoveOn.org and Americans United for Change, which opposes Bush's plan to revamp Social Security with private accounts, have been among the groups attacking Pryce in ads.

This race gets at one of the central questions of this campaign: will voters choose to dump incumbents who they think are perfectly nice people and good members to send a message to Washington and President Bush? Pryce is well-liked in the district and won 62% of the vote there in 2004, even while Bush and Kerry were split about evenly. And over the last few months, she's tried to reassure voters of her centrist views, by voting for and bragging about her support of embryonic stem cell research and raising the minimum wage, which most of the House Republican leadership opposed. Of course, on almost all the big issues, starting with the Iraq War, Pryce has supported Bush, and that's what Kilroy is hoping can sink the seven-term incumbent.

GOVERNOR

Ohio Secretary of State Kenneth Blackwell (R) vs. Rep. Ted Strickland (D)

This was supposed to be one of the most interesting races in the country, as the two candidates both have resumes that make them stick out in their parties. Blackwell is the controversial Ohio Secretary of State, whom many Democrats blame for problems some voters had, such as long lines at polling places, on Election Day in 2004. He's one of the major figures in the rise of the conservative, evangelical wing of the Ohio Republican Party and won a difficult primary over a more moderate opponent. And he's one of the few African-American Republicans running statewide in the country. Democrats are often unfairly described as a party that doesn't appeal to religious voters, as African Americans attend church in high numbers and tend to vote Democratic, but Ted Strickland is an unusual candidate as well: the congressman has a master's degree in divinity, has worked as an administrator at a Methodist children's home and talks openly about his faith in campaign ads. Both candidates were supposed to reshuffle the usual voting patterns, as Blackwell has showed up in black churches while Strickland has appealed to evangelicals who normally back Republicans. Only Strickland has succeeded so far. In polls, Strickland is getting 40% of the vote from self-described white evangelical Christians; John Kerry got fewer than 25% in 2004. By contrast, recent polls show Blackwell getting from 15% to 20% of the black vote, about the same as Bush got. Of course, this is the race most affected by the Taft scandal, since Blackwell is running to keep the governor's office in Republican hands. Barring a stunning turnaround, he won't: polls show Strickland ahead by 12 to 21 points.

HOUSE

Rep. Steve Chabot (R) vs. John Cranley (D)

The Democrats have adopted a risky strategy in a few key races: having a guy who already lost to the incumbent once try again. Cranley won only 45% of the vote in 2000 in this district near Cincinnati when he took on Chabot the first time. The six-term Chabot won 60% of the vote in 2004, but this is a close district in which Bush got about 51% of the vote in 2004. This is also a much more difficult year for Republicans, and Cranley has had six more years to establish himself as a city councilman in Cincinnati.

So Chabot, like other Republicans in tight races, is changing the subject from Iraq. He's touting his work to cut wasteful spending, while accusing Cranley of supporting "amnesty" for illegal immigration. Cranley is trying to keep voters focused on the problems at hand, running ads blaming Chabot for high gas prices and linking his opponent with voters' frustrations on other issues such as the increasing national debt.

HOUSE

Zach Space (D) v. Joy Padgett (R)

In the race to replace Bob Ney, State Senator Joy Padgett has one advantage; a conservative district in eastern Ohio where President Bush won 57% of the vote in 2004. The challenge for her will be to not allow Space to define her as being close to the Bobs. Space, a lawyer, will be trying hard, as ad an he started running last week calls Padgett "Bob Taft and Bob Ney's handpicked candidate."

Hospital Defends Promotion, Raise For Senator's Wife (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Officials at the University of Chicago Hospitals on Tuesday explained a large salary jump for Sen. Barack Obama's wife shortly after he took office as a normal promotion that reflected expanded duties in her job as a liaison with the South Side community surrounding the medical center.

Michelle Obama was promoted to vice president for external affairs in March 2005, two months after her husband took office in the Senate. According to a tax return released by the senator this week, the promotion nearly tripled her income from the hospitals from $121,910 in 2004 to $316,962 in 2005.

Hospitals spokesman John Easton said Obama's salary was in line with the compensation received by the not-for-profit medical center's 16 other vice presidents.

A tax return for the hospitals covering the 12 months ended June 30, 2005, shows most of the organization's vice presidents earning between $291,000 and $362,000.

Easton said the hospitals had made a determined effort to deepen their connections to the surrounding community, beginning in 2002, when Obama was hired for the new position of executive director for community affairs.

"There was a real initiative by the university and the hospitals to have a real relationship with the community," Easton said. "Over time, she developed a staff. … It went from zero staff to Michelle and 10 staff."

Michael Riordan, who was University of Chicago Hospitals president at the time, said he had planned early on for the position to evolve into a vice president's post as a way of showing the organization's commitment to community outreach.

"I knew where I wanted to go with this position," said Riordan, who now is the top executive of the Greenville Hospital System in South Carolina. "I wanted to identify someone to grow into it."

"She was hired before Barack was Barack," Riordan said. "She is worth her weight in gold, and she is just terrific."

Easton said the hospitals' management had discussed a promotion to vice president with Obama previously but that she had been reluctant to undertake the commitment until her husband's Senate campaign was finished. In part, she wanted to wait until her family had made a decision on whether to maintain their primary residence in Illinois, which they did, and she had a better sense of the demands on her time as a senator's wife, he said.

At the time Obama was promoted to vice president, Easton added, she also had "at least one other, more lucrative offer" from a potential employer, though he declined to identify the competing organization.

Easton said the hospital management believed she merited the promotion based on a series of achievements. They included expansion of the institution's women and minority vendor purchases, rejuvenation of its volunteer program and work she did to help set up a collaborative effort with South Side clinics and doctors' offices to provide primary care for low-income residents who otherwise would seek treatment at the emergency room.

DOJ_NMG_0070167

In explaining her salary increase, Easton and a spokesman for the senator both stressed her educational background, which includes an undergraduate degree from Princeton University and a law degree from Harvard.

Obama's new salary is significantly higher than her annual earnings during the seven prior years for which the Obamas have released their taxes. During those years, her wages ranged from a low of $50,343 in 1999 to a high of $121,910 in 2004.

After Obama's graduation from Harvard Law School in 1988, she worked for a few years as an associate at the corporate law firm Sidley Austin in Chicago. Such law practices typically pay lucrative salaries.

But after a few years, Obama moved into a series of positions in local government and non-profit organizations, which typically pay lower salaries.

According to a biography supplied by the medical center, she moved from the law firm to work first as an assistant to Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and then as the assistant commissioner of planning and development.

In 1993 she became the founding executive director of Public Allies Chicago, an AmeriCorps national service program. She later worked as an associate dean of student services at the University of Chicago, a position she held until she was hired by the University of Chicago Hospitals.

Bill Would Reimburse States For Printing Alternate Ballots (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Three Senate Democrats proposed emergency legislation on Tuesday to reimburse states for printing paper ballots in case of problems with electronic voting machines on Nov. 7.

The proposal is a response to grass-roots pressures and growing concern by local and state officials about touch-screen machines. An estimated 40 percent of voters will use those machines in the election.

"If someone asks for a paper ballot, they ought to be able to have it," said Senator Barbara Boxer of California, a co-sponsor of the measure with Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin.

Republican leadership aides were skeptical about the prospects for the measure. It would have to advance without opposition from any senator and then make it through the House in the short time available before Election Day.

Dozens of states are using optical-scan and touch-screen machines to comply with federal laws intended to phase out lever and punch-card machines after the hanging-chads confusion of the 2000 presidential election. Widespread problems were reported with the new technology and with the poll workers using them this year in primaries in Arkansas, Illinois, Maryland, Ohio and elsewhere.

Local and state officials have expressed concern that the new systems might not be ready to handle increased turnouts. Election experts fear that the lack of a paper trail with most touch-screen machines will leave no way to verify votes in case of fraud or computer failure.

Last week, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. of Maryland, a Republican, joined the skeptics, saying he lacked confidence in his state's new $106 million electronic system and suggesting that state officials offer all voters paper ballots as an alternative.

The proposed federal bill would provide 75 cents for each backup paper ballot that a precinct prints. If ballots are printed for half the 27 million voters expected to use touch-screen machines, Ms. Boxer said, her bill would cost Washington no more than $10.1 million.

Barbara Burt, vice president and director of election reform programs at Common Cause, a good-governance advocacy group, said that the bill would have been stronger if it had required precincts to provide paper ballots in federal elections, but that it was a step in the right direction.

"Lack of funding has been the main excuse that local election officials have used to avoid implementing paper precautions," Ms. Burt said. "This takes that excuse away from them entirely."

Ms. Boxer said mandating all precincts to provide paper ballots would have been impractical.

"I think Big Brother dictating something to local jurisdictions is a big mistake, because they will balk at it," she said. "What we're saying here is that you run your own elections, and we are going to help you run it properly. If local officials don't take advantage of the option to take precautions, then they're the ones on the line."

Brad Friedman, a liberal blogger and longtime critic of electronic voting, said that incentives to print paper ballots would help, but that without a federal mandate some voters would still have no choice but to use touch-screens.

On Thursday the Committee on House Administration, which has a role in overseeing election procedures, will hold a hearing to consider whether all voting equipment should produce a paper record that lets voters verify how they voted.

Ensign To Lead NRSC (RC)

By John Bresnahan And Erin P. Billings

DOJ_NMG_0070168

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

Sen. John Ensign will take the helm of the National Republican Senatorial Committee at the start of the 110th Congress, putting the Nevada Republican on the front line of what is certain to be a difficult election cycle for the GOP.

Republican leaders have been scrambling for nearly two months to recruit the next NRSC chairman after Sen. John Thune (S.D.), who was expected to assume the post, opted against a bid. Thune shocked the GOP Conference in early August when he announced he wasn't interested in the position, citing the travel burden and family commitments.

Ensign, who also declined the NRSC post when initially approached by party leaders, said he changed his mind after consulting with friends, colleagues, and his wife, Darlene.

"It's a big challenge, there's no question, it's a big challenge, but it's an important job," Ensign said in an interview Tuesday. "I think it's a job that I'm up to. I feel very privileged to even serve in a position like that."

Ensign added: "Nobody likes asking for money, that's the reason that a lot of people don't want to do it. I think it's an important job, and you have to raise the resources to get your folks elected."

The 48-year-old Ensign, who was first elected to the Senate in 2000 after two terms in the House, openly acknowledged the hurdles he will face as NRSC chairman next cycle.

Twenty-one Republican Senators are up for re-election in 2008, versus just 12 Democrats. When combined with the certain competition for donor dollars from a presidential campaign and a renewed battle for the House, the NRSC's ability to raise money and elect its candidates will be tested severely.

"I know I'm up against it," Ensign said. "It's a tough cycle. Twenty-one [GOP Senators] up. I realize that. I realize all the negative parts about it, and that makes it all the more exciting to me because it makes it that much more difficult."

The Nevada Republican offered praise for Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), the current chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. Schumer, who has been able to pull the Democrats into financial parity with the NRSC after years of trailing in the money race, is believed in some quarters to be prepared to return to the DSCC for another cycle, although no formal decision has been announced yet.

"Chuck Schumer is a very worthy opponent," Ensign said.

Ensign said his original decision not to accept the NRSC position was based more on the fact that it would keep him away from his family when the Senate was out of session, rather than any lack of desire to serve in the GOP leadership.

"I wasn't interested because of personal considerations, not because I didn't want the job," Ensign said. I always wanted to do the job."

The Nevada Republican said he talked with several former NRSC chairmen about the demands of the job and was reassured that he could tailor it to fit his own personal style.

"Some chairman traveled very little, some traveled a lot," said Ensign, who has three children. Ensign said he and his wife "spent the last couple weeks exploring it, what's entailed, and I laid it all out for her. She's very enthusiastic in her support and that was very critical for me."

Several people close to Ensign, whom he would not identify, also told him to accept the post.

"It was personal friends of mine who told me to reconsider," he said. Ensign then held further discussions with some of his Senate colleagues, and by last weekend, had decided to inform party leaders that he would accept the job.

Ensign met with Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the presumptive Senate Republican leader in the next Congress, on Tuesday. The two huddled for about 30 minutes, during which Ensign "laid out his plan for 2008 and the role of the NRSC chair," said Don Stewart, McConnell's spokesman.

"I have discussed this with Sen. McConnell," Ensign admitted, although he would not go into further detail, including any discussions he may have had with retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

While McConnell has declined to endorse anyone for a leadership position heading into 2007, and the GOP Conference still must formally approve Ensign as the NRSC chairman, no other Republicans have thrown their hat in the ring, making it Ensign's by default. Senators who are "in cycle" are ineligible for the post, eliminating a huge chunk of the conference from consideration.

"This is an outstanding choice," said Brian Nick, spokesman for Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), current chairwoman of the NRSC. "Sen. Ensign is already a star in the Republican Conference. And his willingness to step up to the plate to tackle this incredibly challenging endeavor will be a huge benefit to Republicans."

Ensign's decision to seek the NRSC post leaves the vice chairman position open to Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), the only other candidate for that job, at least for the time being.

Many in the Republican Conference viewed Cornyn as the frontrunner for the position, a sentiment which could have tipped Ensign's decision to vie for the NRSC slot.

DOJ_NMG_0070169

But in itself, the NRSC chairmanship can be a stepping stone to elected leadership. Both Frist and McConnell served stints as NRSC chairman, and Ensign's decision to accept what is sure to be a tough role in a difficult election cycle may earn him support within the Conference.

Ensign, a 1981 graduate of Oregon State, was a veterinarian before first coming to Congress in 1994. A born-again Christian, Ensign narrowly lost a bitter 1998 Senate race to now Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), falling by just 428 votes following a statewide recount.

In February 1999, former Sen. Dick Bryan (D-Nev.), announced that he would not seek re-election in 2000. Ensign immediately jumped into the race, and won a solid 10 point victory over Democratic lawyer Ed Bernstein.

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico insists that he's focused only on helping Democrats win elections this year and won't decide until next year whether to run for president.

But over scrambled eggs and sausage Tuesday morning, he gave reporters a preview of the distinctive campaign he'd run - and how much he'd differ from likely rival Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

He boasts a decidedly different resume. He's arguably more candid. And he's definitely funnier.

"I haven't made a decision," said Richardson, 58. "I will make a decision early next year."

Later, however, he ticked off the changes in the Democratic presidential primary calendar and how Western states could play a bigger role in picking the 2008 nominee - states that happen to be in his backyard. Was he already mapping his campaign? "I'm just kind of observing how it happens," he said, his smile giving way to a knowing laugh.

Richardson came to Washington to talk about his work as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association and the prospects for this year's 36 gubernatorial elections.

He's on the ballot himself. But he's coasting toward re-election to a second term, confident enough that he can tour the country helping other candidates for governor - and coincidentally earning the gratitude of potentially powerful pols who might be able to help him in 2008.

As governor, he's built a record that could serve as the centerpiece of a presidential campaign aimed at holding blue states and picking up red states. He's cut taxes. He declared an illegal immigration state of emergency. He dramatically increased death benefits for his state's National Guardsmen killed in Iraq, a move being followed by 36 other states.

"Being a governor is the best job I've ever had," he said. "A governor can actually do things. You can build schools. You can create jobs. You can give health care to little kids. We were able in New Mexico to insure every child under 5."

Richardson is keenly aware that the country tends to elect governors, not senators, to the presidency. Four of the last five presidents were governors first. No senator has been elected since John F. Kennedy in 1960.

"When you're in Congress, you don't have to worry about fiscal issues, about management. You're kind of voting, you're floating around," he said.

But Richardson would be the only one who also has foreign policy experience - often a weakness for governors. He served as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations in 1997-98 and keeps his hand in international affairs. This summer, he flew to Sudan to win the release of two journalists who were arrested while reporting in Darfur.

Personally, Richardson is very different from Clinton and other potential rivals.

For one, he's more candid.

As DGA chairman, he laughed that he came to the press breakfast "to give you the most positive spin, in case you haven't figured that out."

Belying that jest, he acknowledged that, if the election were held today, Democrats would pick up governors' offices in states such as Colorado, Massachusetts, New York and Ohio, but fall short in such states as California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Minnesota, South Carolina and Texas.

He insisted that Democrats could and would prevail in many of those states - but not all politicians would concede that their party would lose in them if the elections were today.

Finally, Richardson likes to share a laugh.

DOJ_NMG_0070170

Take his comments on the growing voting power of Hispanics. "They're everywhere. I was just in Maine. I met the three of them. They came to the airport to see me," said Richardson, whose mother is Mexican.

The candor and laughs could fade if Richardson gets in the race and starts getting the much tougher scrutiny that probably helped turn Clinton defensive. But it's also possible that his warmer personality could help him weather the onslaught better.

Bill Richardson (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson came to a Monitor sponsored breakfast on Tuesday in two roles - chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association and potential presidential candidate.

As chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association, Richardson talked up his party's prospects in the 36 statehouse races that will be decided this November.

"I believe we will win the House of Representatives, the Senate probably [is] a little more difficult," Richardson said. "I can honestly say I believe we will win a majority of governorships this year.... We will win in New York. We will win in Massachusetts. We will win in Colorado. We will win in Ohio. We will win in Arkansas. We have some very competitive toss ups in Nevada [and] Florida. We will win in Maryland. I would put Maryland in the 'feel confident' [category]."

Another governor's race where Richardson is confident is New Mexico. Although he is running for reelection, Richardson felt confident enough to take time out for a swing through several Eastern states to campaign for Democratic gubernatorial candidates.

Richardson was also in Washington as someone pondering a move from the state house to the White House. The governor told reporters at the breakfast that he "will make a decision early next year" on whether to run for president. But he is already clearly preparing for a presidential run.

For example, Richardson instantly offered up a highly detailed plan when asked what he would do about Iraq if he were president.

Here is a key portion of his response: "I would set a timetable for withdrawal. I would couple that with a political solution of the three ethic groups forcing them to have a political solution. There is no military solution. Specifically, I would divide up the oil revenue, the cabinet ministries and force them to come up with a new political framework. I would also study Senator Biden's federation [proposal]. I think that may be ultimately the right solution."

Richardson continued: "I would set up a Middle East peace conference that would deal with civil administration and reconstruction of Iraq.... Muslim and European nations would be part of that. I would then redeploy [US] troops, leave a residual force in Iraq [and] put [troops] where we really need them, [in] Afghanistan. I would put others in Gulf States to deal with international terrorism threats. And I would also use a large part of those financial budgets and reserves that we use in Iraq on homeland security in this country. This country is not fully protected. I would emphasize port security. I would emphasize security of our subways [and] our aircraft. I would put money in detection of those liquids that became such a problem...."

Iraq is playing a role in this year's governors races, Richardson said. He said Democrats are riding what he called a "2 percent wave" of voter preference in which the war in Iraq plays a key role.

"I think the Iraq war has a large part to do with that 2 percent, frustration over the Iraq war, frustration over the competence of the Republican administration," Richardson said. "I think all of that combines to help candidates at the state and federal level.... I think the Iraq war also is a factor in governors races. Not that every governor has a position on it. But I do think the Iraq war has coat tails ... that are benefiting Democrats. It is sort of a 'Republicans have been in office too long and they have botched this war and [voters are] going to take it out on Republican candidates.' I see that across the board."

In the longer term, Richardson expects the growth in the country's Hispanic population to help Democrats. "I think President Bush did make some inroads with Hispanic voters in the last election. Maybe 4 percent," Richardson said.

But he added, "I believe that is going to be eroded with a national perception of Hispanics seeing Republicans on the immigration bill wanting to criminalize aliens, wanting to build a fence, wanting to take citizenship away from undocumented workers' kids and having sort of a harsh attitude. So that is the flip side of the wedge issue. And in states with substantial Hispanic populations ... that is going to turn those voters into Democrats and it is going to give Democrats advantages in those states...."

Referring to states with growing Hispanic populations, Richardson said, "My view is that the West is the future of the democratic party - Nevada, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah."

There has been a controversy in the Democratic party over Democratic National Committee chairman Howard Dean spending to rebuild the party in every state. Dean's critics charge that he should focus resources on states with close races. Richardson said, "I am on Dean's side. I think what Howard Dean is doing makes sense.... That is what we should concentrate on. The DNC's role is to rebuild the state Democratic party. For instance in New Mexico ... because of the DNC we have 4 extra full-time campaign workers that have been there. That is helpful."

Ready To Rumble (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, September 27, 2006

Gotta love it when Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) accidentally come within touching distance and can't escape, but, because other people are watching, have to pretend to be nice to each other.

One such occasion occurred Tuesday, just outside the House Radio-Television Correspondents' Gallery studio where lawmakers often hold press conferences.

Hastert and other Republicans were inside the studio denouncing immigrant gang violence while Pelosi and her gang of Democrats were outside, waiting to get inside, to talk about the new National Intelligence Estimate report showing that the Iraq War has actually expanded terrorism rather than reduced it.

Pelosi, joined by Rep. John Murtha (Pa.), the leader of the Democratic drum beat against the Iraq War, and other Democrats were twiddling their thumbs waiting for Republicans to finish their spiel on gangs when the door opened. Hastert walked out and — voila! — suddenly found himself standing very, very close to Pelosi, who was wearing her signature perma-grin.

Struggling for pleasantries, Hastert said, "Fancy meeting you here!"

Pelosi, still smiling, responded in kind.

"We were talking about gang violence," Hastert said.

"We may have some right here," Pelosi replied. (Yes, still smiling.)

Everyone had a little chuckle, and Hastert went on his way. But we couldn't help but wonder: Who would take whom in a fight between the Speaker and the Minority Leader?

"The wrestling coach still has sharp skills," a GOP leadership aide said, without a trace of partisan bias, of course.

Phony Blogger Fired. A top aide to Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) was forced to resign Tuesday for using Congressional office computers to pose as a liberal on political blogs, in an apparent attempt to undermine Bass' Democratic challenger.

Bass asked longtime aide Tad Furtado to resign after HOH revealed Monday that the operators of two liberal blogs in New Hampshire had traced the suspicious poster's Internet protocol address to the House of Representatives' computer server.

"Tad Furtado posted to political Web sites from my office without my knowledge or authorization and in violation of my office policy," Bass said in a statement. He added that he was referring the matter to the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct "for their review."

House ethics rules prohibit employees from using government resources to engage in campaign activity. Furtado, who had worked for Bass since 1998, posted blog comments under the pseudonym "IndyNH" and "IndieNH." He pretended to be a liberal who didn't think Bass' opponent, Paul Hodes, could win. He suggested that "fellow" liberals follow him by investing their time and money elsewhere — "maybe CT or NY for me — they are at least close by."

Owners of the sites Blue Granite and NH-02 became suspicious and easily traced IndieNH's IP address to the House, where they figured very few offices, and perhaps only one, would have interest in the New Hampshire 2nd district race.

Reid Cherlin, a spokesman for Hodes, the Democratic challenger, told HOH, "This is the No. 2 staffer in Bass' office, and that's very serious. [Resigning] was the appropriate thing to do."

Cherlin wondered whether Furtado was conducting opposition research from Bass' office. Bass spokesman John Billings said categorically that Furtado "was not conducting opposition research from the office."

Bass said in his statement that he had "no knowledge" of his aide's activities, but that "I must ultimately accept responsibility for the actions of my staff. I sincerely apologize to anyone whose websites may have been disrupted by these posts."

Dialing for Dollars. At least we know where Minority Leader Pelosi gets some of her work done: at George's Salon in Georgetown. She was spotted there Saturday getting her hair done while talking a mile a minute on her cell phone, making fundraising calls for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

An aide had papers splayed out all over the floor around Pelosi to help her out with the pitch. (No wonder she's the single largest fundraiser for Congressional Democrats, having raised more than $45 million so far this cycle.)

"She's working so hard she can't even get a haircut in peace!" said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider.

Lantos Hearts Ricky. None of them got to dance with the Latin American pop star, but members of the House International Relations Committee did heap a whole lotta lovin' on "Ambassador" Ricky Martin when he testified before the panel on Tuesday about combating human trafficking.

No one — not even the women on the committee — seemed quite as smitten with the 34-year-old Martin as Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), the panel's ranking member. It was clear: Lantos had a man crush. He was diggin' la vida loca. Big time.

"Let me just say that while my wife of 56 years considers you devastatingly handsome, I think your true beauty lies inside," Lantos said. "Thank you very much, Ricky."

At press time, we were unable to confirm where Lantos and Martin plan to go on their first boys' weekend trip together.

Police Stop Protest At Senate Building (WP)

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The quiet, sunny atrium of the Hart Senate Office Building was transformed into a chaotic scene yesterday when dozens of war protesters filed into the lobby, formed a prayer circle, shouted Scripture and eventually were arrested as Senate staffers hung over railings and crammed glass-walled offices to watch.

Employees in the building and longtime area activists said they had never seen police allow such a demonstration in a government office building, with activists one and two stories up reading the names of the Iraq war dead, civilian and military. The names rang loudly through improvised megaphones into the building's open center. Dozens of police streamed into the atrium and arrested about 35 people, including Rick Ufford-Chase, who until recently was a top official of the Presbyterian Church (USA).

"I've been working here nine years, and I've never seen this much police activity -- except during the anthrax scare," said an employee who did not give his name because he said he had not been authorized to talk to the media.

Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Capitol Police, said: "We don't encourage people to demonstrate in the buildings. . . . I'm not aware of anything unusual about how it was handled on our end."

Thirty-five additional antiwar demonstrators were arrested yesterday around the U.S. Capitol in related protests. Hundreds of antiwar actions have taken place across the country this week as faith-based and other groups push for a timetable for the United States to leave Iraq. Thirty-four people affiliated with the umbrella organization coordinating this week's efforts, Declaration of Peace, were arrested Thursday after they refused to leave the White House without talking with President Bush.

Although leaders of major U.S. denominations have spoken against the Iraq war since it began, such proclamations are becoming louder and more prominent.

"Today was the first time national-level leaders were participating -- not just themselves but calling on members of denominations to join them," said Gordon Clark, coordinator of the D.C.-based National Campaign for Nonviolent Resistance. "And there's a big difference between going to a protest and putting your body on the line and resisting arrest. And that's what they haven't been doing before."

Participating yesterday was Rabbi Arthur Waskow, head of an interfaith dialogue center in Philadelphia and a leader of the Jewish Renewal movement. Arrested in addition to Ufford-Chase was the Rev. Jackie Lynn, president of the Chicago-based Episcopal Peace Fellowship.

Senate staffers watching the demonstration showed neither support nor opposition, simply gawking and taking photos with their cellphones as protesters below sang "We Shall Overcome," read from the Book of Jeremiah and lay on the cold floor as police filed in with plastic handcuffs.

High Court Will Examine Role Of Credit Ratings In Insurance (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court agreed to decide whether insurance companies must tell consumers that their low credit scores resulted in higher rates for coverage.

Insurance companies have faced a wave of class-action lawsuits alleging they violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act by not telling consumers that their low credit scores resulted in higher quotes for insurance coverage. The insurance industry often reviews credit scores in setting coverage rates.

The appeal, filed by Safeco Corp.'s Safeco Insurance Co. of America unit, Berkshire Hathaway Inc.'s Geico General Insurance Co. unit and other insurers, was one of nine that the court yesterday added to its workload before its term starts Monday. The companies are challenging a decision by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco that said companies must tell consumers when credit scores result in higher insurance rates. The lower court also said companies can be found liable for violating federal credit laws even without meeting a tougher "willful" legal standard that requires the companies know they were breaking the law. Companies face up to $1,000 in actual damages plus punitive damages for violation of the federal law.

Safeco Insurance v. Burr and Geico General Insurance v. Edo

The high court also said it will decide whether county municipalities can force trash haulers to bring waste to publicly owned facilities for processing. The case involves challenges by six trash-hauling companies that challenged the solid-waste flow-control laws of Oneida and Herkimer counties in upstate New York. The two counties had passed laws requiring haulers operating in the area to bring trash to waste facilities the municipalities owned.

The Supreme Court already ruled in a 1994 decision that municipalities can't direct solid-waste disposal to private waste-disposal companies that hold government contracts. But lower courts in this case decided it was fine for county governments to mandate trash business for facilities they own.

United Haulers Association v. Oneida-Herkimer Solid Waste Management Authority

The court also agreed to hear a case on whether public-employee unions must get special permission before spending some workers' dues on political causes. The case, from Washington state, involves fees paid to the Washington Education Association by teachers who decline to join the union.

Those workers still can be charged union dues to help pay for labor negotiations that affect them. But they can't be forced to pay for the union's political activities, under a string of Supreme Court rulings that reach back nearly 30 years.

At issue is whether the union needs teachers to say "yes" before the fees can be used for political causes or whether teachers must specifically object to having a portion of their fees spent for that purpose.

The court will hear arguments in the case, as well as a related lawsuit by five teachers to recover their fees, early next year.

Health-Care Premiums Rise 7.7%, Outpacing Wages And Inflation (WSJ)

By Vanessa Fuhrmans

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

The health-care premiums of employers and their workers have climbed twice as fast as wages and inflation in 2006 -- to nearly double their cost in 2000 -- and they look to rise at a similar clip next year, two nationwide surveys show. That said, the pace of increase is about half what it was just a few years ago.

The average family premium rose 7.7% in 2006. That compared with a 3.8% rise in wages and inflation of around 3.5%. Even so, the 7.7% increase marks the third year that employer health-care cost increases have decelerated since soaring nearly 14% in 2003, according to a 2,122-employer survey by the Kaiser Family Foundation, and by the Health Research and Educational Trust. (See the survey's findings1.)

The cost for family coverage under an employer health plan is now $11,480, well over what a minimum-wage worker would earn in a year and beyond what many companies and their workers can afford. While 98% of companies with more than 200 workers still provide some sort of employee health benefits, only 60% of smaller businesses do. That's little changed from last year but down from 68% in 2000.

"A modest reduction in an already high rate of increase hardly looks like salvation for employers and workers who've been getting hammered by high health-care costs year after year," said Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonprofit health-policy research group in Menlo Park, Calif.

Even when employers do offer health insurance, not all workers get it or can afford it. On average, only 78% of employees are eligible at these companies, either because they don't work full-time or fail to meet other eligibility requirements. And given that employers require workers to pay an average 27% of the total premium -- or $2,973 for family coverage -- many employees can't afford to accept the coverage. Indeed, the share of workers covered by health insurance through their own employer has slipped to 59%, down from 60% last year and 63% in 2000, according to the Kaiser survey.

Most people falling out of the employer-sponsored health insurance system are lower-income workers, but they tend to be healthier workers more willing to risk going without coverage, which raises the costs for the remaining, sicker pool of employees. And ultimately employers pay more as uninsured employees forgo preventive care and wind up in emergency rooms when they do get sick, says David Guilmette, managing director of Towers Perrin's health-benefits group.

The employee-benefits consultancy's own survey of 167 companies finds that larger employers expect their increases in health-care costs to slow again in 2007 to 6%, from the 7% increase they reported last year. A large-employer survey published earlier this month by Mercer Health & Benefits LLC, a rival firm, projected similar increases next year. It added that the more-moderate increase will result from increasing employees' deductibles and other cost-sharing measures.

More of the larger firms also say they're adding "consumer-directed" plans, which combine deductibles of typically more than $1,000 and some sort of tax-saving account to make employees have a more financial stake in their health-care spending.

Overall, however, relatively few companies plan to enroll in these plans next year, the Kaiser study says. Only 2.7 million people are enrolled in one through an employer, about 4% of covered workers.

High-deductible Health Policies Don't See Growth (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, September 27, 2006

High-deductible health insurance policies coupled with savings accounts — touted by proponents as an answer to rising medical costs — did not grow in popularity among employers this year, even as premiums for insurance continued to rise.

The Kaiser Family Foundation annual employer survey reported Tuesday that what employers paid for health insurance premiums rose 7.7% this year among all types of health insurance, the smallest increase since 1999, but more than twice general inflation.

Employers did not substantially raise deductibles or co-payments made by employees, or the employees' share of premiums. Still, workers are paying more because the overall premiums rose.

"Working people are still feeling the pain," says Drew Altman, president of the non-profit research group in Menlo Park, Calif.

The most common type of insurance, a preferred provider organization plan, averaged $11,765 for a family and $4,385 for single employees.

While high-deductible policies have always been sold, the new twist in the market came when Congress in late 2003 allowed certain policies to be coupled with tax-free "health savings accounts." Money not used for deductibles and other medical care can roll over and be used in future years for medical care.

Despite those policies being the biggest buzz among benefit consultants, Kaiser's annual employment survey found that only 7% of employers offered them this year, a percentage statistically unchanged since 2005.

The Kaiser survey found that the average annual deductible for health savings account plans offered by employers was $2,011 for singles and $4,008 for families. Sixty-three percent of employers contribute something toward the savings account.

While such accounts have lower premiums, the Kaiser survey found that most employers don't save money on them compared with other types of insurance, once employer contributions to those savings accounts are added to premium costs.

Asset Resources in Minneapolis, a 10-employee debt collection firm, switched to a high-deductible plan after facing several years of 17% increases in its health insurance premiums.

"The broker said we might be able to cut some costs and afford some employees an opportunity from a tax point of view," says Mark Wallerius, vice president. "It seemed a win-win at the time."

Instead of a $500 annual deductible and a $15 co-pay at the doctor's office, the new policies had an annual deductible of $1,250. For most office visits, employees had to pay the full cost of the visit until they reached the deductible.

"They were pretty disgruntled," says Wallerius, who said the employees voted to go back to a lower-deductible plan this year.

Health Premiums Rise More Slowly (WP)

By Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Increases in health insurance premiums for working families slowed for the third straight year in 2006 but still rose at a rate more than double that of inflation and growth in workers' pay, an annual nationwide survey by the Kaiser Family Foundation shows.

Premiums for workers rose 7.7 percent this year -- the lowest increase since 2000 -- down from 9.2 percent in 2005 and almost half the recent peak of 13.9 percent in 2003, according to an in-depth survey released yesterday of about 2,100 companies with three or more workers. At the end of April, when the survey was completed, wages had increased 3.8 percent from a year earlier, and the rate of inflation had increased 3.5 percent.

"Nobody's celebrating, and nobody should be celebrating," said Drew E. Altman, head of the foundation, a nonprofit organization that studies health-care issues. "A modest reduction in an already high rate of increase hardly looks like salvation to working people and businesses, who have been getting hammered by high health-care costs year after year."

Since 2000, workers' health insurance premiums have risen 84 percent, while their wages have increased 20 percent and inflation has risen 18 percent, according to the study, which was conducted with the Health Research and Educational Trust, a nonprofit research affiliate of the American Hospital Association. Kaiser and HRET have done the study since 1999.

Annual health insurance premiums for a family of four average $11,480 this year, with workers paying $2,973 of that amount, $1,354 more than six years ago, the study finds. For individuals, premiums average $4,242, with the employee having to pay $627.

About 61 percent of companies questioned offer health-care coverage to at least some employees, about the same as last year. And workers at bigger companies continued to fare better: The study found that while nearly all companies with 200 or more workers offered coverage, fewer than half of the smallest companies surveyed did, those with from three to nine workers.

Employees with health coverage at companies with up to 199 workers tend to pay more out of pocket for premiums -- $3,550 on average for family coverage -- than workers at larger firms, who pay $2,658 on average for family coverage.

Health care has been a trouble spot for U.S. companies and workers for nearly two decades, as escalating costs have forced many firms to choose between layoffs or cuts in benefits to stay competitive. As costs have risen, so have the number of uninsured Americans under the age of 65: at least 46 million in 2005, up by 6 million from 2000. About 81 percent, or 37 million, are uninsured workers and their families, said Diane Rowland, the Kaiser Family Foundation's expert on the uninsured.

Uninsured people often cost the health-care system more than their insured counterparts because they tend to wait until they are sick before seeking help, requiring more expensive intervention than they might have needed if they had been treated earlier or been given preventive care. That helps drive up health-care costs for everyone, Rowland said.

"Insurance is simply becoming less and less affordable," said Gary Claxton, one of the study's authors. "What happens to people who can't afford it, it's hard to say, but we do see a continued march upward of the number of uninsured."

The survey also found that employers and employees have not embraced what the health-care community calls "consumer-driven" plans. These are health programs with high deductibles that give a tax break to workers who save specifically for medical expenses. Only 7 percent of employers offered them this year, and only 4 percent of workers signed up for them.

Two other studies on health insurance costs were also released this week. The benefits consulting firm Towers Perrin, whose clients include the largest U.S. employers, released a study yesterday estimating that the trend in rising premiums will continue, running at 6 percent next year. While that would be the fourth year of consecutive declines in the rate of growth in premium costs, the study concluded that the cumulative increase in all health care costs, which it estimated at 60 percent in the past five years, means more employees cannot afford to pay the portion their employer doesn't.

Towers Perrin also found variations in costs of as much as several thousand dollars per employee among similarly sized firms, largely because some firms are more aggressive at measuring costs and bargaining with providers while giving employees incentives to cut costs, such as large co-payments for prescription drugs.

It found that these companies are not lowering costs by shifting them to workers. Instead, their employees often pay lower premiums than do those at similarly sized, but less-aggressive, firms.

America's Health Insurance Plans, an insurance-industry trade group, on Monday released its first study on health insurance costs for small employers, defined as companies with 50 or fewer workers and including self-employed individuals. It found that premiums ranged widely from state to state, with higher prices often attributable to more mandates -- such as requiring that certain drugs or procedures be covered -- that put the price of insurance out of reach for many smaller employers, said Karen Ignagni, chief executive of AHIP.

Health Care Costs Rise Twice As Much As Inflation (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The cost of living keeps going up, but the cost of healthy living is going up even faster.

A widely followed national survey reported yesterday that the cost of employee health care coverage rose 7.7 percent this year, more than double the overall inflation rate and well ahead of the increase in the incomes of workers.

The 7.7 percent increase was the lowest since 1999. But the average cost to employees continued an upward trend, reaching $2,973 annually for family coverage out of a total cost of $11,481.

Since 2000, the cost of family coverage has risen 87 percent while consumer prices are up 18 percent and the pay of workers has increased 20 percent, the survey noted. That is without counting the cost of deductibles and other out-of-pocket payments, which have also been rising.

“The cost trend is moderating but nobody is celebrating,” said Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, which sponsored the survey with the Health Research and Educational Trust. “Businesses and workers are still being slammed year after year by rising health costs.”

Despite the increasing costs, about 6 out of 10 employers still offer health coverage to attract and retain workers. But the growth in premiums is making it harder and harder for companies to raise wages and salaries.

DOJ_NMG_0070176

The telephone survey of 3,159 randomly selected employers, ranging in size from three to more than 300,000 employees, was completed last May.

The continuing rise in the cost of benefits has slowed since the annual double-digit increases that peaked at nearly 14 percent in 2003. Last year's increase was 9.2 percent, the Kaiser survey said.

"It's slightly good news," said Helen Darling, president of the National Business Group on Health, a large employers' research and trade group in Washington. "It could have been worse but we certainly haven't solved all the problems."

She added, "The workers of the United States continue to give their pay raises to the health system."

Some business leaders took a more upbeat view of the survey results. "It's a very positive sign that the increases were lower than the previous year," said Katie Mahoney, health policy director of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Smaller employers, with fewer than 200 workers, faced larger increases than big companies, the survey said.

"We were looking at an increase of about 18 percent for 2006," said Mitch Flinchman, controller of Triangle Grading & Paving, a construction company with 100 employees in Burlington, N.C. The company switched to a different insurer but "still ended up with about an 8 percent increase, and it will probably go up more next year," he said.

The national cost trend would probably have been higher, analysts said, but regulators in a number of states were able to push nonprofit Blue Cross plans that are prosperous to hold down their increases, at least for a while.

In fact, the nonprofit Blue Cross plans actually had a 27 percent decline in operating profits in the first half of the year, compared with the period in 2005, said Matthew Borsch, a health care analyst at Goldman Sachs.

Tom Zimmerman said his family-owned business in Livonia, Mich., had been paying double-digit increases every year to Michigan Blue Cross and Blue Shield, until this year, when premiums rose only 2 percent. Even so, his company, Spectrum Automation, is spending $250,000 this year to cover 20 employees, he said.

"Our wages have stagnated while Mr. Blue Cross and Blue Shield takes our raises," Mr. Zimmerman said.

Employees pay about 16 percent of premiums, or about $3,497 of an average total of $11,793, for smaller companies with fewer than 200 workers in preferred provider networks, the most common type of health plan. Workers in larger companies contributed less to premiums: $2,628, and employers put in $9,124 for a total of $11,752.

The lowest premiums were for high-deductible health plans, sometimes tied to pretax savings accounts. The White House has been pushing these plans as a way to slow costs by giving consumers more say over their medical treatments. Business groups and health care consultants support the plans.

The workers' share of premiums for family coverage in these plans was $2,247, on average. The high-deductible plans covered 2.7 million workers, including 1.4 million in the newer health savings account plans.

Mr. Altman said that despite "all the talk and debate about these plans, only a very modest number of workers are in these consumer-driven arrangements. It is still early," he added. "They are likely to grow, but how fast and how much is still very much an open question."

Douglass Community Services, a nonprofit agency with 120 employees that manages the Head Start early childhood learning program in northeast Missouri, switched to a high-deductible plan this year, rather than face a 20 percent increase in premiums for its preferred provider organization.

Janeane Reis, human resources director of the agency in Hannibal, Mo., said its premiums increased by 10 percent, even with the high deductible plan. Employees pay all of their costs up to $1,000. Then, the agency covers them for the next $1,500, she said. Above that, they are covered for 80 percent of medical fees in a preferred provider network and 50 percent if they go to doctors outside the network.

"We will probably stay with this at least another year," she said. "It's tough being in a rural area. We don't have many choices and being a not-for-profit, we work on a very slim margin."

It can be even more difficult for individuals with health problems.

Billy Lassiter, an independent inspector of oil rigs in the Gulf of Mexico, had to give up his coverage for a year after his insurer raised the premiums to $1,800 a month and refused to pay about $5,000 in medical bills, according to Faye Lassiter, who keeps the accounts for her husband, who has overcome several bouts with lung cancer.

"They wouldn't hardly pay anything," she said. The couple were not able to find a new insurer until they persuaded their son Shannon, a railroad conductor, to join them. As a three-person business in Atmore, Ala., they were able to obtain coverage from Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Alabama, she said.

Premiums were $800 a month last year and increased $100, or 12.5 percent for 2006. She said Mr. Lassiter had to skip his annual CT scan last fall while he waited a year before the new coverage kicked in. "We couldn't afford the cost of the scan," Mrs. Lassiter said.

Passing The Buck To Mom And Dad (NYT)

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

Many middle-class young adults are staying on their parents' health insurance long after college these days. It's an interesting trend. But in no way is it a solution to the growing problem of the uninsured. If anything, it is a stopgap measure that helps the more fortunate while sapping the political will for sweeping change.

With 47 million Americans uninsured, the nation's health system is in crisis. More and more people are seeking treatment in emergency rooms because they have nowhere else to go. By one estimate, unpaid hospital bills have reached $45 billion annually, raising the cost of health insurance by 8.5 percent for those who are insured.

Among the uninsured are more than a quarter of adults between ages 18 and 34. As Jennifer Lee reported recently in The Times, states are responding to the problem with legislation to allow children to stay on their parents' health insurance longer. New Jersey is one of eight states that have passed such a "piggyback" statute just since 2003.

College graduates in fields like media and computer technology are at the leading edge of the changing American economy, where the individual carries the bulk of the risk. For young American workers, benefits have become negotiable rather than part of the social contract. Many end up opting out of health insurance entirely, choosing to wager on their relative good health to avoid spending the hundreds of dollars a month that self-insuring can cost.

But the troubled American health-insurance system finds itself in a vicious circle as a result. The higher premiums climb (twice as fast as wages this year, according to a new study), the less likely the young and healthy are to participate. That, in turn, skews the pool of the insured even older and more infirm, making coverage still more expensive and less appealing to those who bet they can do without.

The families that can best afford to take advantage of the piggyback laws are those that could already pay for separate coverage anyway. And these laws, by making life easier for those who have the most political influence and resources, reduce elected officials' incentive to do what is really needed and find a more comprehensive national solution.

Change Comes To A Carolina (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

South Carolina civil-rights advocate Dewey Tullis explained to reporters a few weeks ago why he's supporting a Republican running for the state's top education job, Karen Floyd: "Frankly, I'm tired of seeing our young black men graduate high school without knowing how to read and write."

Mr. Tullis is joining more than a dozen African-American Democrats in the effort. Also crossing party lines to support Ms. Floyd is State Representative Harold Mitchell Jr., from urban Spartanburg. Referring to a documentary made about the state's failing schools along the interstate, Representative Mitchell tells us, "It really is a 'corridor of shame.'"

What's going on here? Fed-up South Carolina Democrats are blowing the whistle on the state's public-school system, one of the nation's worst. A recent study published by Education Week found that South Carolina has the highest drop-out rate of any state; half of its students fail to graduate from high school in four years. The state ranks 49th in both SAT and ACT scores. State achievement tests released this month show that fewer than 30% of eighth graders are proficient in English, math, science or social studies. Among African-American eighth graders, only 13% were proficient in English and less than 9% in math. These kids aren't being left behind; they're never making it to the starting line.

The state's return on educational investment is appalling. Over two decades it has increased education spending 137% -- the third largest increase in the nation -- and now spends more than $10,000 per student (including capital costs). It's of little comfort to parents that the state masks its underperformance by claiming that nearly 73% of eighth graders meet what it considers a "basic standard" in English. The state only reaches that inflated number by defining its standard as something less than "proficient."

The good news is that the Palmetto State may be reaching a tipping point that could upend the public education establishment. Reform advocates have been building grassroots support for vouchers, tax credits, charter schools -- almost anything that will give parents more options on where to send their children. Governor Mark Sanford, a Republican, is already a supporter of broad-based school choice. The problem has been the Republican-controlled legislature. A handful of GOP members (many from districts with good schools) have lined up with Democrats to oppose anything that might empower parents over the system's bureaucrats.

That is starting to change. Under intense pressure, the legislature this year passed two school-choice bills. One made it easier to open charter schools. The other created vouchers for a new early-kindergarten pilot program to allow some low-income parents to send their four-year-old children to almost any public or private school. That's left parents wondering why they don't have the same options for primary and secondary education.

The state's reformist residents are also sending a message in the one way pols can't duck -- at the ballot box. In June, three incumbent state legislators were defeated in primaries for opposing school choice. Several other incumbents, including

House Education Committee Chairman Ronny Townsend, decided to retire rather than risk being turned out of office. South Carolinians for Responsible Government, a non-profit advocacy group in Columbia, estimates that in November reformers could pick up the seats they need in the house to pass education scholarships and tax credits for parents with kids in failing schools. These reforms failed this year by seven votes.

It's a long way to November. Representative Mitchell, for one, is now distancing himself from school choice, but remains undeterred in his support for Ms. Floyd. He waves off the swipes he's taken from fellow Democrats and the write-in challenger he's drawn since announcing his school-reform endorsement. "Some people really don't know the issues, or they just don't care." In South Carolina, that may finally be changing.

By AP

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

MOSCOW, Sept. 26 — Russia will ship fuel to a nuclear power plant it is building in Iran by March under an agreement signed by the two countries on Tuesday, Russian news agencies reported.

The agreement, signed by senior Russian and Iranian nuclear officials, represents a small victory for Iran, but seems certain to inflame Western anxiety over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Iran says it needs the fuel for a peaceful nuclear program to generate electricity.

But the fuel could also be enriched to create weapons-grade material, and the United States and other nations have accused Iran of using its nuclear program to develop atomic weapons.

The European Union's foreign policy chief is scheduled to meet Iran's top nuclear negotiator soon for talks on a package of incentives that Britain, France, Germany, the United States, China and Russia are hoping will encourage Iran to suspend uranium enrichment and enter negotiations.

If it does not, the United States would like to push for sanctions against Iran, though there is not full agreement with the other nations on such a course.

Iran has already missed an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend its uranium enrichment activities.

Russian news agencies reported that the deal on Tuesday had been signed by Sergei Shmatko, head of Russia's state-run company Atomstroiexport, and Mahmoud Hanatian, vice president of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization.

An additional protocol sets out a time frame for starting up an $800 million plant in Bushehr, which will be Iran's first.

"The document provides for supplying Russian fuel for the atomic energy plant in March, physical start-up in September 2007 and electric generation by November 2007," Mr. Hanatian said, according to Itar-Tass.

Mr. Shmatko said about 80 tons of fuel would be supplied, according to Interfax and Itar-Tass.

Western nations fear that Tehran could try to divert nuclear fuel used at the Bushehr plant and seek to enrich it further for potential use in a weapon.

To try to ease Western concerns over Bushehr, Russia has agreed with Iran that Tehran will ship spent fuel back to Russia.

However, Iran has resisted Russia's proposal to conduct all of Iran's uranium enrichment on Russian soil.

Tehran Denies Secret Nuke Deal (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Iran yesterday said it is not negotiating a secret temporary shutdown of its uranium-enrichment program as part of ongoing talks with the European Union, rebutting Bush administration sources who told The Washington Times that such a deal is being discussed.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, when asked about the report in The Times, said chief Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani and chief European Union negotiator Javier Solana will discuss what has been proposed already.

"These are not the issues to be discussed in the future negotiations, and as Mr. Larijani has said before, the P5+1 proposal will be the basis of the future negotiations with the representatives of the P5+1," Mr. Saeedi said.

"The P5+1" is shorthand for the group of the United States, France, Russia, China and Britain, all permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany. The nations have offered Iran a series of concessions if Iran agrees to stop developing its uranium-enrichment program.

DOJ_NMG_0070179

The Times reported yesterday that Bush administration officials say Mr. Solana has been negotiating a deal with Mr. Larijani that calls for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment for 90 days and to keep it secret, so additional talks could be held with several European nations.

The officials oppose such an agreement as a further concession to Iran, which continues to defy a United Nations' call for a halt to uranium enrichment, an essential step in developing nuclear weapons.

A Security Council resolution had given Iran until Aug. 31 to stop its enrichment program or face the imposition of international sanctions. Tehran ignored the deadline, but diplomacy has continued.

John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said Mr. Solana will hold talks on the Iran nuclear issue as early as today, but Mr. Solana has not reported back on the latest discussions.

"He will be meeting shortly with Larijani, and I think we'll hear from him at that point," Mr. Bolton told reporters in New York.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Solana declined to comment on the report in The Times. Diplomatic sources said Mr. Solana and Mr. Larijani likely would meet today in Brussels.

The group of nations has demanded that Iran suspend all enrichment before new talks on the incentives can be held.

The Iranians say the enrichment is for nuclear-powered electricity-generating stations, but the United States and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) suspect Iran is working on making nuclear weapons.

The White House said the U.S. is not negotiating a secret suspension of Iranian nuclear activity. The administration has called for a verifiable suspension, which it says must therefore be public.

"What the United States has asked for repeatedly and in every instance when we talked about this is a verifiable suspension of enrichment," said Frederick Jones, spokesman for the National Security Council.

EU spokeswoman Cristina Gallach said senior EU official Robert Cooper and Iranian official Javad Vaeedi held talks in Paris on Monday.

"We are working on the meeting with Larijani, but I will not say when nor where until it really happens," she said. "We continue to engage with the Iranians in order to create the conditions for these negotiations."

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack said the administration hopes Iran will agree to suspend enrichment when Mr. Larijani meets with Mr. Solona, but he said "the United States will not be at the table for any negotiations absent a suspension as outlined by the IAEA and the Security Council."

"That means there has to be a verifiable suspension, and suspension means suspension means suspension," he said.

Asked about the deal for Iran to conduct a 90-day halt, Mr. McCormack said the answer would require having "clear and accurate insight" into Iranian decision-making, something the administration lacks.

"We'll see. We can only judge them on what it is that they do," he said.

"We certainly hope that the answer is: 'Yes, we will suspend, we will verifiably suspend in order to get to negotiations.' That's what we want. ... But we are fully prepared, along with the other members of the P5+1, to go down the track of sanctions, if that, in fact, is not the answer."

The State Department is consulting with allies on imposing sanctions on Iran if Tehran fails to stop the enrichment, he said.

Mr. McCormack said it would be "very tricky" for international inspectors to conduct inspections in Iran in secret and that the press would likely discover the inspection.

Iran may want to call a suspension "something else," but for the United States to rejoin talks, it would have to be a fully verifiable halt, he said. The Bush administration is convinced that Iran is deceiving the world about its intentions to develop uranium enrichment for electrical power generation and believes the effort is to develop nuclear weapons, specifically warheads for Iran's medium-range missiles.

Iranian Ex-Lawmaker Alleges Torture (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Ali Akbar Mousavi Khoini, a former Iranian lawmaker who has been jailed without charges in Tehran for more than 100 days, was briefly released from detention last Thursday to attend a memorial service, where he shouted out allegations of torture and other harsh treatment, according to his lawyers and other witnesses quoted by a human rights organization.

"For the past 20 days, prison officials have chained my hands and feet. I am being tortured," Khoini loudly announced to bystanders at the memorial service for Khoini's father, according to several people at the event who relayed the incident to New York-based Human Rights Watch.

"I am held in solitary confinement and interrogated four times a day," Khoini reportedly shouted. "They wake me up in the middle of the night to interrogate me. They are trying to turn me to a mental patient." Referring to Iran's supreme leader,

DOJ_NMG_0070180

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, he added, "They are forcing me to denounce my beliefs, to repent for my activities, and to ask forgiveness from Khamenei."

Calls to the Iranian mission to the United Nations in New York, seeking comment, were not returned.

Khoini, the son of a cleric and a member of Iran's reformist bloc, had long challenged Iran's judiciary and intelligence services for human rights abuses during his tenure as a legislator from 2000 to 2004. He made frequent visits to prisons and publicly searched for secret detention centers in his efforts to expose what he called inhumane practices. He was disqualified by conservative clerics from seeking reelection.

He was arrested at a rally June 12 and has been held at Tehran's Evin prison with no access to lawyers, according to Human Rights Watch officials and attorneys working for his release.

Iranian news reports said Khoini's wife, Zohreh Islamian, has not been allowed to see him for the past month and only once has been able to speak to him by telephone. At the memorial service, held to mark the 40th day after his father's death, security guards prevented Khoini from seeing his wife when he arrived, according to witnesses cited by Human Rights Watch. One of Khoini's lawyers, Mohammad Sharif, told [a] news agency in Tehran that "Khoini's wife had noticed signs of physical impact, especially on his head."

[That news agency] also quoted Sharif as saying Khoini was under pressure to write a letter requesting a pardon.

Human Rights Watch called on Khamenei to order the immediate and unconditional release of Khoini. "Iran's leaders have held Mousavi Khoini for more than 100 days without charge," according to Joe Stork, the group's deputy Middle East director. "Iran has a notorious record when it comes to getting political prisoners to 'repent' under torture," he added.

"The same intelligence apparatus that he tried to hold accountable is subjecting him to torture," Stork said. "The authorities should end this vendetta immediately and release him."

Since July 30, two prisoners incarcerated for what the Iranian government considers subversive political beliefs have died under suspicious conditions in Iranian jails, according to Human Rights Watch.

Hadi Ghaemi, another official with the group, interviewed by telephone in New York, said, "The Tehran government was looking for the opportune moment to seize him when he was spotted at a women's rally on June 12 and carried away."

Ali Afshari, a former Iranian student leader, said he was greatly pained by the report of Khoini's treatment.

Afshari, 33, who came to the United States 10 months ago and is working with the Washington-based National Endowment for Democracy, had himself served several prison terms over three years in Iran, including 400 days of solitary confinement.

"This is all very bitter," he said. "When I heard of Ali Akbar's torture, my own experience came to life. I can feel what he is going through." He and Khoini, 36, had come together 10 years ago as central committee members in the Islamic Student Association, which grouped university student activists.

The Islamic Student Association was one of the organizations created by supporters of the late Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, leader of the Islamic republic, and the group later became a vehicle for reformists, like Khoini and Afshari, to challenge what they considered heavy-handed tactics by the Iranian authorities.

An online journal called Gozaar, meaning Transition, devoted to the discussion of democracy and human rights in Iran, and launched this month in Persian and English, will feature an interview with Khoini's wife and the wives of other detained political activists, according to Mariam Memarsadeghi of the group Freedom House.

Rice Gives North Korea Nuclear Talks Effort Six Weeks To Resume (AFP)

AFP, September 27, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she would travel to Asia in the next six weeks to see whether to make "one last push" to convince North Korea to return to multilateral negotiations on ending its nuclear weapons program.

North Korea agreed to join the negotiations with China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the United States a year ago but began boycotting the talks two months later.

Amid reports the reclusive regime could be planning its first test of a nuclear bomb, Rice said in an interview released Monday that time was running out to bring North Korea back to the negotiating table.

"This current situation isn't really acceptable," she said in the interview with The Wall Street Journal, a transcript of which was released by the State Department.

She said a UN Security Council resolution adopted unanimously after North Korea carried out a series of missile tests in July "sent some shockwaves through the North."

The resolution demanded that Pyongyang stop missile-related activities, confirm its moratorium on missile launches and return unconditionally to the six-way talks.

Rice said in light of North Korea's continued refusal to return to the negotiating table, further action was needed.

DOJ_NMG_0070181

"We are in discussions now with South Korea, Japan, and I suspect I'll go to Asia sometime in the next month to six weeks, probably next six weeks or so, to take stock and see whether or not one last push to get the six-party talks back on can be made," she said.

North Korea said its boycott of the six-party talks was a reaction to financial sanctions imposed by the United States on a Macau bank allegedly used to launder money and finance illicit North Korean activities.

Since July's UN resolution, Japan and Australia have also imposed sanctions on firms suspected of involvement in North Korean weapons programs.

Pyongyang has also demanded that Washington engage it in direct negotiations, rather than deal only through the six-party forum.

While Washington has rejected direct negotiations, Rice said her top envoy on the North Korea issue, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, has met with his North Korean counterpart on the sidelines of previous six-party meetings.

"We've had situations where the night before the six-party talks, a couple nights before, Chris Hill sat with his North Korean counterpart and talked," she said.

"There's no absence of an opportunity to talk, it's that the North Koreans haven't been willing to show up at the forum in which to talk," she said.

Rice said that in the meantime, Washington would continue its financial measures "because they do relate to illicit North Korean activities."

Rice also sought to counter suggestions of a growing rift between the United States and South Korea over how to approach the crisis, with Seoul seen as favoring more diplomacy rather than threats of sanctions against its volatile neighbor.

"South Korea has been more helpful than you might think," she said.

She said South Korea had told allies during meetings on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly here last week of efforts it was making to put pressure on the North, including cutting back badly needed food assistance and fertilizer supplies.

She said those measures could be intensified and threaten overall North-South economic ties if North Korea goes ahead with the rumored nuclear weapons test.

"The South Koreans have been very clear, if the North were somehow to have a nuclear test, to have a missile test, that would put a lot at risk in their relationship," she said.

Israel Sets Goal Of Pulling Troops Out Of Lebanon By Sunday (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

TEL AVIV, Sept. 26 — Israeli troops are expected to be out of Lebanon before the Jewish holy day of Yom Kippur begins on Sunday night, according to Israeli officials and the United Nations after a meeting in Naqura, Lebanon, on Tuesday.

“It is my belief that with the necessary cooperation by both parties we should see the I.D.F. leave south Lebanon by the end of this month,” Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini, commander of the United Nations forces in Lebanon, said of the Israeli Defense Forces.

In Jerusalem, the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, told Parliament that Israel hoped to complete its withdrawal from Lebanon under a United Nations resolution “during this week or at the latest several days later.”

Mr. Peretz said Israel wanted reassurances about the rules of engagement for both the United Nations and Israel in the case of cease-fire violations by the Shiite militia group Hezbollah.

Later Tuesday, however, Israeli officials suggested that some of those issues remained unresolved, including how to deal with protests along the border and whether the United Nations forces would act against Hezbollah if necessary or simply inform the Lebanese Army about violations.

The resolution, passed some six weeks ago, put an end to 34 days of fighting between Hezbollah and Israel that included bombings of southern Beirut and some 4,000 Hezbollah rockets fired on the cities of northern Israel.

Israel had said it wanted to leave Lebanon by the end of last week, before the Jewish New Year, but delayed, saying the United Nations forces, which are supposed to reinforce the Lebanese Army, were not up to strength. They number barely more than 5,000 now, only about 3,000 more than when the war ended and far short of the 15,000 called for under the resolution.

But the Israeli Army also did not want to pull out of Lebanon before a big Hezbollah rally last Friday, when its leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, appeared in public for the first time to declare a divine victory.

Israel also said it would continue aerial surveillance over Lebanon to prevent the resupply of weapons to Hezbollah until the resolution was fully carried out. That includes the release of two captured Israeli soldiers and the monitoring of the largely unmarked border between Lebanon and Syria, which helped to supply Hezbollah with sophisticated arms from Iran and Syria itself.

DOJ_NMG_0070182

Israeli forces have now left approximately 90 percent of the buffer zone in southern Lebanon captured during the war, handing over areas to the Lebanese Army and the United Nations force.

But Israel has also left behind what United Nations officials said could be as many as a million unexploded bomblets from cluster bombs fired by artillery during the last days of the war, the United Nations said.

On Tuesday, Arjun Jain of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees said in Beirut that 200,000 Lebanese displaced by the Israel-Hezbollah war were being delayed from returning home because of the unexploded bomblets.

"Displacement is going to continue for many months to come," Mr. Jain said.

Since the cease-fire, 14 Lebanese have been killed and 90 injured by the bomblets, the United Nations said, while about 40,000 of the bomblets have been cleared. The officials estimate that about 40 percent of the cluster bombs failed to explode.

In one of a series of New Year interviews, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has again dismissed the idea of peace talks with Syria. "As long as I serve as prime minister, the Golan Heights will remain in our hands because it is an integral part of the state of Israel," Mr. Olmert said.

Israel captured the strategic plateau in the 1967 war and unilaterally annexed it in 1981. Some Israelis have suggested that given the threat from Iran, Israel should accept a Syrian offer for peace talks to try to wean Syria, a Sunni country, away from its alliance with Tehran.

In an attack on Tuesday, Palestinians fired rockets into Sderot, wounding a soldier. [(A news organization) reported that hospital officials said Israeli forces bombed a house in Rafah in the Gaza Strip on Wednesday, killing a teenage Palestinian girl in a nearby building and wounding 10 others.]

In Gaza, hopes for a unity government including Hamas and Fatah dimmed a bit more when a prominent Hamas leader, Mahmoud Zahar, said, "We won't recognize Israel and the previous signed agreements."

He added, "Such agreements have been a burden to Palestinian daily lives, and the government won't let Israel's hand strike against us in all directions while we depend on unfruitful negotiations."

The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, is expected to travel to Cairo for talks with the Egyptians.

Bush Signs US-Oman Trade Pact (AFP)

AFP, September 27, 2006

US President George W. Bush signed the US-Oman Free Trade Agreement, the fifth such extensive trade pact with a Middle Eastern country since he took office.

US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said in a statement that the accord was "good news for the United States, Oman, and our efforts to promote economic opportunity in the Middle East."

"The agreement also marks a milestone in strengthening ties and promoting freedom in the Middle East," she said after Bush signed the accord into law.

The FTA with Oman is part of an effort by Washington to create a Middle East Free Trade Area (MEFTA) by 2013, building on existing agreements with Israel, Jordan, Morocco and Bahrain.

Bush has said he wants greater trade with the Middle East not just for the commercial benefits to US companies but for the political openness he believes could result in one of the world's most restive regions.

Critics led by Democratic opponents in Congress have argued the Oman trade pact would erode labor rights both in the United States and in other countries.

Korean Leads Race To Succeed Annan (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- The race for United Nations secretary-general is moving into its final weeks with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon well in front, but the late entry of Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, who would be the first woman in the post, muddles the odds.

Seven declared candidates are now in the running to succeed Kofi Annan in January, and more could enter. They include a U.N. official who writes novels, the deputy prime minister of a recently deposed government, an ambassador with a passion for disarmament, a prince with peacekeeping experience, and a former World Bank executive from a shattered nation.

All the declared candidates are from Asia -- which under an informal rotation system expects to field the next secretary-general -- except Mrs. Vike-Freiberga, whose candidacy could sink on the geographic considerations despite the fact that several nations would like to see a woman in the post.

China, a veto-wielding permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, signaled early that it would not accept a candidate from a country outside Asia.

Singapore's ambassador to the United States, Heng Chee Chan, has been widely mentioned as a highly qualified Asian woman who could satisfy nearly everyone. She is well- thought-of by Washington, and regarded as particularly strong in trade and economic issues, and familiar with the United Nations, having been the Singaporean ambassador to the world body before she came to Washington a decade ago. But she and her government insist that she is not a candidate.

Mrs. Vike-Freiberga's prospects will become clearer after a straw poll among Security Council members tomorrow. Mr. Ban topped two previous polls.

The Asian and African groups agree that the next secretary-general must be from Asia. Washington appears to have accepted that it cannot win approval for someone outside Asia, however qualified, without a bruising fight.

New candidates can still come forward until the Security Council members make their selection, something they hope to do in the next three weeks. Under U.N. rules, the council chooses a single candidate whose selection must be ratified by the General Assembly.

Mr. Annan steps down at the end of the year after a decade in a job that frustrates description. The U.N. secretary-general is both an administrator and mediator, a global conscience and a figurehead.

The job pays approximately $275,000 a year, with a mansion overlooking the East River in Manhattan. Unless one of the five permanent members of the Security Council wants the secretary-general out, the successful candidate can expect to serve a second five-year term.

The Americans have made clear that they want someone who will be more "secretary" than "general," with excellent management skills and a commitment to transparency and fiscal reform. "A decaffeinated Kofi Annan," as some have put it.

Based on their resumes and public statements, candidates who fill that description include the front-running Mr. Ban, a soft-spoken South Korean who has promised to heal rifts between member states and pursue efforts to streamline the 61-year-old international organization.

His public persona is more soothing than passionate, leading some private organizations to worry that he would not challenge governments on human rights and other internal issues. He is increasingly seen as the candidate the five veto-bearing permanent members can live with, rather than anyone's first choice.

Ashraf Ghani, 57, a new entrant who was Afghan finance minister during the post-Taliban period, also may have some traction. He drafted a reconstruction plan that raised nearly $30 billion in 2001, and is well-known to State Department and White House officials. American educated, he also has had a global career at the World Bank.

But he is not nearly as well known as Shashi Tharoor, the telegenic Indian author and U.N. communications czar who placed second in the last straw poll. Mr. Tharoor, 50, has been campaigning vigorously, courting foreign officials, American Jewish groups and worldwide popular opinion.

Mr. Tharoor's dedication to the United Nations the past 25 years may work against him, because U.S. and British diplomats say a career officer may not be the best person to reform the organization.

Surakiart Sathirathai, 48, the former deputy prime minister of Thailand, has been lining up support for almost two years, a campaign that was derailed by a coup in his homeland last week.

His formal support from the Association of Southeast Asian Nations has effectively shut out candidates from nine other nations, including Singapore's Mrs. Chan. Nonetheless, council ambassadors want more candidates to come forward to give them a wider choice.

After Annan, What Kind Of UN Leader? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

As Kofi Annan prepares to wrap up 10 years at the helm of the United Nations, admirers say the soft-spoken Ghanaian has overseen an expansion of the secretary-general's role into "the world's top diplomat."

Critics are more apt to point to the deteriorating esteem that much of the world holds for its largest international organization, or to the scandals that have rocked its walls, and conclude that a truer moniker might be "world's worst manager."

Now, as Mr. Annan approaches the end of his second five-year term in December, his accomplishments and shortcomings are defining the search for his successor, who could be selected as early as next month. Does the world need most a globe-trotting arbiter and executive - or someone who will put the house in order?

Two schools of thought have opened up on what the next secretary-general should be, says Edward Luck, a UN expert who teaches at Columbia University in New York: "a spokesman for the world, a kind of secular pope," or "someone who learns the lesson of Kofi's legacy and is careful not to overstretch the bounds of the office - but focuses instead on managing and leading the institution."

While candidates are already campaigning for the post, no consensus has formed around any one of them - in part because UN members, in particular on the powerful Security Council, have different views of what is most needed for the job.

Almost no one challenges the notion that Annan has presided over the UN during a decade of deep global change, or that an institution gathering 192 nations under its umbrella has evolved from the world's biggest convener of conferences to much more of a "doer" organization - managing more peacekeepers than ever, spearheading development efforts, fighting AIDS.

"The UN under Kofi Annan has begun to adapt to a very different world and a very different mission" than that of the world body's first half century, says Lee Feinstein, a UN expert at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "It's much less a talk shop, much more a place that does things."

But the UN's reputation is also badly tarnished in the wake of the oil-for-food probe and other scandals. Some critics believe the UN under Annan has aligned itself too closely with American foreign policy, while others, notably among US conservatives, say Annan has presided over the transformation of the UN into a den of inefficiency, corruption, and anti-Western thinking. President Bush recently noted that support for the UN among Americans is at it lowest level ever.

Annan has not shied away from addressing previously "taboo" topics for the secretary-general, such as the promotion of democracy, individual rights versus those of government, the individual's right to protection, inequitable wealth distribution, and genocide, Mr. Feinstein says.

Yet despite that, the UN has suffered from failing to operate effectively or efficiently as it has expanded its workload, he adds. "And part of that is because Kofi Annan has not been an effective and efficient manager," he says.

That view, widely held among Annan admirers and detractors alike, has led many analysts to conclude that what the UN needs most now is not so much the "world's top diplomat" as a manager with a laser focus on internal operations who will make the organization work better.

"Yes, you need the well-respected international figure, but beyond that, what is needed as secretary-general is someone who is tremendously focused on reforming a highly flawed institution," says Nile Gardiner, an expert in international institutions at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

"You need someone who won't just preside over a deep well of corruption but will dig in and do something about it," he adds, "someone who will challenge time-honored practices like hiring and promotion rules that too often yield the lowest common denominator."

Annan did launch a major reform effort in March 2005 that was to be the capstone of his tenure. But to some observers, it was fanciful to think that an ambitious overhaul including broad management reforms, expansion of the Security Council, and the addition of new tasks could be accomplished in the wary and distrustful atmosphere of the post-Iraq-invasion period.

"No one thought it was a propitious moment for such a wide-ranging undertaking," says Professor Luck of Annan's reform agenda. "When oil-for-food hit, he should have pared it down to focus on management," he says, adding, "Kofi is a decent man with many talents, but managing people isn't one of them. He seems to want everyone to like him."

Though it was hardly the sole responsibility of Annan, management reform stalled last year and is unlikely to go anywhere by December - and that means it will fall on the plate of whoever replaces Annan.

"Fiscal management, patronage within the UN system: Those are issues that Kofi Annan tried to address but that the next secretary-general will have to pick up," says Karl Inderfurth, a former State Department official who now teaches international relations at George Washington University in Washington.

While he agrees that management will have to be fixed if the UN is to succeed at its many and multiplying tasks, he says the next secretary-general will have to be mindful as well of the world's greater expectations of the UN in global security.

"Especially in the years of Kofi Annan, the world has come to look at the UN as the global 911," Mr. Inderfurth says, "So the new secretary-general will come in having to deal with those expectations."

That will mean tackling the thorny issue of Security Council reform, something Annan attempted but got nowhere with fast. For starters, says Inderfurth, who is a former US undersecretary for South Asian affairs, that will mean adding two new Asian members, Japan and India, to the Council's five permanent members, with other members likely to be added.

Annan "didn't get the updating of the Security Council that he wanted," Inderfurth says, "but it's something his successor will have to accomplish if the UN is to reflect not the world of the cold war but the world of the 21st century." Who's who in the race to be next UN chief

As the hunt for the next secretary-general at the United Nations heats up, the latest question to dominate the deliberations is this: Does it hurt a candidate if his country has just undergone a military coup?

Surakiart Sathirathai, Thailand's ousted deputy prime minister and one of seven announced candidates to succeed Kofi Annan, should know the answer this Thursday, when the 15-member Security Council takes another in a series of straw polls on the secretary-general's race.

In the last informal vote earlier this month, Mr. Surakiart came in third - but that was before military leaders overthrew Thailand's elected government, including him. Since then, the military leaders have said they support Surakiart's candidacy. But China - a veto-wielding member of the Security Council - has said the coup "complicates" the Thai's campaign to lead the UN.

If Surakiart is down, then it would seem to follow that other candidates are up. They include South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-Moon, generally considered the leading contender; Shashi Tharoor of India, a longtime UN diplomat and currently the UN undersecretary-general for public information, who came in second in the last straw poll; Jordan's UN Ambassador Prince Zeid Raad Zeid al-Hussein, who played a key role in establishing the International Criminal Court; and Jayantha Dhanapala of Sri Lanka, a former UN undersecretary-general for disarmament affairs.

Two candidates have emerged since the last straw poll on Sept. 14: Afghanistan's former finance minister, Ashraf Ghani; and Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga.

Some countries say the eventual winner may not have even emerged yet - though UN ambassadors hope to settle on a candidate in October and avoid a repeat of the down-to-the-wire election of Mr. Annan in 1995. He vacates his post at the end of the year.

Attention in the selection is focused on the 15-member Security Council, because the Council sends its nominee to the 192-member General Assembly for an up-or-down vote.

All the announced candidates to date are from the Asia region, except Ms. Vike-Freiberga. That is in line with a UN tradition of rotating the regions represented in the secretary-general's office - a rotation that would dictate an Asian holding the next five-year term.

China is known in the halls of the UN headquarters in New York to be pressing strongly for the tradition to be followed - and many outsiders agree, saying the economic and political rise of Asia warrants an Asian holding the job. On the other hand, the United States, which has not yet made any preference known, has said the best candidate should hold the job regardless of regional origin.

One thing seems certain, however: The next "SG," as UN regulars refer to the organization's chief, won't be Bill Clinton.

Rumors flew a year ago that the globally popular former American president was a top contender for the post, but since then, Mr. Clinton has poured cold water on the idea.

Japan Vows To Step Up Bid For Security Council Expansion (AFP)

AFP, September 27, 2006

Japan has vowed to pursue its campaign for reform of the UN Security Council from which it hopes to secure a permanent seat on the key body despite opposition from some of its neighbours.

Giving Japan's speech to the UN General Assembly, the country's UN envoy Kenzo Oshima said the Security Council risked seeing its credibility further damaged if it did not change.

"Perhaps a limited few might find it in their interest to leave the Security Council configured in the way it was in 1945," Oshima said.

"It is clear, however, that no-one stands to gain from the waning credibility of the council that failure to reform it could entail."

The current council has five permanent members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- each of which can veto any resolution passed by the body.

Japan, Germany, India and Brazil have pressed to become permanent members but opposition has come from the United States and China.

"The need for a more effective, representative and transparent Security Council that can live up to the demands of the new century is not a mere rhetoric but is real and urgent," said Oshima.

He added that most countries wanted change "with a sense of urgency" and "Japan is determined to continue to take the initiative in this critical endeavour."

The United States has said it favours Japan's permanent membership of the council but China has expressed opposition, because of Japan's wartime past.

North Korea spoke strongly at the assembly against Japan becoming a permanent member.

The North's Deputy Foreign Minister Choe Su Hon said Tuesday: "With regard to the expansion of permanent membership, a country like Japan, the war criminal which invaded Asian countries and committed a massacre of innocent people, but has been distorting its aggressive history instead of liquidating it, should never be allowed to become a permanent member."

New Premier Seeks A Japan With Muscle And A Voice (NYT)

By Martin Fackler

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

TOKYO, Sept. 26 — In his first act after being installed as prime minister, Shinzo Abe, a popular nationalist who has vowed to make Japan more assertive globally, appointed a cabinet on Tuesday packed with social conservatives and foreign-policy hawks.

Mr. Abe, 52, bowed deeply in front of lawmakers after winning 339 votes in the 476-member lower house, which selects the prime minister.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Abe's predecessor and political mentor, Junichiro Koizumi, vacated the prime minister's residence in central Tokyo after nearly five and a half years. Mr. Abe had been virtually guaranteed to succeed Mr. Koizumi, 64, since winning last week's leadership election in the Liberal Democratic Party, which has governed Japan for most of the past half-century.

Mr. Abe is Japan's youngest prime minister since World War II and the first to be born after the war. His ascension appears to be a changing of the guard in a country that has kept a low profile in international affairs since its defeat in 1945. He enters office riding a crest of popularity, as his message of renewed national pride has found followers amid the resurgence of Japan's long dormant economy.

"Japan must be a country that shows leadership and that is respected and loved by the countries of the world," Mr. Abe said Tuesday in his first news conference as prime minister. "I want to make Japan a country that shows its identity to the world."

At the same time, Mr. Abe (pronounced AH-bay) said he wanted to improve relations with South Korea and China, which soured after Mr. Koizumi paid visits to a Shinto shrine honoring Japan's war dead.

Mr. Abe called on the leaders of South Korea and China to meet with him, something both countries refused to do with Mr. Koizumi. So far, Mr. Abe has been vague about whether he will visit the shrine.

He told reporters that one goal of his administration was to revise Japan's pacifist Constitution, written after World War II by American occupation forces, to permit a full-fledged military. He also indicated that he favored closer military cooperation with Washington. These goals have alarmed many here who worry that any upgrading of the status of the armed forces could damage ties with Asian neighbors, which fear a revival of Japanese militarism.

After winning leadership of the governing party last week, Mr. Abe reportedly spent several days holed up in his country retreat near Mount Fuji, drawing up his cabinet. His choices, said Tomoaki Iwai, a professor of politics at Nihon University, and others, gave a decidedly hawkish bent to the new administration.

Mr. Abe increased the number of advisers to the prime minister, adding new posts for national security, education and the issue of Japanese citizens kidnapped by North Korea. Many of his appointees are in their 50's, a decade younger than most cabinet ministers in the past.

One of the most watched appointments was to the new job of national security adviser, which went to Yuriko Koike, 54, a former television reporter. Ms. Koike has been a vocal supporter of the economic sanctions on North Korea linked to its refusal to provide more information on the fate of Japanese citizens kidnapped two decades ago.

Another was the education adviser, Eriko Yamatani, 56, a critic of sex education and the teaching of "excessive" equality of the sexes in schools.

The new state minister in charge of sex equality, Sanae Takaichi, 45, has opposed allowing women to have different legal family names from their husbands, a freedom women sued to win in the late 1980's.

The defense agency chief, Fumio Kyuma, a 65-year-old party veteran and a friend of Mr. Abe's, and the foreign minister, Taro Aso, 66, who ran against Mr. Abe in last week's leadership vote, retained their positions.

There are few political heavyweights in top economic posts, reflecting what some economists and political scientists said was a shift in priorities toward foreign policy and national security. Mr. Koizumi, in contrast, filled economic posts with prominent reformers like Heizo Takenaka, a former economics professor credited with fixing Japan's debt-ridden banking system.

Mr. Abe said he wanted to continue Mr. Koizumi's market-oriented reforms but also pledged to fight the growing discrepancies in incomes and opportunities that they have helped create. Mr. Koizumi's critics blasted him for turning egalitarian Japan into an American-style society of winners and losers.

But Mr. Abe seemed to speak most forcefully on security issues, and on the need for Japan to have a larger voice in global affairs. One of his goals, he said, will be getting Japan a permanent seat on the United Nations Security Council.

Japan PM Vows To Speed Up Reforms (FT)

Shinzo Abe, Japan's new prime minister, named a cabinet of mainly like-minded conservatives on Tuesday. The line-up reflects the priorities of his ruling Liberal Democratic party as well as his own desire to surround himself with ideological friends.

Analysts said the cabinet of Mr Abe, who was sworn in by parliament on Tuesday, reflected an independent streak, though not as much as his predecessor Junichiro Koizumi, who revelled in ignoring party protocol and bringing in outsiders.

Mr Abe named 11 freshmen to his cabinet, signalling a generational shift. At 52, he is the first prime minister born since the war and the youngest in 65 years.

Youngsters – by Japanese standards – in the cabinet and among senior party officials include Yasuhisa Shiozaki, 55, chief cabinet secretary, Shoichi Nakagawa, 53, LDP policy chief, and Nobuteru Ishihara, 49, deputy secretary-general.

Mr Nakagawa, in particular, is considered close to Mr Abe, sharing views that Japan needs to defend its national interest more vigorously, rewrite its US-written pacifist constitution and make education more patriotic.

Mr Shiozaki, another close friend, will also have special responsibility for people kidnapped by North Korea, an emotive issue that helped propel Mr Abe to the top slot.

On the economy, Mr Abe balanced youth with experience, nominating Koji Omi, 73, a former trade ministry bureaucrat, as finance minister. Mr Omi, who rallied older parliamentarian support for Mr Abe, will be expected to seek spending cuts in line with the premier's pledge to trim bureaucratic fat before considering tax increases.

Kaoru Yosano, the economy and financial services minister tipped for a top cabinet post, was passed over, possibly because his reputation as a fiscal hawk conflicted with Mr Abe's emphasis on promoting growth, analysts said.

Takao Toshikawa, a political commentator, said the cabinet was largely in Mr Abe's image and not unduly influenced by LDP backroom dealing – the way cabinets were formed before Mr Koizumi. It was stacked with people who might be seen as "neo-cons or rightwingers", Mr Toshikawa said, but he stressed that Mr Abe's conviction politics were tempered by a strong streak of pragmatism.

The new prime minister, for example, had sent strong signals to China about getting relations back on track. No summits between the leaders of Asia's two biggest economies took place during Mr Koizumi's 5½ year tenure, largely over the issue of Mr Koizumi's visits to a controversial war memorial.

As foreign minister Mr Abe stuck with Taro Aso, the incumbent, who ran against him for the premiership. Mr Aso is considered a hawk not obviously suited to the role of improving relations with China, but he has emphasised his willingness to meet Chinese leaders without conditions.

Mr Aso has also floated what he says are long-term solutions to the diplomatic controversy over the Yasukuni shrine.

Abe's Cabinet Picks Indicate A Steady Course (WSJ)

New Prime Minister Vows to Concentrate On Economy, China

TOKYO -- Shinzo Abe was elected prime minister of Japan yesterday and announced a cabinet lineup that indicated he would follow many of the policies of his predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi.

Mr. Koizumi's five years in power were defined by moves to reduce the size of the government -- through spending cuts and privatization programs -- and to give Japan a more-assertive foreign policy. Yesterday, Mr. Abe pledged to speed up these fiscal overhauls to keep the country's economic recovery on track, and to improve ties with China.

Eurasia Group's Ross Schaap explains2 the economic issues facing Japan's youngest prime minister, Shinzo Abe, who was elected Tuesday.

The new prime minister appointed some old hands for foreign and defense posts, but he made some unexpected choices for important economic positions. The economy minister will be Hiroko Ota, who sat on the Council on Economic and Fiscal Policy during Mr. Koizumi's term, when the committee decided major economic policies. She also has close ties to Heizo Takanaka, who was the architect of Mr. Koizumi's economic policies but is leaving politics.

Mr. Abe's finance minister will be Koji Omi, 73 years old, a long-serving politician who has held various economic jobs in the government in the past, though not for several years. As economy-planning minister in 1997, Mr. Omi wrongly predicted that Japan's economy would recover "around the time cherry blossoms bloom" in the spring. Japan's economy continued to deteriorate for years.

"Most of these names will be unknown to a foreign audience," wrote Richard Jerram, an economist for Macquarie Securities, in a report. He speculated that the appointments could indicate that economic policies "will not be an important focus for the new administration."

Mr. Abe reappointed Taro Aso as foreign minister. Mr. Aso, who was one of Mr. Abe's contenders for the premiership, will assist the new prime minister as he strives to repair relations with China and South Korea. These ties soured under Mr. Koizumi's rule partly because he paid annual visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni war shrine, which honors war criminals as wells as conscripted soldiers.

Mr. Abe is a supporter of the shrine and has paid his respects there in the past, but he hasn't said whether he will visit as prime minister.

Mr. Aso, who also has visited Yasukuni in the past, has suggested bringing the shrine under government control, a move that might help defuse the controversy surrounding it.

Mr. Abe is also an advocate of close military ties with the U.S. and a bigger military role for Japan -- both policies that Mr. Koizumi promoted. Fumio Kyuma, who served as defense minister from 1996 and 1998, was appointed to that post for a second time.

Mr. Abe had been voted leader of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party last week, and yesterday, both houses of Parliament elected him prime minister. At 52, Mr. Abe is set to be the nation's youngest prime minister since World War II.

After being voted LDP president last week, he pledged to continue with Mr. Koizumi's economic policies of reining in public spending while generating higher tax revenues through strong economic growth.

Yesterday, Mr. Abe took the symbolic step of cutting his own pay by 30% to help trim the budget.

In Valedictory Speech, Blair Declines To Name Departure Date (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

MANCHESTER, England, Sept. 26 — With some wisecracks and familiar rhetorical flourishes, Prime Minister Tony Blair delivered his final speech as Labor leader to the party's annual conference on Tuesday, saying it was "hard to let go" but "right to let go."

He offered no formal endorsement of his presumptive heir, Gordon Brown, however, and did not set a date for his own departure, suggesting that he would pursue a Middle East peace initiative and other projects for "months" to come.

Mr. Blair's appearance was his first major address since he bowed three weeks ago to a sustained campaign by Mr. Brown's supporters to force him to step down. At that time, he said he would leave office within a year. The power struggle left both men politically bruised.

The speech was closely watched for signs that they had reached some kind of peace, particularly since Mr. Brown offered Mr. Blair fulsome praise in a similarly scrutinized speech on Monday.

Mr. Blair described Mr. Brown, his longtime rival, partner and would-be successor, as "a remarkable man. A remarkable servant to this country."

"I know New Labor would never have happened, and three election victories would never have been secured, without Gordon Brown," he said as Mr. Brown, the chancellor of the exchequer, sat close by against a flame-red backdrop. The two men did not shake hands after the speech, suggesting there was little warmth between them.

Some delegates leaving the hall said Mr. Blair had been less than generous to his finance minister, who has presided over sustained economic growth. "Gordon gave more to Tony than Tony gave to Gordon," said one delegate, Peter Riddle, from the northwestern city of Carlisle.

Others said Mr. Blair had delivered a fitting farewell for loyalists, like Maurice Epstein, a Labor activist from Brighton, who called Mr. Blair "my God, the greatest prime minister." He added, "I'm heartbroken that he's going."

For many Laborites the valedictory address — choreographed as much as a victory rally as an adieu — offered the beginnings of a transition after almost a decade in power, during which Mr. Blair alienated voters because of his support of the White House in Iraq, Afghanistan and the campaign against terrorism. Some said Mr. Blair should announce a date to leave soon.

"Gordon Brown needs no acclaim from Tony Blair because he's the leader in waiting," said Steve Barber, a Labor Party member from Nottingham, in the English Midlands. "It would be better if Tony Blair named a date, sooner rather than later. His one failing was Iraq, and it was an error that I still hold against him."

British newspapers on Tuesday trumpeted an episode on Monday when, according to the Bloomberg news agency, Cherie Booth, the wife of the prime minister, was overheard remarking that Mr. Brown was a liar for saying it had been a privilege to work under Mr. Blair.

Bloomberg said it stood by the article. British officials denied it, but the episode illustrated what even Mr. Blair indicated Tuesday was a rocky relationship between Ms. Booth and Mr. Brown, whose office is next door to the Blairs' on Downing Street. "At least," Mr. Blair said in his speech, "I don't have to worry about her running off with the bloke next door."

Mr. Blair's speech drew longer and more passionate applause than Mr. Brown's address on Monday, emboldening some of the prime minister's followers to say that he should not be hurried out of office, as Mr. Brown's supporters had been seeking. "I don't really see why he should go before the next conference," said Marsha Healy, a Labor party member from Manchester.

Mr. Blair's deft handling of the Labor crowd — drawn from a party that supposedly wants to be rid of him — showed the extent to which Labor has relied on his oratory as a vote winner. Supporters held up placards with slogans like "Too young to retire," and "Things got better."

Mr. Blair used his speech to try to energize the faithful to fight and win a fourth election, possibly in 2009. "The scale of the challenges now dwarf what we faced in 1997," he said, referring to the year Labor came to power. "In 1997, the challenges we faced were essentially British. Today, they are essentially global."

Mr. Blair dwelt on the campaign against terrorism, saying, "We will not win until we shake ourselves free of the wretched capitulation to the propaganda of the enemy, that somehow we are the ones responsible. This terrorism isn't our fault. We didn't cause it."

He also defended actions by Britain as an ally of the United States in Afghanistan and Iraq. "If we retreat now, hand Iraq over to Al Qaeda and sectarian death squads and Afghanistan back to Al Qaeda and the Taliban, we won't be safer. We will be committing a craven act of surrender that will put our future security in the deepest peril."

Blair In Tough And Tender Farewell (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

Tony Blair on Tuesday bade farewell to the Labour conference with a tough but tender speech, declaring he loved his party – but that it must not retreat into a leftwing "comfort zone" of politics after he is gone.

In a dazzling final address to the Labour conference that left many delegates in tears, the prime minister said he wanted to heal the divisions with Gordon Brown, the chancellor, whom he praised as "a remarkable man, a remarkable servant to this country".

In spite of accusations that Mr Blair has been forced out in a coup orchestrated by the chancellor's allies, the prime minister told the conference: "Of course it is hard to go. But it is also right to go – for the country and for you, the party."

However, Mr Blair – as expected – stopped short of endorsing Mr Brown as his successor.

He also declared that he wanted to stay at Downing Street into next year, saying his energies "over the coming months" would be focused on trying to boost the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

Mr Blair's main goal in the hour-long speech was to advise Labour on how it must set about winning the next general election – something that he described as the "only legacy that has ever mattered to me".

Mr Blair said that after a decade in power Britain was "a changed country", that the party had "changed the terms of the political debate".

But he said Britain still needed to meet the challenge of globalisation. "The British people are reluctant global citizens," he said. "We must make them confident ones."

Meeting this challenge meant his successor would have to be courageous. "A governing party has confidence, self-belief. It sees the tough decision and thinks it should be taking it."

Mr Blair outlined a string of tasks for the party in the years ahead.

On the reform of health and education sectors, he said the issue at the next election would be which party would put "the patient and the parent" first.

On foreign policy, he also insisted Labour must have the right outlook internationally. "Nothing we strive for . . . can be solved without America or without Europe," Mr Blair said.

He said that to give up these alliances would significantly reduce Britain's "power, weight and influence".

One of Mr Blair's main aims was to reject claims that he had always been a "closet Tory".

He said: "They say I hate the party and its traditions. I don't. I love this party. There's only one tradition I ever hated: it was losing."

But he drew the loudest applause when he made a quip about how his wife Cherie had reportedly expressed disgust in the middle of Mr Brown's speech on Monday: "At least I don't have to worry about her running off with the bloke next door."

Peter Mandelson, the European commissioner, said after the speech: "Once again he has shown himself to be the best politician by a mile in this country – and he always will be."
